"We grieve much for the loss of 'our Jessie,' as dear Miss Ackermann had come to be. Her work in these southern lands will never die but will remain as a lasting monument of her devotion and ability. One of our newly appointed Australasian organizers — a young woman of much talent and of whom we believe the world will yet hear — was won by Miss Ackermann from a worldly life and led to give herself wholly to the service of God. If Miss Ackermann had only secured this solitary trophy her work would not have been in vain ; but if you could hear the thankful blessings invoked upon her head by those who have been saved through her mission work you would not regret even her impaired constitution and prematurely whitened hair. The Triennial Convention in Sydney was her crowning triumph."

Let me also give a sentence from the letter of Mrs. Amelia Pennell, of Sydney, dated July 19th :

"Yesterday we had a general election of members of Parliament in this colony, and you will be glad to hear that we white-ribboners of Sydney and the suburbs held an all-day prayer meeting in our central temperance hall, and to-day's papers show us our prayers are answered to a wonderful extent, for very many of the members returned are local optionists and woman suffragists."

With this inspiring information, on behalf of every white-ribbon woman in the world, let me make my best salutations to my comrades of the great continent at the South, and bid them God-speed in their holy war.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE CONGRESS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The morning of August 29, 1894, was most propitiously ushered in by the assembling together of delegates from twelve different nations of the earth. In the Royal Atheneum, exquisitely decorated with the flags of different countries, we all sat in congress assembled, lovers of peace and expounders of the doctrine, to consult about the best methods to abolish war and to establish international arbitration. There were delegates from Austria, England, France, Poland, Germany, Italy, Sweden, Switzerland, Denmark, Portugal, Belgium and America. From the latter country came our poet, Hezekiah Butterworth, of the Youth's Companion, Boston Judge Ashman and Rev. Russell H. Conwell, of Philadelphia, Mrs. Lockwood and myself, by the appointment from the World's W. C. T. U., as well as from two peace societies and the Human Freedom League.

The president, M. Honzeau de Le Haie, received me most graciously and sent his personal salutations back to Miss Willard. He had met her, as I understand, in Antwerp. He has promised me time to speak on the question dearest to all members of the W. C. T. U. at the session to-morrow morning. W. C. T. U. legions should come immediately here to live in this wine and liquor drinking country and begin just such a crusade as was commenced by the early pioneers of our cause. It is wine everywhere.

King Leopold himself has taken an active part in the needed preparations to make the Peace Congress a success. I have by this mail sent a printed circular to THE UNION SIGNAL containing a letter from this good king dated February 6, 1894, in which he instituted a central commission of patronage charged with the favor of tho work of the congress and conferences which would be organized at the time of the Universal Exposition at Antwerp in 1894. King Leopold, in this letter, particularly emphasized the duties he imposed on the commissioners, to whom he delegated the charge of the Sixth International Peace Congress. He appointed Monsieur le Baron de Moreau, member of the Chamber of Representatives, and ex-minister Affaires des Etrangères as honorary president of this commission, and Mon. Honzeau de Le Haie, member of the Chamber of Representatives, as acting president of the commission. Mon. La Fontaine, a lawyer of Brussels, his Majesty, King Leopold, constituted General Secretary. These gentlemen are now most graciously and efficiently performing their duties at this congress. At the morning session of the first day one delegate from each country spoke of the work that was being accomplished in his or her country. Two of the American delegates were asked to speak. Rev. Dr. Trueblood and myself, both representatives of the American Peace Society, told of the work in our native land. Dr. Trueblood confined his remarks particularly to the work of the peace societies.

A telegram was sent to King Leopold, and he sent back the following message: "The king is very pleased with the telegram from the congress. The king begged me to express his thanks." This official message from His Majesty was received with acclamation by the congress. At the morning session of the first day I presented, in behalf of the Human Freedom League, a souvenir liberty bell, made, like the Peace plow, of the overflow metal from the Columbian liberty bell. It was most graciously received by the president, Mon. Honzeau de Le Haie, and he, in an enthusiastic vote of thanks, dedicated it to all future meetings in the cause of liberty and peace. It is being rung through the entire congress to mark off the different proceedings.

After the morning session the delegates were invited to the Hotel de la Ville, where they were received officially by Hon. Van Ryswick, the burgomaster of Antwerp, on behalf of the king, who is now at Ostend. He said Antwerp was a fortified city, but the guns were not mounted, and the Congress of Peace was here gladly greeted. The whole would have been a most delightful occasion if the sparkling champagne had not been offered as the fraternal cup of welcome. Rev. Dr. Trueblood, Mr. Butterworth and myself were a few exceptions who did not imbibe the beverage. Example and precept may do something here, but there is work for an army of the W. C. T. U., and it seems to me it will all fail except through the the Omnipotence of the Almighty.

My home in Antwerp is near the old cathedral that contains the masterpieces of art painted by Rubens, "The Descent from the Cross," and the "Elevation of the Cross." Never does Christ seem nearer to me than when gazing at these pictures, and involuntarily Mrs. Julia Ward Howe's poem comes to my mind:

"In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea," and the chimes, containing ninety-nine bells, that awaken me every morning, echo the sweet refrain, and seem continually ringing out, "Peace on earth, good will to men."

It is strange that in this spot, a fortified city, where Jacob Van Artveldt, in the early ages, made a stand for liberty from the despotism of the feudal system in the nineteenth century there should be held the sixth International Peace Congress.

OUR BADGE—WHITE AND GOLD.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Looking up the history of the little white bow I find an article, clipped from THE UNION SIGNAL several years ago, from the pen of Margaret E. Winslow, in which she refers to the discussion and final action of the W. C. T. U. at the Chicago convention in 1877 as to what should be the uniform badge of the W. C. T. U. In these days when the white ribbon is found in another camp than the W. C. T. U. it may be well to have a reprint of a portion, at least, of the article, so here it is:

"The discussion was exciting and lasted several hours, every color of the rainbow with its advantages and disadvantages being under review. It seemed to me we were losing very valuable time and I got up and proposed white as the emblem of both purity and the resultant of all other virtues, quoting Keble's words:

"'As every varied hue makes white
So every grace is love.'

"White with gold letters was the recommendation because gold in ancient times was emblematic of Divinity. Then I suggested that we adopt the white ribbon as our emblem of purity (or human loveliness) with golden letters emblematic of Divine holiness, and wear the whole as an assurance that we represented the Church of God, at whose shelter the persecuted and degraded take refuge and find help."

My little speech was received with applause and the white and gold unanimously adopted. In some unions badges were made of white ribbon stamped with W. C. T. U. in gold. I am a little sorry the gold has been omitted.

Although a delegate in that convention, with a distinct remembrance of the discussion, the matter of the "golden letters" has escaped my memory. But the thought comes to me now like an inspiration that we take on the stamp of divinity by way of having our badges, both at the coming state and the National conventions, lettered with gold; I therefore "move" (who will "second"?). I am sure "Madam President" will recognize the motion and bring it before the house, and that the vote will be "unanimous" among the general officers to have all badges gold lettered on this, the twenty-first anniversary of that holy Crusade, to be observed on Crusade soil, in Cleveland, O., the city of our birth as an organization.

Then it will not be necessary for any good sister to place beside her bow of white the red, white and blue to protect herself, her badge, or the white ribbon army to which she belongs. God's power linked to our "ribbon white" may become to us what the "rod of God" was in the hand of Moses—a weapon of miraculous power.

Postville, Ia. ANNA M. PALMER.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

The just shall live by his faith.—Hab. 2:4.

A long article from the Wheeling Register, W. Va., has been forwarded to us. It purports to be an interview with two white-ribboners who claim they were deposed from office in the National W. C. T. U. on account of their opposition to the Temple. The article, with one exception, is the same old rehash of objections to the Temple enterprise, that a few opposers of the project have indulged in for the last two or three years. The interview would not be worthy of notice if we did not fear some true, earnest soul might be deceived by the following ridiculous assertion. The interviewed ladies say:

"Besides, the Temple scheme is impracticable. The life of a Chicago office building is put at twenty years." In order to put at rest the doubts of the timid in regard to this assertion which has now appeared in print the second time, the opinions of experts in building had been sought. The writer interviewed three of the best known men in Chicago who are authority upon such subjects.

Mr. D. H, Burnham, president of the American Association of Architects, and chief of construction of our late World's Exposition, said in reply to the question, "What is the supposed life of a fireproof office building in Chicago?" "If it is not demolished by an earthquake, blown up by dynamite or leveled to the earth by cannon balls, I would say that such a building was good for a thousand years." "Would such a building last as long in Chicago as in Boston or New York?" "Most certainly, there is no reason why it should not."

Mr. George A. Fuller, who has built more office buildings than any other contractor in the west, when asked, "What is the life of a fireproof office building in Chicago?" replied, "That is an unknown quantity, as the city is too young to have had the matter tested; this is also true of all other cities in the United States. I am of the opinion that such a building is good for at least six hundred years and I know not how many more."

Mr. Wm. E. Hale, of Hale elevator fame, a large capitalist who is himself the owner of some fireproof "sky-scrapers," replied as follows: "That is a strange question to ask, as we have not had time to test the subject. Such buildings should last two or three centuries; in fact, it seems to me there should be no wear out to them. The material of which they are built is indestructible. There are buildings in the east as old as the country; there is nothing to hinder buildings in Chicago from lasting as long as those of other cities." We trust the opinion of these men will forever set at rest this silly canard in regard to the brevity of the life of a Chicago office building. One of the ladies also said in the interview, "So far the union has only $60,000 worth of stock of the Temple company and probably from present prospects will never have a controlling interest." We desire to correct our good sister and inform her the board of trustees hold a controlling interest in the building, as they own for the National W. C. T. U. over $300,000 worth of Temple stock.

Vernon Center W. C. T. U. is the banner Temple union in Blue Earth county, Minn. Mrs. Jennie R. Babcock has sent us a check for $44.50 which completes the union's pledge. This is the first W. C. T. U. in the county that has raised a hundred dollars for the Temple. Some may think the union is large and wealthy; this is not so as Mrs. Babcock, superintendent of Temple work, writes "We are only a union of fifteen members, most of whom are mothers with all the duties of wife, mother and maid-of-all-work devolving upon us—not one wealthy woman among us. We send out mite-boxes, and our earnest president, with a few of the faithful, opened a temperance booth, the Fourth of July, which proved successful. It does seem that if so small a union as ours can raise $100 with the true 'I will' spirit, many more unions with God's help might soon lift the burden from your shoulders."

Mrs. A. W. Lord sends $25 towards the pledge of the Tilton, N. H., W. C. T. U. which makes $75 paid by this union. South Bend, Washington, W. C. T. U. sends $20 through its president, Mrs. Sarah J. Olney, a total of $50 paid on their pledge since last January. Mrs. Olney writes : "Although it is hard times we are glad to do this for the Temple, hoping that it may soon be dedicated free of debt." The Payson, Ill., W. C. T. U. does not seem to have been ruined by raising $100 for the Temple. This plucky union that is officered by Miss Scarborough as president and Miss Augusta Hood, secretary, sends $10 towards another $100.

Mrs. McNeill, president of Fredonia, N. Y., W. C. T. U. sends $10, making $40 already paid on its $100 pledge. From Mrs. F. A. Goulding $5 has been received on the pledge of the Shenandoah, Ia., W. C. T. U. We hope all unions that are raising money for the Temple will send in all they have in hand by the first of October, so that they may be credited with it in the annual report for the National W. C. T. U. Convention.

Persons who want a silver souvenir spoon will have to work hard to secure one by January 1—only a little over three months of the year left. Mrs. O. F. Burgess, Crystal, Minn., sent $1, and received the Columbian souvenir. She says: "I received the beautiful souvenir; was delighted with it; shall keep it among my treasures, and take great pride showing it to my friends." All white-ribboners should possess one of these; they will make beautiful and inexpensive Christmas gifts.

All who desire to secure a solid silver Temple souvenir teaspoon should enter their name at once and send to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, The Temple, Chicago, for a mite-box. Persons placing in the box $3.65 during the year 1894 will receive the beautiful spoon.

THE LITTLE THINGS OF LIFE.

BY HARRIET FRANCENE CROCKER.

Oh, does it sometimes seem, my dear, as though it didn't pay
To do the little things that come with each successive day—
The trifling things so small and dull—oh, does it seem to you
That life holds grander duties you long so much to do?

It's prosy work to sweep and dust and set the house aright,
To trim the lamps and render them all shining, clean and bright,—
It's dull to rock the baby when other duties wait,
To patch and mend the little clothes and make the tangles straight.

Oh, 'tis the little things of life that make us what we are,
The happy housewife, or the one whom little troubles mar;
It is the little things we do that make us sweet or sour,
That strew our path with thistles or with many a lovely flower.

Dear heart, your blessed Master was not too proud to do
The little trifling duties that seem so dull to you.
He labored like the rest of us and so He knows it all.
Then why should you and I complain when little duties call!

Oh, let us just resolve, my dear, to do them anyway—
The petty trifling duties that come to us each day—
So let us gladly do them, nor think them done in vain,
And in our lives their melody will make a sweet refrain.

WOMEN'S SIGNATURES.

[Two months ago On Duty asked for opinions on the proper form for the signatures of women, married and unmarried, the dilemma having been originally propounded (though not experienced) by Rev. Sam Small. As the discussion has outgrown the limits of the Watch Tower column, we gladly extend to it the wider domain of the Household department. THE UNION SIGNAL'S opinion can be found at the head of its editorial pages—in the list of editors. Those without the title are unmarried; those married are so indicated for convenience in correspondence.—EDS.]

WHAT BETTER THAN MRS.?

Personally, I am enough of a "Friend" to see no necessity for titles of any kind; but as we are not likely to do away with them, why should there not be a feminine one broad enough to take in both married and unmarried women as the masculine "Mr." embraces both married and unmarried men? What better title can be devised for this purpose than the old Anglo-Saxon "Mrs." which originally covered both states? Because the word has since been perverted does not affect its true grace and force. It means very literally "mistress"; mistress of one's self, one's household, one's environment. Unmarried women are often more truly all that than are those who are married. To my thought, so far from a going backward to the days when girls sat about "to be plucked by the masculine hand," such a movement would be an advance to the days when the masculine hand could in no way affect a woman's social status. When all unmarried men of whatever age shall be called "Master," then it will be time for each unmarried woman of whatever age to advertise herself as still "in the market," under the title of Miss!—MRS. (!) KATHARINE LENTE STEVENSON, Chicago.

BLINDED BY USAGE.

The title, Miss, is not as "honorable" for a woman of mature years as Mrs., for the same reason that Master—a title invariably applied to boys—is not as honorable to bestow on an adult man as Mr. Old English usage in the days of the Georges gave the title of Mrs. to every woman without regard to her married or unmarried condition. Hannah More was always Mrs. with her contemporaries, and as late as our own day Harriet Martineau claimed it as her rightful title. The dropping of this title and substituting in its place one properly applicable only to a girl in her teens had its origin in the old idea that the unmarried state was something to be ashamed of. There is no embarrassment in introducing an unmarried man as Mr.; why should there be any more in introducing an unmarried lady as Mrs. So-and-So? Let the title, Mrs., be given to all women over twenty-one, and the whole vexed question will be set happily at rest.—ELIZABETH E. FLAGG, Wellesley, Mass.

MASTER FOR UNMARRIED MEN.

I can't resist the temptation of having my say regarding the prefixes Miss and Mrs. It seems to me it would be simpler to call all unmarried women Miss and all unmarried men Master, no matter how old they are. It is sometimes a great convenience to know without asking whether any one is married or not. If it were not for naming the children it would also be convenient for the woman to retain her full maiden name, changing the prefix from Miss to Mrs., but I don't know how they would manage about naming the children, unless the boys took the father's name and the girls were named for the mother, Don't let's call grown-up unmarried women Mrs., and let's all add the prefix that belongs to us, so that people will know whether we are married or single. I prefer my husband's initials except in signing important documents.—MRS. T. F. MCCLURE, Litchfield, Minn.

ONE NAME FOR DAUGHTERS.

Parents should give their daughters but one name and their sons two or more; then when the daughters are married let them take their family name for a middle name; and so friends will not only know they are Mrs., but who they were before they were married. Single ladies should write their given names in full, young misses using the prefix Miss, as boys do Master, and dropping it, say at their majority.—MRS. J. MCLEAN TOD, Fort Dodge, Ia.

COPY THE SIGNATURE.

I have always been puzzled to know why a woman is expected to sign either Miss or Mrs., it certainly is not a part of her name. Why can we not write plain Jennie Smith as simply as our brother writes John Smith? Would it not be a mark of affectation for him to write Mr., Hon. or Esq. as a part of his signature? We are told that the title should always be added in a business letter, that the receiver may know if we be married or unmarried. I know of no business unless it be of a matrimonial nature in which such information is necessary. It seems that the receiver of a business letter might have the good sense to copy correctly the signature given without trying to decide if the author be married or unmarried.—JESSIE S. HAWTHORNE, Grand Forks, N. D.

THE QUAKER MODE.

Madam for unmarried women, Mrs. for married, would avoid the "pertness" of Miss, but still be a marriage advertisement. As Mrs. has come through custom to mean a married woman, the least confusion and quickest remedy would be to drop it (Mrs.) altogether.—JUNE OLA CLEVENGER, Blanchester, O.

MAIDEN NAME THE MIDDLE NAME.

A married woman should subscribe her own name.

1. Because it alone is legal. In transaction of business with banks and in signing legal documents a woman's own name alone is accepted.

2. It is her baptismal name.

3. It is the name hallowed by associations of love. Even the husband in private addresses his wife by her own name, also her intimate friends.

A married woman should, under no circumstance, tolerate such address as Mrs. Charles Smith, Mrs. Robert Williams. In ancient Rome daughters were numbered first, second, etc. These customs all originated in the desire to sink woman's personality in that of her husband.

It may be proper for a dog to wear a collar with his master's name thereon, but our soul enters protest when the wife wears the collar. The custom indicates in emphatic terms the husband's proprietorship in his wife.

Again a wife should write her maiden name as her middle name. Thus:—Frances Wilson-Smith, the hyphen would solve the perplexing problem whether she were a married woman or no.—LEE ANNA STARR, Bellevue, Pa.

MADAM THE SAFEST.

Who is a better judge of how a woman's letter should be signed than the particular woman who writes the letter? If she does not care to have a stranger to whom she writes know whether she is married or single let her omit the title. If she wishes her condition known let her give title with parenthesis or not, as she chooses. If she does not care to have her sex known she can simply give initials of first names. But if she anticipates a reply to her communication she should impart sufficient knowledge to insure the proper directing of such reply. I think with Ada M. Melville that common sense is better than any fixed rule. One who does not know the condition matrimonially, of a woman to whom he is writing, is safe in addressing her—not in directing the letter—as Madam unless he knows her to be young enough to have "Miss" required. But I do wish, if you will excuse the introduction of a somewhat similar trouble, that we had a common pronoun in the third person for men and women and were not so often left to say "he" for the race.—AURILLA FURBER, St. Paul, Minn.

IGNORE ALL TITLES.

While reading the various opinions upon Rev. Sam Small's dilemma, these queries have put themselves to me: Why is it necessary to inform the general public whether "Miss Ruth Ashton" has never been married, or "Mrs. John Gray" is married, or "Mrs. Ruth Gray" has been married but is not now? When Ruth Ashton joins herself in marriage to John Gray, why is she not herself just the same after that? Her name is plain, honest Ruth Ashton (all her life); the prefix "Miss," while under age, and "Mrs." after reaching age, meets all social formalities; in her correspondence, with whatsoever signature she closes a letter, to that address does she wish a reply sent; initials are meaningless; at marriage she adds to her own name her husband's surname.—LILA BISHOP ELLIOTT, Pennington, N. J.

A PERSONAL ILLUSTRATION.

A name should be a name from childhood to the grave. If it be just a plain name, as Frances E. Willard, it should not be mixed with Miss or Mrs. But if she enters a marriage partnership with Mr. John T. Smythe, the name will properly become Frances Willard Smythe. She may affix to this name any professional or official title representing a profession or office in which she is an actor. She may and must sign official and professional correspondence as the Frances Willard Smythe, D. D., M. D. or M. C., Attorney at Law, Secretary of State, Superintendent of highways, or President of the United States, but she should not prefix an honorary title before the plain name Frances Willard Smythe.—MARIETTA H. MALTBY, Polo, Ill.

"GIRLS" VS. MEN.

I sincerely hope something may be evolved from the discussion of this subject. From my earliest childhood I have known two sisters and their brother, who are now old and gray-headed, but none of them have ever married. They were always spoken of as "the Patterson girls." It never occurred to any one to call the brother a "boy"; he was a man, but his sisters were doomed forever to remain "girls." This is not an isolated case; we all know many of them. Isn't it ridiculous, to say the least of it?

Is it impossible for a female to become a woman except by marrying? According to the old idea, it is, and a female without a husband was like a man without a country—no place for her and no use for her, and no respect for her after her chances for getting a husband were gone.

A man is a man when he is of age, irrespective of marriage. Why is a woman not a woman till she is married? As to title, is it not ridiculous to be obliged to sign either Mrs. or Miss to your name? Imagine a man signing his name "Mr. John Smith." It is immaterial to the business world whether a man is married or not. Why should it need to know the private relations of a woman? Let us have a title which means woman, either married or single.—LORENA PEPPARD, Milford, Ill.

"TELL ME THE OLD, OLD STORY."

BY ABBY MORTON DIAZ.

Yes, tell all the old, old stories, so far as they are good ones to live by, but by the same rule tell the new, new stories. Once upon a time and many times upon many times has been heard the old, old story of man's vileness and weakness. Let us now hear the story of man's divineness as child and heir of the Infinite. What does Infinite mean? It means the All; the all of strength; the all of power; the all of presence; the All of All; the All of ourselves. Are we, then, something apart from the All? something added to Infinity?

Phillips Brooks said some people think of God as a garrison might of a captain up on a hill, to be called down in case of need, but others think of God as a mountain might of the forces which hold it together and make it a mountain—build it together, as we are said to be "builded together for a habitation" of the Infinite Omnipresence. "In that mustard seed, thy heart, thrones the Lord who inhabits immensity." "In thy heart and in thy mouth." "A ready help." "Nearer than breathing" or "than any thought of yours." "I am pervaded by Thee, Thou containest me." "The tabernacle of God is with man." "In thee, in me, in every one, the Lord of Life resideth." "All the Divine sources abound and flow at the root of our being." "All my springs are in Thee." "The kingdom of God is within you." "Through you all, in you all."

A very old story, and told in divers times and divers places, this story of a central, innermost Life, and of man as the existence from this innermost. Why has this true old story been told us as a sort of fable, not as a reality of human life? It is a very old song; why has it been heard but as the echo of a far-away melody?—and this in spite of the above assurances of continuous divine indwelling! Alas! Here has been the error. The wonderful story, old, but ever new—new, but always old—is a story of the oneness of man with God. The error has been in representing a separateness. This indwelling Omnipresence has been placed "In the sky above us,"—besought to "look down."

Shall we never make it real to ourselves that we are centered in Infinite Life? and that strength and might from this central Life are ours, if we will but claim them? "There is no bar or wall where man, the effect, ceases, and God, the Cause, begins." "Man rests upon the bosom of God, and draws at his need, inexhaustible power."

Yes, we are born into this possession, this "ready help." It is ours to live from, to work from, to live our everyday lives from, and thus to live them gloriously from the divineness within, by keeping ever in mind the word—Omnipresence. Is there a hard day's work before us? a night of watching? a disagreeable duty? a temper to keep sweet with bitterness around? Think the word—Omnipresence. Think it down in the deep withinness, in the silence of the soul, and how will our large duties be lessened and the small ones ennobled by letting the Light of His glory fill the house of His glory! Indeed, there is neither small nor great, low nor high, when all is illumined by the glory of the Divine Omnipresence!

HEAVEN.

[A true incident.]

The lesson hour was nearly past
When I asked of my scholars seven,
"Now tell me each one, please, in turn,
What sort of a place is heaven."

"Oh, meadows, flowers and lovely trees!"
Cried poor little North Street Kitty;
While Dorothy, fresh from country lanes,
Was sure it was a "great big city."

Bessy, it seemed, had never thought
Of the home beyond the river;
She simply took each perfect gift,
And trusted the loving Giver.

Then up spoke Edith, tall and fair—
Her voice was clear and ringing,
And led in the Easter anthem choir—
"In heaven they're always singing!"

To Esther, clad in richest furs,
'Twas a place for "outdoor playing";
But Bridget drew her thin shawl close,
For "warmth and food" she was praying.

My sober, thoughtful Florry;
"Why, heaven just seems to me a place—
A place—where you're never sorry!"

—Willis B. Allen, in S. S. Times.

IT'S QUEER.

It's queer when the world seems steady
It really is whirling so;
It's queer that the plants get larger
When no one can see them grow.
It's queer that the fountain's water
Leaps high in the sunshine bright,
And queer that the moon can never
Fall out of the sky at night.

It's queer that one clover blossom
Is white, and another red
When the same black earth surrounds them,
The same rain waters their bed.
It's queer that all of those wonders
We take so little heed
And that as for feeling thankful
We seldom see the need.

We scold if the weather's chilly,
And fret at the hot sunlight;
Don't like to get up in the morning,
Hang back from the bed at night;
Yes, queerest of all the queerness
Are surely those girls and boys
Who live in the world of beauty,
And rather see woes than joys.

—Treasure Trove.

TO A LITTLE TROUT.

Tell me, tell me, little trout,
Does your mother know you're out—
That you're truant from your school,
Playing hookey in this pool?

As you see, my little trout,
I desire to draw you out.
In the brook noise so abounds
That I cannot catch your sounds.

(If that joke he do but see,
Any trout should tickled be).
Would you take the point so fine,
If I dropped you just a line?

Don't they teach it in these creeks,
That when one above you speaks,
First, before a soul replies,
It is meet that you should rise

Blithely, as becomes a trout,
(I'm not angling for a pout),
Quickly take things on the fly,
For I've other fish to fry.

Thank you, thank you, little trout,
Schools are in, but you are out:
School and pool alike forgot—
This is hookey—is it not?

THE GREEDY BOTTLE.

There are many poor boys and girls too, who are robbed of what would rightfully be theirs by "the greedy bottle." There would be happiness and rejoicing in many poor homes if the bottle could be broken, as in this story from the Children's Record:

A poor undersized boy named Tim, sitting by a bottle, and looking in, said, "I wonder if there can be a pair of shoes in it." He wanted to go to a Sunday-school picnic, but he had no shoes. His mother had mended his clothes, but said his shoes were so bad he must go barefoot. Then he took a brick and broke the bottle, but there were no shoes in it, and he was frightened, for it was his father's bottle. Tim sat down again, and sobbed so hard that he did not hear a step beside him, until a voice said:

"Well! what's all this?" He sprang up in great alarm; it was his father.

"Who broke my bottle?" he asked.

"I did," said Tim, catching his breath, half in terror and half between his sobs.

"Why did you?" Tim looked up. The voice did not sound so terrible as he had expected. The truth was, his father had been touched at the sight of the forlorn figure, so very small and so sorrowful, which had bent over the broken bottle.

"Why," he said, "I was looking for a pair of new shoes; I want a pair of shoes awful bad to wear to the picnic—all the other chaps wear shoes."

"How came you to think you'd find shoes in a bottle?" the father asked.

"Why, mother said so; I asked her for some new shoes, and she said they had gone into the black bottle, and that lots of other things had gone into it, too—coats and hats, and bread and meat and things; and I thought if I broke it I'd find em all, and there ain't a thing in it!" And Tim sat down again and cried harder than ever. His father seated himself on a box in the disorderly yard, and remained quiet for so long a time that Tim at last looked cautiously up.

"I'm real sorry I broke your bottle, father; I'll never do it again."

"No, I guess you won't," he said, laying a hand on the rough little head as he went away, leaving Tim overcome with astonishment that his father had not been angry with him. Two days after, on the very evening before the picnic, he handed Tim a parcel, telling him to open it.

"New shoes! New shoes!" he shouted. "Oh, father, did you get a new bottle? And were they in it?"

"No, my boy, there isn't going to be a new bottle. Your mother was right—the things all went into the bottle, but you see getting them out is no easy matter; so, God helping me, I am going to keep them out after this."

HOW THE CHINESE DO THINGS.

Everything relating to the Orient, where a terrible war is being waged now between China and Japan, is of interest. We would all like to see these people follow the example of the civilized nations in later years and settle their difficulties without murder and bloodshed. But these heathen nations are just the opposite, even in their ways of doing common things:

The Chinese do everything backward. They exactly reverse the usual order of civilization.

Note first that the Chinese compass points to the south instead of the north.

The men wear skirts and the women trousers.

The men wear their hair long and the women wear it short.

The men carry on dressmaking and the women carry burdens.

The spoken language of China is not written, and the written language is not spoken.

Books are read backward, and what we call footnotes are inserted at the top of the page.

The Chinese surname comes first instead of last.

The Chinese shake their own hands instead of the hands of those they greet.

The Chinese dress in white at funerals and in mourning at weddings, while old women always serve as bridesmaids.

The Chinese launch their vessels sideways and mount their horses from the off side.

The Chinese begin dinner with dessert and end with soup and fish.

FOR INKY FINGERS.

A little girl we read of, says the Bombay Guardian, has made a wonderful discovery, which she thinks all other little school-boys and girls should know, too.

"It's so useful, mamma," she says; "every boy and girl gets ink on their fingers, you know."

"Surely they do, and on their clothes as well," said her mother.

"I can't get the spots out of my clothes, but I'm sorry when they get there," responded the little girl. "I try very hard not to. But I can get the ink spots off my fingers. See!"

She dipped her fingers into water, and while they were wet she took a match out of the match box, and rubbed the sulphur end well over every ink spot. One after another she rubbed, and one after another the spots disappeared, leaving a row of white fingers where there had been a row of inky black ones.

"There!" said the little girl, after she had finished, "Isn't that good? I read that in a housekeeping paper, and I never knew they were any good before. I clean my fingers that way every morning now. It's just splendid!"

So some other school-girls and boys might try Alice's cure for inky fingers.

When a fly lights on a sheet of sticky paper he realizes that he is better off.

Dear Boys and Girls:—Among the many tales of heroism which we can read in books, you will find there are none more noble and fine than the deeds which are enacted in real life.

Did you read about the terrible forest fires in Wisconsin and Minnesota last month? In the village of Partridge lived little twelve-year-old Freda Johnson. When the flames and smoke closed round the village, all the people ran for their lives. Freda and her two-year-old brother Joe got separated from her father, mother, brothers and sisters in the rush to get away from the awful fire, and were lost in the dense smoke. The brave little girl, who could have run very fast if she had been alone, never thought of leaving her brother to save herself. She picked up the heavy boy in her arms and stumbling along tried to follow where the others had gone.

She fell more than once under the heavy weight, and felt her strength growing weaker and weaker, but she held baby Joe all the time. At last when she became almost overcome, and the fire seemed about to devour them, she stumbled into a little pond of water over which the flame swept and left them unharmed. Her first words to the people who rescued them all dripping wet, were, "Joe would have been burned if I hadn't carried him." Wasn't she as brave as any heroine you ever read about in story book? And what do you think baby Joe will do when he gets older and learns about his big sister's love and courage?

I wonder how many of our Cozy Cornerers are denying themselves something they usually have to send its value in money to the National W. C. T. U. treasurer, Mrs. Barker, at the Temple, for the temperance work around the world? Last year many dimes came from Cozy Cornerers who were themselves made happy and blessed by this personal sacrifice. Don't forget to write to Cozy Corner and tell all about it. Affectionately,

Aunt Jane

NEPHEWS AND NIECES.

I am sixteen; am I too old to be a niece? My papa and mamma have been in the temperance work for twenty-eight years, so you see I inherit my temperance principles. I am working for temperance and for Christ, as I entered the church six years ago. Will some cousin from England who is my age write to me, please? Mary F. Brown.

Middlebush, N. J,

We are glad to enroll you in our Cozy Corner, Mary, where you'll find many comrades of your own age.

I have cracked the Soft-Shelled Nuts for a long time, and now I send one for the other cousins to crack. My mamma belongs to the W. C. T. U., my sister and I belong to the L. T. L. and my two brothers and papa are for temperance. I have a brother in Chicago working in an office near the Temple. I would like very much to correspond with some of the nieces about my age, fourteen years.

Morristown, Tenn. Ethel H. Darlington.

Your puzzle was an excellent one, Ethel. Will you not send more?

"HONOR TO WHOM HONOR."

Three times have the Democrats of Maine used their utmost and worst endeavors to destroy the prohibitory law that was enacted when they were in power in 1851. The first attempt was made two years after that law went into force. The Democratic party bowed to the behest of the liquor power, and abrogated the enactment that the people had demanded. On this issue the party was defeated, and the law was replaced upon the statute book where it has remained from that day to this.

In 1884, by a plebiscite, the people of Maine, in a majority of nearly fifty thousand, made prohibition a part of the organic law by placing it in the constitution of the state. Twice since 1851 the Democrats have declared against prohibition, their attack in anticipation of this year's state election taking the form of a resolution to re-submit prohibition to the people and a declaration in favor of license.

On the other hand, the Republican party, in face of the defection of Iowa and the desperate efforts of the liquor trade to intrench itself within the Republican camp, explicitly declared in favor of the prohibitory law, and fought out its campaign this autumn on that issue, as well as on the issue of the tariff. The result is a majority of well-nigh forty thousand for the Republicans, the largest by far that they have ever reached in the old Pine Tree state, although in round numbers fewer than the total given for the prohibition plebiscite.

The legislature is practically solid for the Republican party, and Senator Fry (a stanch teetotaller and Prohibitionist) and our loyal champion, Congressman Dingley, will be returned without opposition.

Some of the state officers have, however, illustrated the possibility of a strong declaration and a weak enforcement, even as the Methodist Church which unanimously declares by the mouth of its General Conference that "the liquor traffic cannot be legalized without sin," is to-day the strongest Republican and hence by its deeds the strongest high license church in the nation. But at the same time it remains true that the Methodist Church is the hope of the temperance reform because it is at least right in its mental attitude and right in the votes of a vast number of its ministers and a goodly percentage of its laymen ; while the moral tonic that is being administered in the speeches of John G. Woolley and other notable Prohibitionists is having a visible effect in improving the morale of that great body of Christian people.

We are perfectly aware that in Maine the leading speakers in the late campaign dwelt wholly upon the tariff issue, which was natural enough as the provision for free lumber is most obnoxious to the people of Maine and as the prohibition question may be considered to have been thoroughly "thrashed out"—as the English say—and settled in the minds of the people. Nevertheless, it remains true that in the city of Portland there is flagrant violation of the law, and it would have been a more encouraging symptom if the great leaders had scored as they deserve, the city government of this beautiful metropolis of Maine and of its great lumber city, Bangor.

It would have been a magnificent thing if Congressman Reed—one of the most remarkable men of his time and the candidate that Maine will put forward for the next president of the United States—had taken a bold stand for the enforcement of law in his own city; but we know as well as he does that to secure the nomination he must be "hail fellow well met" with the saloons, which we are grieved to learn he is, although a man of reputable personal character in other respects, and a loyal champion of the enfranchisement of woman.

We have thus tried to state the case as fairly as we could both pro and con, and in spite of the discount that rests upon the Republican party in Maine, we feel that we ought to give that party its due for placing the prohibition plank in its platform year after year and standing as the representative of what enforcement of law there is, aside from the efforts of our zealous Prohibitionists and, as a class, of the Populists, who have not had, however, much of a showing in Maine as yet. We therefore thank the Republicans of Maine, and point to the moral attitude of that state in contrast to the degeneracy that has overtaken the once high-minded state of Iowa where, as we believe, the Republicans are trying to gain ground by methods so contemptible that they can never win a following from a people largely transplanted from New England soil and in the main not untrue to their traditions.

We are informed from trustworthy sources that the greed of gain on the part of business men in the villages, towns and cities of Iowa is the explanation of their debased moral attitude toward the prohibitory law. In contrast to this subserviency we can but mention with honor the name of John Mahin and his coadjutors who to their wounding and hurt wrought valiantly for the enforcement of law in the city of Muscatine, and we predict that the legislature that "railroaded" through the detestable "mulct law" which, while leaving the prohibitory law on the statute book deliberately provides for its violation by arranging a system under which license becomes easy, will hear from the people ere long, and the men who lent themselves to this burning disgrace will find that the future is not for them, but that they have elected themselves to those "back seats" which they richly merit from the home people of the once proud "Hawkeye" state.

In those stirring days of 1882, when we went campaigning for the prohibitory amendment in Iowa, we used to say that "hawks were hovering in the sky" to rob the homes, and the talons of those uncanny birds were dipped in the whisky hogsheads of the distiller. How little did we think then that with the years and the "exigencies of politics" the figure would change until the legislature itself would become the greedy bird of evil omen that should be the chief marauder against the happy homes of Iowa!

The time was when the "plain people" of the country looked upon Maine and Iowa as the two ripest fruits of New England nature and nurture. The Republican party was dominant in both, but while in one that party has bowed to the decree of the liquor power and has not only turned its back on prohibition but last winter voted down the proposition to enfranchise women, the same party has in the state of Maine stood true to its old traditions of prohibition, and came so near reinforcing its power at the ballot box by calling out the home reserves that it is the opinion of our best informed leaders in Maine that the party will this winter strengthen its progressive policy by giving the municipal ballot to the women of the state.

Now we predict that in whatever commonwealth the Republican, or any other party that has the power to do so, shall take a bold stand against the saloon and for the woman's vote, it will march triumphantly to the head of the column and hold for a generation the place of privilege and power. We white-ribbon women are Prohibitionists in politics, because we believe that the Prohibition party represents a menace organized, intelligent and unrelenting to any party that will not take up these two causes. Our rôle is not one that we would choose, but it is forced upon us by conscience and the logic of the situation. We do not believe there is a member of the Prohibition party who would not rejoice to see the Republican party in power if it would place prohibition and woman's suffrage planks in its platform, and the same is true of our attitude toward the Democratic party and the Populists. We do not care for names, but we are irreversibly committed to principles. We have lashed ourselves to the principle of prohibition and woman's ballot, which is part and parcel of it, as a sailor lashes himself to the spar, which is his last and desperate resort. With it we will sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish.

OUR CLEVELAND BILL OF FARE.

The attaining of one's majority must always be a great event, both to an individual and an organization. "Twenty-one" rings out with a more triumphant sound than does any other combination of figures, at least to that half of humanity to whom it insures the dignity of the ballot, and all that the ballot stands for in governmental life. To the other half it must stand for the same first maturing of power, the same "putting away of childish things," even though the crowning date receive not equal recognition.

For an organization to have "come of age" should mean that it has outgrown conditions and taken on new forms of development, widened in scope and deepened in purpose, learned lessons of courage and humility alike, from past failures and successes, acquired gray matter in its brain, brawn and sinew in its arm, red blood corpuscles in its veins, courage, strength and cohesiveness throughout its entire body, with a deeper unfoldment of spirit to receive, and a mightier baptism of the indwelling spirit.

"Grow old along with me,
The best is yet to be
The last of life for which the first was made,"

should belong as a perpetual motto to each organization having the right to exist, as well as each individual.

What can we say of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union's claim to these proofs of maturity? Nothing which it will not speak so much better for itself that we need only point to its coming birthday celebration for our answer to all questions. For we are "of age." The child has become—not a man, but a WOMAN, strong in all that shall go to the making up of the womanhood of the future. Attend her birthday celebration if you would know how truly she has attained to womanhood's stature.

This twenty-first annual convention will meet in the city of Cleveland, O., November 16, and continue its session through November 21.

It is peculiarly fitting that we should go back, on this special anniversary, to the old hearth-stone; for, while we do not forget the Crusade fires, nor underestimate the value of the Chautauqua meeting, it is nevertheless true that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union was born in Cleveland. The church in which the first convention was held is no longer standing; if it were it could not contain our soon-to-be-assembled band; the clans of to-day will gather in the beautiful Music Hall which seats 5,000 people, is centrally located, with fine acoustic properties and all the conveniences necessary for the entertainment of so large a body.

Seventeen unions are united to serve as one bountiful hostess, those most active in their membership being the chairman of the various committees, as previously reported.

While we can expect to see but few of those who took part in the first Convention and inaugurated the glorious work of the years following, it is still good to know that so many of the brave band remain among us to this day. Among the number we shall hope to welcome Mother Thompson and her Crusade Bible, Mother Stewart, with her white hair and youthful vigor, and the many others whose names gain added value as the ranks are so rapidly depleted.

This Convention will be the first in years to show a change in the ranks of the general officers. Nevertheless, there will be no feeling of strangeness, since the new are old as well as new, and in other capacities have served the organization long and faithfully. Each of the four will, in her special capacity, add much to the interest of the Convention:

Mrs. Woodbridge is planning with her old-time vigor and introducing new, bright features into the usual routine of the program. One of these, which cannot fail to be helpful and inspiring, is the daily prayer-meeting from 8:30 to 9:30. This will be led successively by Mrs. S. M. I. Henry, Miss Cassie Smith, Mrs. Mary McGee Snell, Mrs. M. J. Weaver, Rev. F. E. Townsley. The first three names are well known in our ranks as National evangelists and the others, we doubt not, will bring a message of authority and inspiration.

The noon service will be shortened to a half hour instead of an hour, and the leaders will be Mrs. A. M. Palmer, Mrs. J. F. Foote, Mrs. R. J. Trego, Miss Anna Downey and Mrs. Dr. Bashford.

Mrs. Alice J. Harris, our white ribbon prima donna, is to have charge of the music, which means of necessity an inspiring program.

Lady Henry Somerset cannot be present during the entire convention, but will arrive in time to deliver an address on Wednesday evening. Those who know how great a feature in the success of the three last conventions our gracious English leader has been, will not need the assurance that this Wednesday evening will be a modern illustration of the methods practiced long ago at the marriage feast in Cana of Galilee.

Of the general business of the Convention we need not speak. There will be the usual annual address, that most statesman-like of documents. The reports of general officers and of the ever-increasing corps of superintendents, organizers and evangelists, each one of whom is doing such valiant service.

Of distinguished guests from abroad, within our ranks, we must mention Miss Jessie Ackermann, whose twofold trip around the world comes to an end in this Convention. She will make one of the evening addresses and her marvelous experiences cannot fail to make that evening a center of interest. Mrs. Hauser, president of the union in India, who has lived fifteen years in that country, and is the author of several valuable works, will also be present. Four missionaries from Cape Colony, South Africa, Miss Virginia L. Pride, Miss Anna Cummings, Miss E. J. Solomon and Miss Cilliers, are to be with us and will give cheering tidings of the work in that far-off land. There will be fraternal delegates from Canada and from the Woman's Catholic Total Abstinence Association, which held its recent meeting in Minneapolis. Mrs. Maude Booth, wife of the commander of the Salvation Army in this country, is expected to be with us and will give one of her most inspiring addresses. Mesdames Sakurai and Barakat will be present, as fraternal delegates from Japan and Syria. The former is meeting with deserved success in her effort at founding an unsectarian school in Japan, and the latter is an acknowledged power in evangelistic work.

Of our brothers-in-law we hope to welcome J. W. Baer, general secretary of Christian Endeavor Society; John G. Woolley, the prophet of the new dispensation; George W. Bain, the silver-tongued temperance orator; Chairman Dickie, the brave leader of the prohibition forces; Neal Dow, in the glory of his ninety righteous years, Anthony Comstock, who stands for so much of moral heroism; Dr. Delano, the unswerving friend of our cause; Dr. Bashford, president of Ohio Wesleyan University, who is to deliver the annual sermon on Sunday afternoon; and a score of others whom lack of space alone forbids mention.

In future issues of THE UNION SIGNAL there will be a column devoted to Convention items, which will from time to time give mention of prominent features as they evolve themselves, and will also contain brief sketches of those who are to contribute to its success.

One factor must not be overlooked in our planning. "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it." All our efforts for a gathering glorious in results must fail if we fail to realize in whom alone is our strength. The call for the day of prayer preceding the Convention will doubtless soon be issued. We trust it may be observed by the unions throughout the length and breadth of the country more generally than ever before. In these days of trial when men's hearts fail them, we need to know beyond a doubt that "God is the strength of our heart, and that He is leading our hosts to victory."

COLORADO'S NEED.

John Hipp, chairman of the Colorado Prohibition committee, sends out a stirring call which we are glad to give our readers. It is as follows:

The Colorado Prohibition State Convention of 1894 has become a matter of history. It was composed of 440 delegates, representing 44 counties in the state, adopted a platform which you ere this have seen and read, and nominated a ticket that would do credit to any state in the Union, both in the private and public character of its nominees. In spite of the financial depression, the low price of silver, and the hard times caused by the bad repute into which our state has fallen, our own people nobly and heroically subscribed $1,500 for the state campaign work, for which we say, "God bless them every one." The state central committee is at the present time overwhelmed with offers of speakers in the state who are willing to work for their expenses, and with calls for literature which we are unable to supply. We believe that if the state of Colorado could be sown with Prohibition literature knee deep for the next sixty days, the Prohibition ticket might be elected. But we must have help to organize and to distribute literature throughout the state. The Prohibitionists responded nobly to the National Committee's call for aid to help Colorado. But if you realize our position, with the great mass of women that have just been given the privilege of the ballot, and who must be won for our party at this time, if at all, our subscriptions would have been multiplied many times. Chairman Dickie has just spent a week in our state and attended our state convention. He endorses this call and hopes Prohibitionists will immediately respond to it liberally.

Send money or prohibition literature to Mr. O. A. Reinhardt, 22 Londoner block, Denver, Col. The New Era, of Springfield, O., has subscribed one hundred dollars in literature. But what is that in the presence of so great a demand? Send us packages of John G. Woolley's address, "Equity," the "Flying Wedge," THE UNION SIGNAL, or other papers, and enable us, when we hold meetings on the street corners and in the mining camps, to place a prohibition tract or paper in the hands of every person. THE UNION SIGNAL has kindly offered to send us literature at fifty per cent discount. Let W. C. T. U.'s avail themselves of this offer. There is scarcely any union that with a little effort cannot raise five dollars to help in educating the women and save our state from the ruin of the liquor traffic. What the success at Norfolk, Va., was last spring, our success in Colorado may be to the Union this fall. Do not delay, but send help to-day. If you do not or cannot send literature, send money. Every subscription will be acknowledged in the Plaindealer, and to persons sending any large amount, a copy of the paper will be sent. Everybody who reads this letter will want to know how the battle is going on. So send your subscriptions to the Plaindealer at Colorado Springs, and keep posted. Who will be the first to help in this time of our extremity and your opportunity? Do not believe that we are going to be idle, or that we are not sacrificing in this campaign. We have already planned a three weeks' campaign for Mary Jewett Telford, our candidate for lieutenant-governor, some ten days' work for Hon. George Richardson, our candidate for governor, and several weeks' work for each of the candidates for Congress; while many county conventions are calling for the presence of the chairman and other members of the state executive committee. An early response will be greatly appreciated, and will enable us to plan more wisely and freely for the campaign. Remember, "he who gives quickly gives twice." Yours for the war,

Denver, Col. JOHN HIPP, State Chairman.

NEAR RETURN OF OUR SECOND ROUND-THE-WORLD MISSIONARY.

From a private letter received by our National President we learn that Miss Jessie Ackermann will soon reach her native country after an absence of six years, counting out the three or four months spent here last year. She has well rounded up her remarkable work, and will be cordially received by the white-ribbon ranks. We extract a few sentences from her letter:

Beloved Chieftain:—When this reaches you I shall, if all goes well, be on my way home. It is my intention to sail from London for Boston, as I like to land at the "Hub" this time, and I feel sure our white-ribbon sisters will give me the warm welcome that has not failed in all my journey round the world. I have signed a contract to lecture on my travels for some time after my return, and my engagements begin October 15. I also hope to be at the National Convention in Cleveland for two days at least. I come back to you after six years of toil a little worn in body and weary in mind, but with the same unchanging faith in God and abiding love for humanity and a firm belief in the success of our cause, and also, I hope, with a willing heart to work any way and anywhere. It is blessed to feel that by the help of God I have left in that great country of Australia, in the form of restored manhood and redeemed womanhood, hundreds of witnesses to the power of the gospel to save those who trust and love. The years have been freighted with toil and many a heartache; the lonely hours have often brought tears, but out of it all has come a deeper trust, a stronger faith and a feeling of kinship with every living, breathing soul. So that I can honestly say that could I stand where I stood years ago with the flush of youth still on my cheek, and had I to choose again, all things considered, I would do the same thing over again—dare the long journeys and the unceasing hardships.

WE learn with sorrow of the recent death of Rev. W. Gibson, of Paris, father of our Y comrade, Miss Isabel Gibson, whom all delegates to the Boston convention will remember. Mr. Gibson had long been a beloved and efficient Protestant minister in Paris, and his sudden departure leaves a happy home desolate. We send our tender sympathy to Mrs. Gibson and the young people, all of whom are devoted friends of the W. C. T. U. We have heard within a week of the death of Rev. Prebendary Grier, one of the finest temperance orators of the time in England, a man so efficient and loyal-hearted that Lady Henry Somerset recently offered him the living at Eastnor, which, although affording an increase of salary and a much more attractive entourage, he declined—an offer which did honor both to himself and his patron—on the ground that he felt he must remain with the collier congregation for whom he had long worked with the most complete devotion.

Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap's mother, Mrs. Torrance, is now ninety-seven years old. She sent her love to every one at the recent memorable convention of the state, and a message of greeting and affection was voted by the convention to this Spartan mother, who has given to the white-ribbon movement one of its greatest leaders.

A pedestrian, heated and tired, entered a village in the byways of Cornwall where he began at once to look for a taproom or some place where he could get strong drink. and finding none he called out impatiently to a passer-by. "You Cornish people are very good, are you not?" The aged villager reverently uncovered his gray locks and answered: "A hundred years ago a man came into these parts; his name was John Wesley."

One Sunday morning recently, Madam Layah Barakat (our white ribbon Syrian), preached at Plymouth church in Portland, Maine. Her subject was the three covenants, and the sermon was one of great power and eloquence. Among her listeners was a woman from a Congregational church without a pastor. She said, "I think our church would better have no more candidates, but at once call Madam Barakat." This was partly in jest and yet it shows how the world moves, for this woman was the daughter of one of Portland's former pastors than whom there was never a more conservative churchman.

On Duty always purposes to do honor to whom honor is due, and the nomination of Major W. H. Upham for governor of Wisconsin by the Republican party is an indication of the uplift which we so much desire in politics, that we should be recreant to our highest convictions if we did not express our sense of appreciation and hope. Besides this we have an especial reason for interest in this action from the fact that Mrs. Upham is the Wisconsin superintendent in the W. C. T. U. of the department of work among lumbermen. She has sent literature and missionaries in an almost endless supply to the various camps of the state, and no other woman has done so much for the boys in camps, probably because no one has had the heart and the purse to forward this beautiful enterprise. Lumber companies have sent her subscriptions and she has been most generous herself.

One of the majestic and beloved figures that all white-ribboners will miss from the National Convention this year will be Mrs. Zerelda Wallace, who writes: "My health is broken and I begin to count the days until my change comes. I have no fears for the future,—my faith grows with my years and intelligence. I have been reading the past week, 'The Ascent of Man' by Drummond. Read it if you have not; it is as beautiful as a poem, fascinating as a romance. How much we owe to science and the investigation of reverent Christian men!"

A wise rector of the Church of England writes that after forty years' experience in the ministry, he has found so great benefits accrue to the members of his flock through women's agency that he gladly does what he can for their advancement, socially and politically. He also says: "In my cathedral choir of seventy voices I have thirty-seven lady choristers, habited in surplice and college cap, and as a consequence the whole tone and standard of the behavior among the choir men and boys have been raised."

Bishop Coxe has said that "although Caiaphas was high priest and the temple with its splendid service and ritual was in full blast, the word of the Lord came to John in the wilderness." We know this is the method always; the new wine of the kingdom is poured into new vessels. Men think there is no turning to the road, but behold, on a sudden it opens upon a wide landscape full of light and welcome. It seems that John preached with such directness that the natural response of the people was, "What shall we do?" If he had made this inquiry of a theological professor he would have had an answer very different from the pointed reply, "If any man hath two coats let him impart to him that hath none; and he that hath to eat in like manner," and to the soldiers, "Do violence to no man." Such a direct reply must have "brought a coldness over the meeting." They doubtless expected to be asked to believe some abstract statement, but they were introduced to a gospel of behaving which must always be the twin of the gospel of believing. John put his finger on the sore spot which was then, as it is now, selfishness.

NORTH CAROLINA.

ANNUAL STATE CONVENTION.

The twelfth annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of this state met at High Point, August 6 and 7, in the M. E. Church south.

About thirty delegates were present and a number of visitors; among them Rachel Marriage of Iowa, and Allen Jay of Indiana; the latter gave a most interesting and enthusiastic address on the first night of the convention.

The convention opened at 10 a. m. on Monday. Mrs. Mary C. Woody, our beloved president, for the first time in these ten years, was absent. Far away in southern California she is slowly regaining her lost health. All felt sad at her absence, and heartfelt, earnest prayers were offered that God would restore her health and bless her abundantly. Mrs. Mary E. Cartland, of Concord, N. C., presided.

The corresponding secretary, Mrs. Sue V. Tomlinson, had a most interesting report, showing great increase in interest and work. A number of new unions have been organized during the year, and a review of the year's labors gave us all great cause for rejoicing.

Temperance is not dead in North Carolina. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is not dead in North Carolina. From the extreme eastern part of the state, down where the waves of the Atlantic make music by night and by day, there came to our convention women representing unions alive to the temperance cause. And from the extreme southwestern part of our state beyond the mountains, the Swananoah and the French Brood, there came a woman whose whole soul is fired with zeal, representing what our corresponding secretary was pleased to term, a model union, and ere long from the east to the west, from the north to the south we hope model unions shall abound to spread the saving knowledge of total abstinence. Surely at the High Point convention much encouragement was gained and much good will result to our cause.

Monday afternoon was filled with reports from different departments and a memorial service to Mrs. Wm. Black, our late superintendent of social purity, conducted by Mrs. F. M. Bumpass, of Greensboro, N. C.

The evening session was filled with addresses of welcome from the town, the churches and the W. C. T. U., and the address of Allen Jay. The response to the welcomes was given by Mrs. Buffom, of Dillsboro. The evening was highly enjoyed by a crowded house.

Tuesday morning's session was full of reports from departments. The two most interesting reports were those on unfermented wine, by Mrs. Ida J. Paylor, of High Point, and Demorest medal contest, by Mrs. Lydia N. Blair, of Guilford College. Both reports were excellent.

The afternoon session was crowded. A number of reports were read, and the secretary of the W. C. T. U. Southern Assembly presented that work and urged the unions to aid in erecting the building, whose foundation is already laid at Waynesville, N. C.

The election of delegates to the National Convention and the place for holding the state convention next year were left in the hands of the executive committee to be decided on hereafter, and the election of officers for the ensuing year followed. It being known that Mrs. Woody expects to remain in California for an unlimited time, the convention unanimously elected as her successor Mrs. Mary E. Cartland, of Concord, one of the pioneers of temperance work in the state, a woman of rich experience and executive ability and thoroughly consecrated to our cause. Mrs. M. E. Craven, of Concord, was elected corresponding secretary; Mrs. N. C. Weatherly, of Greensboro, treasurer, and Miss Mary E. Mendenhall, of Guilford College, recording secretary.

Tuesday evening belonged to the Y's, and was presided over by Miss Annie Petty, of Greensboro, assistant superintendent of Y work. The reports from the different unions were interesting, some of the Y's reading, others giving a verbal report of work accomplished. The program was good, especially the music by Miss Elsie Weatherly and Miss Craven. At the close of the Y exercises the convention joined hands and sang "God be with you till we meet again," followed by the benediction.

Thus ended the twelfth annual convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of North Carolina.

SUMMER WORK.

"The hottest summer for many years," everybody says, and the reports of the weather bureau confirm the opinion, yet the work of the W. C. T. U. goes on. One dear sister in the 11th district writes of their convention: "It was the hottest day of the season, but the sisters showed their zeal and interest in every detail in spite of that scorching wind. This district in its convention showed unmistakable advance, and a fearlessness for equal suffrage and social purity greater than ever before. Our state organizer, Mrs. Ferro, thought it an innovation that the names of so many gentlemen should be on the program of this convention, but the workers thought it a decided advantage and felt greatly encouraged to have our cause so ably defended as it was in a paper by Mr. Bretzke, on the relation of the church to the temperance work, and another by Mr. Stephens on the evolution of woman; also addresses by several ministers, and as a grand finale to the convention, Rev. J. P. Pinkham gave a lecture which did stir up the people, as he showed the righteousness of equal suffrage, the neglect of the church to work heartily for temperance, and the foolishness of standing by party rather than by principle."

The sixth district convention was late in getting its report sent in, and owing to sickness in my own family, this letter has been delayed so that the sisters in that district are no doubt thinking their excellent convention has been passed by in silence. Not so. Miss Hitchcock sent me a report I would fain transfer in full, but space forbids. The attendance was good and interest sustained throughout. The papers were rich in beautiful, helpful thoughts and suggestions, and the seed thus sown will doubtless bring forth abundant fruit. Miss Carrie Holbrook was present throughout and proved an inspiration, always ready with a bright, earnest word. Mrs. Hobart, unable to be present, sent a letter of cheer, strengthening hope and purpose. Mrs. S. J. Heal, state evangelistic superintendent, also sent a letter, emphasizing the need of deeper, more prayerful consecration to God. "The whole of prayer does not consist in taking hold of God, but in holding on." One evening was taken up with a W. C. T. U. symposium—four-minute papers on each of fifteen departments of work. The papers were brief, concise and comprehensive, and awakened much interest. Many who before were uninformed as to the work expressed surprise at the world-wide humanitarian scope of the W. C. T. U. The second evening there was a silver medal contest, "one of the best ever held in the state," was said by an authority in the matter. The medal was awarded to James Beechus, and a second prize given to a young lady who gave a fine rendering of Mrs. Lide Meriwether's address on "National Housekeeping." While the judges were making their decision, Mrs. Lutz, of Wood Lake, took the platform and held the closest attention of the company while she spoke on the subject of woman's suffrage.

The fifth district held its annual convention at Tracy, occupying two days. Each session was well attended, not only ladies, but gentlemen, being present and taking part. The gold medal contest, held the first evening, drew a crowded house. As two of the speakers failed to appear, the medal could not be awarded, but Mrs. Hobart presented Abbie Moses, the successful contestant of the evening, with a silver dollar. All the speakers did well. Many excellent papers were read during the convention, and reports of various departments showed advance along the line. A conspicuous figure of the convention was Mrs. Wilson, of Edgerton. Although seventy-seven years of age, she drove forty miles across the country to attend the convention. One lady speaking of her said: "She looks as though she might have said many of the things written by Josiah Allen's wife." On her birthday in July, the L. T. L., of Edgerton, celebrated it with an entertainment both afternoon and evening, and at the close presented Mrs. Wilson, who organized the band, with a fine album.

Pipestone union feels much encouraged, for temperance sentiment is slowly yet surely gaining ground. Six new members joined the union recently, and one of the newspapers asked for a report of an entertainment. The entertainment, by the way, was one which every union would do well to hold—a reception to the school teachers. The guests began arriving about four o'clock, and, after a time spent in conversation, a cordial address of welcome was given by Mrs. Sybil Montville, followed by an excellent program of papers and music, and remarks from the three ministers present, and also Mrs. Eva E. Williams, of South Dakota. A dainty repast was served, and the guests dispersed at an early hour, no doubt with strengthened respect and regard for the W. C. T. U.

Mrs. Williams, who is superintendent of railway work in South Dakota, lectured in Pipestone two evenings, and at the close of the second lecture organized a Y of fifteen members. That the railroad men appreciate the work of the W. C. T. U. through this lady was evidenced by the fact that nearly all the men of that occupation in Pipestone were present at her lecture, and all were well pleased with it.

The gospel temperance union of Lu Verne lately sent a delegation over to Edgerton, on a Sabbath afternoon, consisting of about thirteen of their workers. A meeting was held in the evening after which one hundred and twelve of the citizens of Edgerton and vicinity signed the pledge and organized themselves into a league with J. P. Ashbaugh, president.

Notes from the seventh district indicate the good work going on. Red Wing union has been instrumental in getting the city council to erect two drinking fountains in the city. They memorialized the city fathers and proposed to erect the fountains if the council would close the saloons. But that honorable body probably preferred to provide the fountains and retain the saloons.

Stanton union recently had the pleasure of being informed that if it were not for the W. C. T. U. there would be a saloon in their midst! Long may they live. This union some time ago secured Rev. J. P. Pinkham to give one of his convincing addresses. The wall pocket in the depot at this place is kept supplied and through the persistent efforts of the energetic president, Mrs. M. H. Dack, the contents are respected and no longer destroyed as heretofore.

Shakopee union has been busy making public sentiment. They have held gospel meetings, two mass-meetings and a concert. The Episcopal clergyman gave a temperance sermon from his pulpit. A Catholic priest from Mankato delivered a fine temperance address in the Catholic church and thirty persons signed the pledge, agreeing to keep it for from three months to two years. The W. C. T. U. hopes to secure the Archbishop's consent to the priest's attendance and participation in the union mass-meeting.

Northfield union, with a provisional president, entertained the county union, and assisted the Prohibition club in defraying the expenses of two fine lectures by Van Bennett, the Kansas Cyclone, accompanied by the Bells Quartette. This union furnishes all the school teachers of the town with the "Monthly Advices."

Willmar has a thousand dollar license to make the saloons "respectable." Yet the brewer called on one of our W. C. T. U. women of that town and offered her ten dollars a year for the privilege of making a back entrance to his saloon across the corner of her lot. He said if he did not get a back entrance to the saloon he feared the proprietor would have to move, for a good many high-toned (!?) men of the village would not go in at the front door. For some time previous, slender men had succeeded in crowding in between the lady's wood-shed and the next building; but after she had painted the wood-shed and a few suits of clothes had been marked, they preferred a larger entrance. Needless to say the request met with an emphatic refusal, so far as the wood-shed and its owner were concerned.

The sixteenth district convention, held in Oneota, gave one afternoon to the Y's, and among the many good things provided by the daughters was a paper on "What the Y's have done," which is very highly spoken of. One morning of the convention was occupied by the L. T. L. bands led by Miss Hollister, who has been doing excellent work among the children, and now has eight companies organized and in a flourishing condition.

Our state convention draws near, will be in session ere this reaches the reader. It is to be held in Minnesota's first Temperance Temple, the property of Windom union, and prayers are going up all over our beautiful state that the presence of the Lord be with us.

ENCOURAGING NEWS.

A live young Y was organized in Sanford by Mrs. C. H. Leffler, last summer, with a membership of twelve, which has increased somewhat. A successful Demorest medal contest was given by them on August 6; and they carried out the plans of Mrs. Fox, our flower mission superintendent, to perfection, distributing one hundred bouquets to prisoners, to saloons, to the sick in the hospital and in private homes, to the bereaved, to the ministers and to the city officials, besides placing a beautiful vase of flowers in the headquarters of the Gate City rifle company, and another at the firemen's headquarters. They are now engaged in securing signers to our pledge to read one leaflet every week, and distributing and collecting these leaflets under the supervision of Mrs. D. C. Robb, superintendent of literature department.

I attended a very spirited and exceedingly interesting gold medal contest in Ocala, on August 9, where the six contestants were all members of the Loyal Temperance Legion, four young ladies and two young gentlemen. While the judges were deciding the momentous question, the state superintendent of narcotics spoke on the popular theme of tobacco. Mrs. Gaffney, of Ocala, is a model L. T. L. superintendent, inspiring her young people with much of her own zeal and consecration to the work.

A barkeeper, whose eight years of residence in Sanford had all been spent in dealing out alcoholic drinks, was a prominent applicant for the office of postmaster, and his application was indorsed by several lawyers and some other influential citizens. His petition was based on his alleged desire to get out of the business, and several indorsers believed in his sincerity. Senator Call, who was the special advocate of this aspirant for federal honors, based his advocacy on the ground that this would be according to "the teachings of Christ." But Christ never taught His disciples to hire men to enter the kingdom of heaven. "If any man will come after me let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me." When Christ pardoned he said: "Go, and sin no more." But Senator Call's new gospel would read: "Assist the penitent by bribing him with a postoffice."

It was in the power of the penitent to prove his sincerity by ceasing to sell intoxicants—a thing he has not yet done. The union of Sanford sent earnest protests against the barkeeper's application to the president of the United States, to the Postmaster General and to the United States senators. Other influential citizens, notably the Rev. Dr. T. W. Moore, also wrote to the authorities setting forth in detail this ambitious barkeeper's history. Our rejoicing was not loud but deep when the proclamation of the postoffice department, that no liquor seller would receive a postmaster's appointment, was published.

The interests of education in Florida have been greatly advanced by the establishment, this year, of five Peabody Summer Training schools at convenient points to include all the public school teachers of the state.

After a preparation which included the writing of a dozen letters, the state superintendent, Mrs. Alice C. Brown, presented the subject of scientific temperance instruction on August 8th to the two normal schools, white and colored, in Ocala; and on August 10, in Bartow, to an assembly of citizens and teachers, white and colored, which had gathered in the court house to hear the State Superintendent of Public Instruction, the Hon. W. N. Sheats, who cordially yielded the first half-hour. She gave a brief history of the inception and progress of this great movement, emphasized the four essentials to its successful teaching, gave many practical hints as to object-lessons, experiments and interesting ways of teaching the subject to pupils of all grades, and kindled the spark of enthusiasm for humanity in many breasts.

This little pilgrimage to these educational shrines was so successful an experiment that she has determined to ask for sufficient time on next year's programs to give some specimen lessons, adapted to the primary, intermediate and high school grades, illustrated by objects and experiments.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

MISS ALICE BRIGGS, office secretary of the World's W. C. T. U., requests that all her mail should be sent to the Temple, Chicago, in place of Evanston, Ill.

MRS. A. P. HAMILTON, Pennsylvania's superintendent of literature, has extended the time for reports for her department to September 29, provided items are sent on postal cards.

THE Central W. C. T. U. of Chicago has opened an employment agency at its Hope mission, 242 West Indiana street. As the object is to help procure good homes and steady work for destitute girls, no fee will be charged the girls, and only a small fee will be required of the ladies employing them.

THE strongest words of praise and gratitude come from Shubuta, Miss., where Mrs. Mary McGee Snell has been holding gospel meetings. An unmistakable evidence of Mrs. Snell's power and consecration is shown by the universal desire for her return to the towns she has previously visited.

THE school of methods at Old Orchard, Me., the last week in August, was most successful. It was managed by Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens. Four countries and thirteen states were represented by those who took part in the meetings. Mrs. Josephine R. Nichols, of Indiana, was one of the speakers. She has spoken at several other points in Maine recently, and everywhere with great satisfaction and profit to her hearers.

MRS. MARY SEYMOUR HOWELL occupies a foremost rank among our womanly women on the platform. She is a National lecturer of the W. C. T. U. and has a wide range, her thoughtful and eloquent addresses being not more acceptable to temperance people and suffragists than to the farmers before whom she often speaks to excellent purpose. Albany, New York, is an address that will always reach her promptly.

THE W. C. T. U. at Fairport, Monroe county, N. Y., is in deep sorrow over the death of their beloved sister, Mrs. E. A. Marring. She was one of the original members seventeen years ago, and from that time until a month before her death was one of the most earnest and efficient workers, wise in counsel, zealous for souls, fervent in prayer, constant in good works. About forty members of the union attended the funeral in a body.

MRS. HELEN M. BARKER'S itinerary in the East is as follows: Maine state convention, Auburn, September 26; East Greenwich, R. I., September 30; Rhode Island state convention at Wakefield, October 2; Newport, R. I., October 4; Southridge, Mass., October 7 or 8; Westminster, Mass., October 14; and Massachusetts state convention at Fitchburg, October 16. Mrs. Barker can put in a few more dates in Rhode Island and Massachusetts and would be glad to have her time all filled, between the state conventions. Any union wishing a date will please apply to Mrs. M. B. Horning, The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

MRS. CHIKA SAKURAI, who came to this country last October and represented the Japan W. C. T. U. in the World's Convention, has been spending a month in Maine. Mrs. Stevens writes: "Although August was an inopportune time for many meetings, I was able to open the way in several places for this remarkable woman to tell her interesting story. She won many friends and secured several valuable pledges for her work. At Old Orchard she was most warmly received and spoke in good English in a voice which was easily heard in the grove as well as in the tabernacle. Local unions can make no mistake in planning for her an evening meeting. They will receive in blessing more than they give in money. Her mission is one which shoull appeal to all white-ribboners. Her pretty costumes, her winsome manner, and above all her beautiful consecration to her chosen work for humanity and Christianity render her a most delightful person to have in one's home or community."

MISS ELIZABETH U. YATES, lecturer for the franchise department, is engaged in campaign work in Kansas. She will be glad to make engagements en route to Cleveland, O., from November 6 to 16, and may be addressed at 23 Columbian building, Topeka, Kan. Miss Yates writes: "I am glad to say that the prospect of a majority for the amendment is good. The political kaleidoscope is changing in our favor, and by election day we may expect the support of people and politicians as well."

Official Communications.

YOUNG WOMAN'S BRANCH.

DEAR W'S AND Y'S:—Pursuant to the timely editorial in THE UNION SIGNAL of September 13, we send the following, taken from a letter already prepared to be sent to state presidents, organizers and secretaries:

Four years ago a special effort was made by the Young Woman's Branch of the National W. C. T. U. to direct the attention of the pupils in schools and colleges to the subject of temperance by means of a petition asking students, teachers and professors to banish all alcoholic beverages from class suppers, alumni dinners, etc., since which time various influences have, we believe, produced a continued interest, crystallizing in some institutions in organizations of different names.

But when we think of the vast numbers of young people in the halls of learning throughout the land, whose characters are being formed for life, whose minds are being trained for action in the world, and who have not yet deeply considered or adequately studied one of the most important questions which they will have to meet and about which, in some form or other, they must sooner or later take sides, we feel an increased desire to have presented to them the "living issue" of temperance with all which that grand old word comprehends in our day.

We believe no other organization better understands the scope and practical methods required than the Woman's Christian Temperance Union with its "do-everything" policy.

The Young Woman's Branch with its honorary membership of young men is preëminently fitted to gain the coöperation of both sexes and to hold a prominent place among the college societies. On the other hand, all active, far-seeing white-ribboners must realize the importance of enlisting this army of trained young workers.

Knowing from experience that one of the difficulties in reaching the young people in schools and colleges as well as in having the interest formulated into a union and continued from year to year, lies in the indifference and sometimes prejudice of presidents, professors and teachers, at our request Miss Willard, Lady Henry Somerset and Mrs. Mary H. Hunt have prepared a letter to be sent either directly to schools and colleges or to be presented by some member of the W. C. T. U. or Y. W. C. T. U., hoping it will open the way for the further reception of the subject either by an address from an acceptable speaker or documents relative to organization. This plan is undertaken not as a temporary item of work but with an earnest desire to have it faithfully carried out until our white ribbon shall be the ensign of a clear brain and responsive heart to the mind of every well educated young man and woman who shall, by joining a Y, accept the opportunity and responsibility of their generation.

Yours to enlist trained forces,
FRANCES J. BARNES,
Gen'l Sec. of Y Branch.
146 W. 103d St., New York City.

DEPARTMENT OF ALMSHOUSE WORK.

In addition to blanks sent out I would urge all local workers in any state where this department is not duplicated to send address for blanks or report immediately, that they may receive credit for the same, or any state superintendent who has been omitted in the distribution.

It is a source of regret that some states are so slow to take up this department. Should the coming year prove one of financial depression many worthy people will be obliged to take refuge in our almshouses through the winter months. Christian visitation, words of cheer and comfort may prevent them from falling into that despondent, dispirited state so often found in these unfortunates. I will be glad to send, free, to any worker living in the vicinity of such an institution upon receipt of address, leaflets of suggestions for carrying on the work.

It seems like a little thing to gather up back numbers of Sabbath-school and other papers for distribution. In almost every Sabbath-school there are cast-off books, that with a little repairing could serve a second term of usefulness in the neighboring poor-house. It is a mistake to think these people are all ignorant and degraded. Many have had early advantages for culture and education. Who can estimate the good that may come to them by reason of this companionship with the noble and good? Care should be taken in selecting the literature for those who need uplifting toward a better life by every means possible. Bright papers are a joy to them, no matter how old the date. I hope many will be induced to take up this pressing work the coming winter.

SARAH MORRISON,
Nat'l Supt.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

COOPER'S ORATORICAL BUREAU FOR WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Woman's Suffrage Workers of our Land:

About nine months ago I published my first volume of recitations on woman's suffrage, of one thousand copies. That edition will soon be exhausted, and the demand for books and medals is constantly increasing. Letters of inquiry from Canada and New Brunswick encourages me to push the work into the regions beyond. I desire my second edition to be from the pens of the women of to-day, written so as to meet the demands of the hour. I wish the recitations to contain about six hundred words, composed for the platform speaker. Each recitation shall bear the name of the writer. Every recitation shall go to the press as it comes from the writer. I solicit recitations, as above described, from women all over the land, and if there should be more recitations than I need I will return manuscripts or save them for a future edition. Please write and forward to me at Jerseyville, Ill., at once.

Under the new excise law the saloons of New York city were closed last Sunday during the entire day. In defiance of the order, many keepers attempted to open their saloons, but in every case were promptly arrested by the alert police.

Most of the members of the Peary expedition, including Mrs. Peary, have returned to Philadelphia on the Falcon. Complaints are made by some of the number regarding the lieutenant's management of the trip, all of which are denied by Mrs. Peary.

KANSAS' state president, Mrs. L. B. Smith, writes: "We have been and are working for the increase in the circulation of THE UNION SIGNAL. It is the 'arm of the service' that strengthens and supports every line of temperance effort." We like that kind of a testimony, for we strive to be of genuine service to the W. C. T. U.

AN unavoidable delay in preparing the marble pedestal for the little bronze girl prevented the dedication of Willard fountain September 28, as so long planned. Miss Gordon, who has had the entire matter in charge, was greatly disappointed, but as she is not a stone cutter or a mason herself, she could not expedite the preparations. Yet as there is seldom loss without compensating gain, the date now fixed for the unveiling and dedication is even more auspicious than the original one, as it will be immediately after the National Convention, when large numbers of women will be passing through Chicago en route to their homes and can witness and participate in the exercises. Then the added attraction of Lady Henry Somerset's presence and assistance is promised at that time. Let not the children despair; their beautiful fountain will soon stand at the entrance to Willard Hall—the first children's fountain in Chicago.

CHICAGO is to have a veritable Temperance Day—an organization of the entire temperance forces of the city for a great public demonstration on Father Mathew's birthday, October 10. It is refreshing to read in the announcement this paragraph: "The Catholic priests, the ministers of the various Protestant denominations, and the representatives of the ancient Hebrew faith will be seen side by side, joining hands and forces to promote the cause of temperance reform, and to aid in arresting the ravages of the drink plague." It has been decided to close the public schools upon the afternoon of October 10, that the pupils may take a place in the great street parade, and it is estimated that fifty thousand children will be in line. The evening exercises will be held in the Auditorium, and seats are now on sale at the box office. To the keen regret of every one concerned, and herself as well, Miss Willard finds it impossible to be present on this occasion, as announced. Her series of engagements for state conventions will employ her time during October. She is in attendance this week upon the Iowa state convention.

MR. ORRINGTON LUNT, the leading Methodist layman of the West, has given a beautiful library building to the Northwestern University at Evanston, the chief suburb of Chicago. Last week the opening ceremonies were signalized by an address by Justin Winsor, LL. D., Librarian of Harvard University. Among other things he said that since the days of Gutenberg about three million books have been printed; that the British Museum contains two millions; but our new congressional library in Washington is the largest in the world, being able, by the new methods of utilizing space for shelfage, to accommodate from ten to twelve million volumes! He said the library of a university should be to it what the dining room ought to be to the house—a place of brightness, good cheer, good food, good appetite. He might have added that the library of a home should be to the higher natures of its inmates what such a dining room is to their perishable part, and that "mother and the girls" should be as fond of it and as much fed there as "father and the boys." But though he spoke nobly and well in other respects, his frequent allusions to "educated gentlemen" and his omission to allude to woman as a creature with a head on her shoulders, did scant justice to the great audience made up in larger part of women, with trustees, professors and students of the gentler sex sitting meekly by to listen to the great man from Alice Freeman Palmer's town and Alice Longfellow's, Mrs. Louis Agassiz' and that of the "Annex" where women take prizes in classics, mathematics and whatever else is going. But then good Justin Winsor is of the old régime.

DR. NORMAN BRIDGE created a deserved sensation in a mothers' kindergarten meeting in Chicago last week by advocating the use of alcohol in children's emergency cases and recommending candy as a more nutritious diet than fruit for children. As this was a general convocation, attended by intelligent women from all sections of the country, such an advocacy could not be passed in silence, hence, despite the displeasure of the chairman, an animated protest was entered. Dr. Norman Bridge is respectfully recommended to the scientific utterances of Dr. Norman Kerr, of England, on this point.

ONE of the established features of our National Convention each year is the Daily Union Signal. So permanent has this publication become that many friends have anticipated the regular announcement this fall by sending in their subscriptions. As many special features have occupied our space during the last few weeks the Daily has not received the attention that it deserves. But it has spoken for itself so many years that we scarcely need do more than announce its coming. This volume will be the ninth, and true to the ratio of improvement, it will be the best yet issued. It may not have as exquisite a dress as it received during the World's Fair year at the Chicago convention, but its contents will be not one whit less valuable. The subscription price will be, as usual, twenty-five cents, and the only way to secure its daily mailing to your home or Convention address is to send your order at once, as all wrappers are written in our home office in the order in which they are received, and names cannot be registered after November 10. We want a list of ten thousand this year and expect to get it. Fill out the coupon on the inside cover page and forward with the twenty-five cents to this office.

So tender is the tribute paid our Chieftain in this letter from Mrs. Edgett, that we cannot forbear giving it to our readers: "Early Friday morning, September 21, Miss Willard arrived in her native town, Churchville, Monroe county, N. Y., and drove some two or three miles to the home of the only surviving sister of her mother, Mrs. Sarah Hill, about ninety-two years of age, where occurred a most tender and touching interview of several hours. Returning to the village and dining with her cousin, Mrs. Dusenbury, a little time was given to visiting with kindred, and then at the home of Mrs. F. N. Parish, president of Monroe county W. C. T. U., she with Miss Gordon graced the reception given in her honor by the W. C. T. U. ladies of Churchville and vicinity. Thus on the loveliest of early autumn days, the beautifully decorated house was filled with Christian women and a few gentlemen wearing the white ribbon. Guests to the number of more than two hundred and from many states thronged the rooms and lawns, gladly greeting our distinguished leader. These, very many of them childhood friends, and not a few relatives of Miss Willard, gathered and enjoyed with delightful informality the consecrated hour that so quickly etched for each one present a life-long precious memory. It was sweet to see Miss Willard so little changed in her simple, unaffected, cordial manner and speech, by her sojourn in foreign lands, and to find fewer traces of her long illness than we had feared. She was pale, and evidently still not strong, but there was the same fitting cheery word for all, the same absolutely natural air in all her ways, that is ever one of the many charms of her presence. Miss Gordon had loving greeting for her own sake, and for the grand special work she had done. At 7 p. m. after a quiet supper with her beloved hostess, Mrs. Parish, the friend of many years, Miss Willard took the train for Evanston, followed by such love and prayers from Christian women's hearts, as perhaps never blessed the going out and coming in of any one woman in the world's history."

WHITE ROSES.

BY FRED WOOSTER OWEN, M. D.

Oh, roses white, your wearers, all,
On freedom's skirmish-line are fighting,
Till "rum" shall read upon the wall
Of doom, the Saviour's own handwriting.

Comrades, from Texas and from Maine,
And from the lakes of Louisiana,
They cheer and charge, and charge again,
Beneath our Prohibition banner.

Twine, with a ribbon white, our rose,
Ye women, full of faith and daring,
That, when these "cruel wars" shall close,
Both in their triumphs may be sharing.

THE LONDON WORK OF MRS. BRAMWELL BOOTH.

II.

BY COL. ADELAIDE COX.

One has instinctively the desire to sugar-coat the name of statistics, for fear that people should refuse to consider them and always remain under the impression that they are dry and uninteresting. The fact is, that if given a fair chance to speak in their own behalf, statistics can prove themselves to be a sort of condensed oxygen, possessing all kinds of invigorating and inspiring qualities. Just try a few, not all at once if you are not accustomed to them, but in homœopathic doses.

LONDON SALVATION ARMY.

1. Number of homes, 13; through which there have passed, since the founding of the work, 10,363 fallen women.
2. Of this number there have passed through the homes since the inauguration of the Darkest England scheme, 5,235; of whom there were rescued from a life of prostitution on the streets and in brothels, 2,605: of those who were living in immorality, but not on the streets, there were 1,619; maternity and special cases amounted to 1,011.
3. Of the above total (5,235), there were: Habitual drunkards, or heavy drinkers, 1,081; women who had been in prison. 698: with a total number of commitments of 2,278. Of the 698 women who had been imprisoned, 407 were known to be thieves, and there were sentenced for criminal offences, 395.
4. The 5,235 have been disposed of as follows: Number sent to situations, 2,636; number restored to friends, 761; to trades, 44; married, emigrated, died. or other satisfactory cases, including those sent to other homes, and special cases, 621; or in other words, 78 per cent of satisfactory cases.
5. Dismissed, and otherwise unsatisfactory, 1,173.
6. Of the satisfactory cases there have been, after the lapse of an average of three years, in situations earning their living, 42 per cent.; with relatives and friends, 28 per cent.; married, dead, and otherwise satisfactory, 15 per cent.; permanently satisfactory, 85 per cent.
7. Equally marvellous is the average cost of each woman—after providing for rents of buildings and all management expenses (nearly £2,000 per annum)—which amounts only to £3 4s. 6d.
8. Then, by means of the Help and Inquiry Department, there were applications for inquiries for lost persons, 10,958; of whom 3,229 were found.

The figures with respect to the Women's Shelter and Metropole, the Women's Labor Bureau, and the factories were equally interesting and astounding.

These figures speak for themselves. They can do it, and they shall have the chance. If any outside suggestion be needed, it would be simply this, read the statistics over again and listen more carefully for the message that they have to give.

The last door on the left at Army Headquarters leads into a very small room that serves a very big and a double purpose. Primarily it is the postoffice where all the letters that come in areentered in one large book and all that go out in another, where telegrams are registered and postage stamps guarded with watchful care. But it serves also as a sort of entrance lodge to the regions beyond, and all those that want to speak with Mrs. Booth or her chief secretary, Colonel Cox, are politely requested—in writing—to "inquire at the door on the left." Mrs. Booth can be seen when it is necessary, and sometimes is seen when it isn't, but visitors' business can usually be attended to with the most satisfactory results to all concerned, by having it handed over at once to the heads of the various departments.

Across the corridor and down it there is a little office that manages the Salvation Army steam laundry, the adoption of children, the finding of nursing mothers, that arranges for all the special meetings and all the special collections, that does anything and everything which comes along. The army has as yet no home for destitute children, and adoptions are rare, but—as Adjutant Harvey said: "We do the best that we can, and it practically amounts to this, that no child we know of is left absolutely to the mercy of the workhouse."

There was one very funny case, that of Dorothy, aged five, who arrived at Paddington Station with a card around her neck, addressed to General Booth. Closer investigation showed a letter which said that the writer was in utter despair, and knowing General Booth to be a good man, had decided to send the child to him. Dorothy said that "Aunty" had put her on the train, and that was all she seemed to know. But "Aunty" is a term indefinite enough to baffle even the ingenuity of the inquiry department, and Dorothy's relatives were never found. She was taken from the station to the workhouse, and a letter written to the General telling of the fact and the manner of her arrival; there was, of course, no legal claim upon him, but Mrs. Bramwell Booth interested herself in the case, and a home was found for the little wanderer.

The finding of nursing mothers is only one of the side issues, but it is an important one. It would be almost impossible to find situations for the women if it were not for this department, as, unfortunately, the positions that require the presence and assistance of very small babies are exceedingly limited. But Adjutant Harvey inserts an advertisement in the War Cry, and receives answers from many good women, usually Salvationists, who are unable to help the rescue work financially, but who are glad to do what they can, and therefore take the babies for less than any one else would do it. Occasionally it is done for nothing, but this is rarely considered advisable, as the sense of responsibility often develops the mother-love that is sometimes rather too latent. In a number of cases this arrangement has led to the adoption of the children and to their being freed forever from that sense of being outcasts, which has embittered so many young lives.

The registry office is a useful auxiliary. The fee for mistresses is only three shillings, and for servants with low wages, nothing at all. However, those that receive more than £12 a year, which will seem very little indeed, especially in comparison with American wages, and which is yet the rate with which most of the rescue girls have to begin—those receiving more than this amount are expected to pay a fee of sixpence.

A letter has just been received from a lady who has had one of our girls in her service for over two years. But the old complaint that "a really good servant always has to go off and get married" is heard on this side of the Atlantic quite as frequently as on the other, and the good Jane has decided to leave the home of her mistress for one of her own. Her mistress is in despair, but thinks that her best chances lie in the little office that first put her in connection with the inconsiderate Jane, and so she writes for "another one just like her."

. . . . . .

When Mrs. Bramwell Booth's office was being furnished in the little Whitechapel Home which was the nucleus of the whole department of the Women's Social Work, a statement of the things that would be needed was laid before her. With one exception the list was satisfactory, but at having an office carpet Mrs. Booth drew the line.

"But there must be one in the house," persisted an officer. "You seem to forget that we are supposed to turn out girls who are able to do general housework, and how can we teach them to sweep without a carpet?"

The argument won the point, and Mrs. Booth's office was carpeted, but from that day to this the furnishing of the offices and of the homes has been conducted upon the what-can-be-done-without principle.

The newly established Piccadilly Home, so called not because of being near Piccadilly, but because it is in the closest connection with the midnight work that centres around that "circus," seems in many ways to deserve the name given it by a girl who walked home with two of the officers one night, or rather one morning at a little before three. "It is like a little heaven in the midst of hell," she said, and she was a girl who knew the neighborhood well. Tolmers Square contains about twenty-four houses, of which only three are not houses of ill-fame. Isn't there cause enough for having one of those three the Salvation Army Rescue Home?

This midnight work is in some respects the saddest and in other ways the most glorious of all the branches of rescue work. Every night except Sunday two women officers in full uniform walk from twelve to two, in and out among the crowds that throng this headquarters of London's immorality, speaking to the girls who will talk to them, distributing papers, giving invitations to call and have a cup of tea at the Home, asking permission to visit the girls where they live, in fact, doing anything and everything that human love or the spirit of God can suggest, to prove to these unhappy women, to these outcasts from all other respectable society, that Salvationists are, indeed, their friends. It is a work that would be discouraging, almost overwhelming to any one who did not recognize, in the first place, the tremendous power that evil has in its strongholds, and in the second place, the even greater strength of the Lord of Hosts. Nothing is ever gained by underestimating the force against which one has to fight; some people do this, but they are very few when compared to the numbers who forget that "one with God is a majority."

BISHOP VINCENT VERSUS EQUAL SUFFRAGE.

V.

BY ALICE STONE BLACKWELL.

(Concluded.)

Mrs. Livermore says that just as in normal vision we need two eyes in order to get a correct perspective, so in legislation we need to have both the masculine and the feminine points of view represented in order to arrive at a just result. It is a recognized fact that every great class in the community needs the ballot in order to represent its own specific interests. The farmers need it in order to represent the agricultural interests, the manufacturers in order to represent the manufacturing interests, and just so the mothers and home-makers need it in order to represent the interests of the home. If any one thinks these interests are adequately represented already, let him look at some of the laws on our statute books—for instance, the laws relating to the "age of consent."

Bishop Vincent says woman's influence is enormous, and "if she use it wisely, she needs no additional power." A growing number of the wisest and most successful mothers think otherwise. Mrs. Zerelda G. Wallace, for instance, points out that a mother must always be at a disadvantage in training her children so long as she has no voice in determining the environment which shall surround her home. She says:

> The mother tries to teach her boy that he must be pure and temperate and honorable. That boy goes out from his mother, and the first thing he meets with neutralizes and gives the lie to all his mother's teachings. He says to himself, "Why, mother says so and so," but he finds men in high places violating all those teachings and he begins to conclude that his mother does not know much about it. From that minute that boy discounts his mother's judgment, and though she must still have a hold on his affections, she does not have a hold upon him in any other way. There is where you wrong us, gentlemen, and cripple us in training men who will make the statesmen of this nation.

Bishop Vincent says: "Her womanly weight, now without measure, will be limited to the value of a single ballot, and her control over from two to five additional votes forfeited." Has Florence Nightingale's "womanly weight" in the world been "limited to a single ballot," because she lives in a country where women can vote? Take the case of any woman whose goodness and force of character enable her now to control from two to five votes; can any one seriously suppose that her personality would lose all its power if she were recognized by law as worthy of having her opinion counted? Whatever means of influence upon public affairs a woman has now, by persuasion, force of personal character, etc., she would have still; and she would have this other very potent means in addition. Indeed, a woman's indirect influence would be strengthened rather than weakened by the franchise. Henry Ward Beecher said:

> While woman is excluded with contempt from political duties, her advice and influence at home must always be at the minimum. If once she began to accept public patriotic duties, she then would exert a tenfold indirect influence at home. But now, men take it for granted that women know nothing of public affairs, and that all their suggestions must, of course, be the result of an ignorant simplicity. A woman is not made a safe adviser by being kept at home in ignorance of all public affairs; and, if she informs herself intelligently, then why should she not act just as much as a man? It is amusing to hear men when pressed upon this point, enlarging upon the silent influence of woman, upon the sweetening home affections, upon their bland and gentle restraints or excitements, and declaring a woman's home to be the only appropriate sphere of political influence; but the moment she takes him at his word, and endeavors to incline husband or brother to any political conduct, they turn with lordly authority upon her, saying, "My dear, your proper duties are in the nursery and kitchen. What do you understand of public affairs?"

Bishop Vincent says: "The curse of America to-day is in the dominated partisan vote—the vote of ignorance and superstition"; and he objects to doubling this vote. As for "the dominated partisan vote," there is abundant testimony from Wyoming, from men of both parties, that women are less dominated by party bias than men, and are more apt to vote for the best man, irrespective of party. As for doubling the ignorant vote, the educated vote would be doubled as well as the ignorant vote, while the vicious vote would be largely decreased in proportion. This would be the case even if women were enfranchised on the same lax terms as men have been. But the tendency is more and more to ask for woman suffrage with an educational qualification. This would double the intelligent vote without adding to the ignorant vote; and it seems to many to be the only way out of the difficulties in which our large ignorant vote has already involved us.

Bishop Vincent says that if women stand outside politics, "the best women may exert a conservative and moral influence over men as voters." The best women might be expected to exert a conservative and moral influence, whether inside or outside; and their influence would be felt more strongly inside at close range than when they are debarred from any direct voice in deciding what shall be done.

Bishop Vincent says: "Force her down into the same bad atmosphere, and both men and women must suffer incalculable loss." The atmosphere of politics depends upon the character of those who take part in politics. The atmosphere of any place where good women mingle on equal terms with men is generally better than that of places where men congregate by themselves. Frances

Willard aptly likens it to the atmosphere of an ordinary car as compared with that of a smoking car. George William Curtis said many years ago:

I am asked, "Would you drag women down into the mire of politics? No, sir, I would have them lift us out of it. The science of government is not an ignoble science, and the practice of politics is not necessarily mean and degrading. . . . How can we purify them? Is there no radical method, no force yet untried, a power not only of skillful checks, which I do not undervalue, but of controlling character? Mr. Chairman, if we sat in this chamber with closed windows until the air became thick and fetid, should we not be fools if we brought in deodorizers—if we sprinkled chloride of lime and burned asafœtida, while we disdained the great purifier? If we would cleanse the foul chamber let us throw the windows wide open, and the sweet summer air would sweep all impurity away and fill our lungs with fresher life. If we would purge politics, let us turn upon them the great stream of the purest human influence we know."

Bishop Vincent says: "We know what woman can be in the commune, in riots and on the rostrum." What has that to do with the question? Every one knows that bad women can behave very badly. But there is no evidence that most women are bad or that women will behave worse with suffrage than without it. The women who took part in the riots of the commune lived in a country where women had for ages been carefully debarred from every shred of direct political power. Generally speaking, women have conducted themselves better or worse in public affairs just in proportion to their training, experience and recognized responsibility. Bishop Vincent mentions the "rostrum" as if public speaking by women were analogous to their taking part in a riot. To argue that all women should be disbarred from suffrage because some women have joined with men in rioting, is as reasonable as it would be to prohibit all women from speaking because some women who speak in public, like some men, do not speak to edification.

Bishop Vincent says: "Woman can, through the votes of men, have every right to which she is entitled. All she has, man has gladly given her." It is possible for women to get many bad laws amended without voting. It is also possible to get from Boston to San Francisco by going around Cape Horn. But if women were forbidden to use the railroad across the continent, and complained of the injustice, it would be no answer to tell them that they could reach their destination just as well by the indirect route. The last persons to say so would be the old sea captains who had made many voyages around the Cape. The experienced men and women who have labored for years to secure our present improved laws for women are not found declaring that women can get everything they ought to have just as well by indirect influence. Samuel E. Sewall, who did more than any one lawyer to liberalize the laws of Massachusetts in regard to women, often testified that it was a much longer, slower and more difficult process, simply because the desired changes were in the interest of a disfranchised class. Moreover, each of these gains, instead of being conceded promptly and "gladly," was won only after a hard fight, and after the very same arguments had been lavishly urged against it that are now urged by Bishop Vincent against equal suffrage. What was true in the past is true of the changes still to be made. But, even if every other legal injustice had been removed, the exclusion of women from suffrage would be a fundamental injustice still. To see this, it is only necessary to imagine the case reversed. Suppose men had equal legal rights with women in every other respect, but were excluded from all voice in deciding what should be the laws or who the law-makers. Would not this exclusion be in itself a grave injustice? Would Bishop Vincent like to occupy such a position? If not, let him apply the Golden Rule.

THE LIFE OF HENRIETTE RENAN.

BY BILLA NORTON.

Mr. Tyndall, in his very sympathetic and vivid essay on Thomas Carlyle published in "New Fragments," relates one of their rambles over English pastures and a conversation with Carlyle in a wood when surrounded by storm. The great man had been complaining of the "collapse of religious feeling in England," and Mr. Tyndall replied sententiously: "As regards the most earnest and most capable of the men of a generation younger than your own, if one writer more than another has been influential in loosing them from their theological moorings, thou art the man."

What could describe more accurately M. Renan's relation to a generation younger than his own in France? Both of these intellectual leaders, different as they were in mind, character and work, had a few qualities strikingly alike. Both were sincere and faithful in friendship; both were capable of gratitude and self-reproachful tenderness for the woman who sacrificed so generously to them, as sister and wife.

The before unpublished life of the sister of Ernest Renan has just been brought out in Paris. Several years ago we had the pleasure of making notes from the manuscript which now bring back something of the charm and originality of this posthumous volume. This book is the debt of one life to another told in an almost naïve manner which this most erudite and polished writer used at times so effectively. There is something of the delicacy and unworldliness of a primitive age in these pages which suggest, even though written by a skeptic, the depth of feeling and the penetrating repose of a character inheriting the absolute faith of generations of Breton ancestors.

There is nothing new in the motif of this story; obscure devotion to a high ideal, self-renunciation to one who is loved more than self, are not unique in biography or history. Who does not know the life of Eugénie de Guérin? Greater in its heroic quality is this account of one who had no background of chateau and ancient family pride, no foreground of appreciative friends and intelligent admirers to stimulate her enthusiasm and give charm to her self-effacement. It was not much to renounce, perhaps, the simple Brittany life with its poverty and seclusion, but to a woman like Henriette Renan the meditative beauty, the homely duties and primitive joys of her home were dearer than any other.

This alluring retirement and an honorable marriage the sister left to teach in a boarding school, that she might educate her brother. What could be more realistic than the reproduction of her life there, life which had more than its share of teacher's martyrdom without its halo of popularity. The quiet figure in the plainest of plain gowns; the soul, lofty and unworldly as a Puritan's; the mind, brilliant, acute, original, found only self-repression possible in such an atmosphere, and struggled on, companionless, until her task was done.

Renan finished his theological studies, and decided that to be sincere he must leave the church. This was the great crisis in these two lives. But the woman did not fail, though the change of faith meant hardship, and, more bitter still, the end of her dreams. "Courage and love" was her motto, and there, in the bare apartment near the Val de Grâce, Henriette Renan applied both to an existence serene and monotonous. She was housekeeper and literary critic as well. To her faultless taste is owed the limpid and chaste style of Renan's flawless prose. Step by step the sister followed the brother in his doubts and questionings. "She was a part of my intelligence," so he writes of her.

No words could be more delicate than those in which the man's heart expresses all its subtle appreciation of the woman's sorrow when she was no longer first to this idolized brother. Dearly as this splendid nature loved the gifted daughter of Ary Schaeffer, life was never to be the same to her again; the magic union was forever broken.

In these rooms near the Val de Grâce was conceived the "Vie de Jesus," and in the last months of this heroic life brother and sister walked side by side through Palestine discussing the materials for the book. Never did the delicate and fatigued Henriette lose her enthusiasm, or leave Ernest to his indefatigable researches alone. They were both attacked by a malignant fever, and in the far-away land of Syria Henriette Renan was buried.

To our mind the sublimest tribute which it is possible to give any human life is in these words,—the words majestic as those of the ancient writers the scholar loved so well: "In this life all is but symbol and image. The part which is truly eternal in each are his relations to the Infinite. It is in the thought of God that man is immortal. It is there that Henriette, forever radiant, forever sinless, lives a thousand times more really than when she struggled with her weak energies to upbuild her spiritual being and than when thrown upon a world which could not understand her, she obstinately sought for perfection. Let her memory be to us a precious argument for those eternal truths which every virtuous life contributes to demonstrate. For myself I have never doubted the reality of the moral order, but I see now with evidence that all the logic of the system of the universe would be overthrown if such lives were but deceptions and illusions."

The goodness of the sister made the brother, the most original and erudite of modern skeptics, all but sure of God and immortality.

SOME OF OUR WOMEN.

V.

Rhoda Anna Esmond.

BY ROSALIA BENNETT BROWN.

One by one many of those who so wisely planned the early organized work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of this country are leaving us. There were twelve hundred members in about twenty-five W. C. T. U's in the year 1874 in the state of New York, when a call was sent out for a state convention to be held in Syracuse. This was signed by five officers of the local union of the city, one being Mrs. Joseph Esmond.

Mrs. Esmond had helped to organize a large local union, and from that time until August 8, 1894, a great share of her thought, time and strength had been given to the work. Occasionally, obliged by lack of strength to partially rest, she was soon planning again, settling vexed questions, deciding the merits of causes, and never afraid to vote or stand alone, if her convictions thus led her, nor would apologize for her sense of duty. She was at one time chairman of the state executive board, three times a delegate to the National Convention, chosen in 1881 state superintendent of the department of unfermented wine, and in 1887 made National superintendent of the same. Beside doing local work, her pen was driven with the energy of a physically strong woman. Her early articles for newspapers were signed with the nom de plume, "Ruth." Her portrait and a short sketch of her life has a place in "The Women of the Century," edited by Frances E. Willard and Mary A. Livermore.

Her three sons found in her a companion at all times, a trusted adviser as well as mother. Like us she was not perfect, but the courage, the perseverance, the good judgment displayed by Rhoda Anna Esmond will be greatly missed by those who have stood with her in this work. Born in 1840, she had seen the many successes and reverses of the temperance cause. Who can estimate the amount of fermented wine banished from the Lord's table in the states and territories, especially the Empire state, through her influence?

The tired frame is at rest, but the life goes on untrammeled. Those who lighted the Crusade fires are journeying fast toward the Unseen Land.

Other standard-bearers must press to the front, for in the midst of the battle her eyes have opened to another day than ours. We must grasp the shuttle her weary hands let fall, and send it back and forth, weaving this temperance web, putting in as she did, such material as shall be enduring, and creating the ever new.

SOMETHING GOOD TO THINK ABOUT.

BY J. HAGERTY.

To live, to labor, to freely exchange and peaceably enjoy the results of his labor are the natural, inalienable rights of man. The sole legitimate function of government is to secure these rights to every citizen, and all laws or customs which limit or infringe them should be abolished without compromise or delay.

Under all forms of government the ultimate power lies with the masses. This truth rings out with equal clearness in the old Celtic formula, "We who are greater than you choose you for our king if you will obey our laws; otherwise not;" and in the Muscovite maxim, "One God in heaven, one czar on earth."

It is not kings, nor aristocracies, nor landlords, nor capitalists that anywhere enslave the people. It is their own ignorance. Most clear is this so where government rests on universal suffrage. The workingmen of the United States may mold to their will legislatures, courts and constitutions. But what avails this? The little finger of aggregated capital must be stronger than the loins of the laboring masses so long as they do not know how to use their power at the primaries.

Since there can be no freedom of exchange while taxes are laid upon the commodities offered by the citizens of other countries in exchange for the products of our shops, mines and farms, we should demand the abolition of the tariff. Let there be free trade with all the world.

Since there can be no freedom of exchange while the medium of exchange is a commodity owned and controlled by a few citizens, we should demand the demonetization of both gold and silver, and in lieu thereof, paper money be issued by the general government, the same to be a full legal tender, receivable for all dues and taxes; no money to be issued by the government except in payment for services actually performed or for materials furnished to the government.

Since there can be no equal freedom of exchange while the highways of the country are owned and operated for the benefit of private individuals, we should favor public ownership of all public ways for the transportation of persons and property and for the transmission of intelligence. And we should insist that each municipality shall own and maintain all public ways, including street car lines, light and water supplies and all other things requiring the common use of such public ways.

Since there can be no equal right to live, labor and enjoy the products of labor while the land (from which everything is produced) is the private property of a few, and all others live or labor on the earth only by the purchased permission of the owners thereof, we should demand that all public revenues be raised by a single tax on the value of land exclusive of its improvements, to the end that all may share equally in that value which attaches to land by reason of the advancement of civilization; that government may be simplified, land monopoly and land speculation destroyed and humanity restored to that unity of interest and equality of opportunity in the material universe which alone can bring peace on earth and good will to men.

Admitting that there must always be natural inequalities in the abilities and conditions of individuals, we should seek to abolish the unnatural advantages which some citizens have over others by reason of unwise laws, especially in the land which is our common heritage, that all may be equally free.

Justice demands: Equal suffrage for men and women; proportional representation; local self-government—home rule; the initiative and referendum; the election of senators by the people; the election of postmasters by the people of the localities in which they are to serve.

Give men and women their natural equal rights and there will be few or no drunkards or fallen women.

A Bird's-eye View of the Republican Convention of New York.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Having heard all her life of the Republican party in this country as the Yankee parallel to the Liberal party of which she is an ornamental member in her own, Lady Henry Somerset desired to be present at one of its representative conventions. As her hostess I wished to aid and abet her in this enterprise, remembering with what goodwill she carried out similar ones for me in London; and so it came about that our English comrade appeared on the scene, accompanied by Anna Gordon and me,—and all of us were conducted to seats on the platform of Saratoga's great "convention hall" by Susan B. Anthony, Mrs. Jean Brooks Greenleaf and Mollie Hay, who had secured us tickets.

Many other ladies were on the platform and in the galleries; the hall (which holds five thousand) was comfortably filled. Its horseshoe shape and acoustic properties were satisfying to eye and ear, but the decorations were meager and the color and piquancy of women's conventions altogether wanting. There were several bands of music whose performance of National airs supplied the only enthusiasm that we witnessed from first to last. Here were about seven hundred delegates, well-fed, well-groomed, every man well-to-do. They were lawyers and business men and they made up the most perfunctory convention I have ever seen.

When "Boss Platt" entered they cheered—not as one does a real leader, to whom his heart leaps up unbidden, but as paid "claquers" used to cheer in Paris theatres.

"He stays down on the floor and keeps his eye on the boys," muttered a man behind me, "and he makes it pay, too; he's got this convention in the hollow of his hand."

I could not help contrasting the scene with the enthusiasm "when life was young" with this party and with me; when my father left the Democrats because of their proslavery sentiment and joined the heroic little party whose motto was, "Free soil, free speech, free labor and free men," and followed on with that party when, "like the swell of some sweet tune," it merged in the one (then) devoted to "great moral ideas."

Somebody near me whispered: "These men have come to do a job of work; they'll do it and go home as unmoved as they came."

I wrote to Lady Henry on my reporter's pad: "The man that took off his coat and waved it till it split across the back when Abraham Lincoln was nominated isn't here."

Mr. Brookfield called the convention to order, and a nice looking minister offered what an old lady called "a yesterday, to-day and forever prayer"; that is, its colorless nature would have fitted the year 1, as well as 1894.

Hon. Mr. Quigg, a young man from New York, was elected temporary chairman. The rungs of the ladder by which he had climbed were made of reportorial pencils; from journalism he had gone straight to Congress before he was thirty years old, overcoming his Democratic opponent by ten thousand majority in the city of New York. This slight, nervy, quick-witted youth made, far and away, the best speech of the convention. It was a clear-cut showing up, from a Republican point of view, of the Democratic failure to redeem its pledges to the people; of its undone condition and utter apostasy from everything decent and deserving. While he was laying it off I heard the whispered words: "Oh, these politicians—they are all tarred with the same brush, and right well the people know it."

The tariff question was the foot-ball, with brief allusion to Tammany's dissection at the hands of the Lexow Committee, in making which the young man referred to gamblers but was ingeniously careful not to allude to saloons.

When Mr. Quigg finished his speech he read off a list of committees that had been placed before him, for he was Boss Platt's good little boy and obeyed orders. A member rose and said: "Our delegation would like to be consulted." Whereupon the young man blandly replied that if he felt the need of counsel he would certainly seek it, whereat the convention chuckled in "ghoulish glee." The delegates then went home to dinner and the committees to the usual wrestle with the work put upon them.

An hour later a pathetic incident came to our knowledge. It seems that Hon. Edward Lauterbach, a leading New York lawyer, delegate-at-large to the Constitutional Convention and chief champion of the woman suffrage amendment, had got five minutes set aside in which that question was to be presented. His wife, a beautiful and accomplished "society woman," just home from Newport, is a recent convert and devoted to our cause. She found Miss Anthony and went with her to the room of the platform committee where, in the murky atmosphere of tobacco smoke, she spoke for us, as she has now been doing right on for well-nigh fifty years. The gallant lawyer Lauterbach also addressed the committee, the entire time given being five minutes. When all those good fellows are dead and forgotten, the name of Anthony will be revered, loved, spoken with tremulous gratitude by the women of the future, but to-day she might as well have talked to a blackbird's congress in a hickory grove as to them.

Very amusing was the little dialogue between Anna Gordon and a voter beside her. Said he: "I see Miss Anthony is here and I suppose there will be an effort made to get a woman suffrage resolution in some way."

"What would be the result of such a resolution? Would it be thrown out?"

"Oh, yes."

"Why? On what grounds would it be rejected?"

"Oh, it ain't their business. They're here to nominate."

When the platform was read we found ourselves once more forgotten but "we promise an acceptable excise law" was the slippery-elm plank offered to those Methodist brethren who declare in their own platform that "the liquor traffic cannot be legalized without sin." And one of these is Warner Miller—permanent chairman of the convention.

All the reports of committees were accepted without a single dissenting voice. Upon this the ex-vice-president of the United States, Levi P. Morton, was nominated by Gen. B. F. Tracy for the governorship. Doubtless Mr. Morton is a man of many excellencies, but the temperance people will not forget that he owns the Shoreham Hotel, Washington, D. C., with its licensed bar.

Some small effort to break the spell and bring in younger blood and a spark of enthusiasm by the nomination of Jacob Sloat Fassett afforded a diverting episode, but Boss Platt gets in his work beforehand and these men had not only "come here to nominate," but to nominate Levi P. Morton,—and they did it, in a cool, measured, business-like fashion that said more plainly than any words could do, "The glory is departed."

"Well, Lady Henry, what do you think of it?" was a most natural question asked of one of the best informed and most astute observers who ever surveyed such a scene.

"You cannot expect me to be enthusiastic over a convention that in these piping times of woman's suffrage, social purity work and prohibition passes over the issues to which my life is devoted, and though it gives out a few glittering generalities to the working man, really represents capital and the stereotyped first of all issues, 'We want the offices.' The thing that surprised me most was the utter absence of debate and speeches from the floor. I had supposed your conventions to be more off-hand but in this things were 'railroaded through' with manifest aforethought. The open charge of bribery flung at the opposite party was surprising to one who has lived under a libel law so strenuous that the fact that charges are true makes them but the more heinous. The speaking was much more spontaneous and pithy than the average that we get in our political meetings—but what pained me most was the absence of any appeal to the higher ranges of motive. The proceedings were mechanical, the views materialistic. That Populist convention in St. Louis, with all its faults, had more of hope, uplift and forward looking; I suppose its absence may be not the fault but the misfortune of age and its accompanying fixity of state.

"As I saw the blue smoke curling upward—and heard that in the committee on resolutions, where our Great-heart, Susan B., put in her protest all in vain, 'it was so thick you could have cut it with a knife'—I could but say to myself, 'Imagine Gladstone speaking to an audience that smoked; he would die of it, I should think.'

"But the feature that struck me most unpleasantly of all was the singular unanimity of the proceedings. That is a bad sign, the deadness that comes before revolution. It astonishes me to find that in this country the adherents of each party go to listen to their own speakers and no others. Why, if this convention had been in England the opposite party would have been out in force, calling 'No, no,' while these delegates called out, 'Hear, hear,' asking questions and otherwise enlivening the proceedings. This seems to me the more instructive way, and one that tends more thoroughly to bring out truth.

"But it is the free and easy accusation of bribery that I cannot get over. It is true that in other days we were cursed by this same gangrene of the body politic; now, however, our laws are so severe and well-enforced that if a candidate gives a tea to work-house folk or hires a carriage to take anybody to the polls he thereby invalidates his election.

"We have another advantage; we can turn out our government at once if they do not sustain the action of the people; the appeal is swift, sharp and decisive, and this uncertainty of tenure holds our representatives nearer to us. You have the form, but, to my thinking, we have the reality of republican government; it matters little whether a tyrant, an oligarchy or a boss controls the state, and I feel sure that by the referendum-initiative and the abolition of these nominating conventions (a thing unknown in England) you will simplify your methods, and bring them more closely to the people's confidence and heart."

New York has thirteen hundred thousand voters; over six hundred thousand of these are foreigners, the majority of them illiterate; both parties bid for these,—that is the situation in a nutshell, so far as our ethical reform measures are concerned. "The communism of pelf" in votes is the bond that unites the two old parties against the two new ones. The new ones have not sense enough to "get together," and there we are!

But evils tend to their own cure; the Boss will be bombarded—and the people yet will rule!

SUFFRAGE IN NEW YORK.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The women of New York state have, during the last twelve months, had a varied and a vivid experience. They have borne, innocently, the doom of Tantalus; have had food and drink set alluringly before them, only to recede swiftly from their grasp when they stretched out eager hands.

Granted a fractional share in the election franchise (i. e., the triennial election of school commissioners) by the legislature of 1892, they found the gift an illusion and a delusion. They have seen the law which was so small yet so precious a guerdon ruthlessly destroyed by the courts, branded as unconstitutional, and as a climax a constitutional convention has not only refused to restore that right, but has coolly set aside, as of no moment, that myriad-voiced expression from the people, the petition of nearly seven hundred thousand citizens, that women be no longer debarred from the exercise of the right secured by the constitution to every adult male citizen.

A year ago, under a statute providing that "all persons without regard to sex . . shall be entitled to vote for school commissioner," our women entered earnestly upon the needful preparatory work. Great interest was aroused, and, according to reports, over two hundred thousand women were duly registered. But early in October a determined campaign against the law was inaugurated, confessedly, lest, in certain cases, the women's votes should alter the results of the election.

October 27, Judge Pardon C. Williams, of the Supreme court, granted a motion to strike the name of Matilda Joslyn Gage from the rolls, holding that by reason of the word "male" in the constitution, and of the fact that the office referred to was an elective one, the law conferring this franchise upon women was unconstitutional. Yet nine lawyers were upon the judiciary committee which reported the bill favorably to the Senate, and some of these publicly defended the law.

General McMahon, of that committee said: "The legislature did not act hastily in passing that bill. The Senate judiciary committee heard its constitutionality fully discussed, and had the advice of Professor Collin, the governor's adviser, on such matters. We came to the conclusion that the provision of the constitution limiting the franchise to 'male' citizens applied only to the selection of constitutional officers, such as are now or hereafter may be, provided for by the constitution."

"School commissioners are not such officers but are legislative creations and the legislature may direct how they are to be chosen, even to the extent of limiting or extending the franchise."

Another eminent lawyer said at the time: "If Judge Williams is right in his contention, there are scores of unconstitutional laws upon the statute books, for if the franchise cannot be extended to females it certainly cannot be restricted among males, further than the constitution expressly allows, for it states that every male citizen shall have the right to vote."

These quotations outline the argument for the constitutionality of the law. Directly after the Williams decision, Judge Barnard, of the Supreme Court, in a similar case, rendered an opinion sustaining the law. Here, then, were two decisions of precisely the same judicial authority and of exactly opposite tenor; evidence that neither could be conclusive. Yet the adverse opinion was diligently carried by the press into every hamlet of the state, while

Judge Barnard's decision was scarcely mentioned. It was affirmed and re-affirmed with positiveness that the question was settled against the women. By this means, multitudes were literally and effectually "intimidated," and made no effort to claim their rights. Yet many, confident that their legal right was still in full force, made a direct issue by appearing at the polls and requesting ballots. Some were accorded the utmost courtesy, and every facility in exercising their fraction of the elective franchise. Others were compelled to swear in their votes, and subjected to various petty annoyances, and to interrogations neither ordered nor authorized by the Code. In still other cases, the inspectors usurped judicial functions, and absolutely refused to the women the special ballots which had been prepared for them, and which lay useless and discredited before their eyes. It was noticeable that the redoubtable decision did not seem to affect the regular official machinery in its preparation of the women's ballots, or intercept them on their way to the local boards.

Notwithstanding all the impediments put in their way, reports show that from fifteen to twenty thousand women did actually cast their ballots in that memorable election, and, with an open path to the ballot box, it is very probable that one hundred and fifty thousand might have done so. In January the law received its deathblow from the Court of Appeals, notwithstanding the weight of evidence in its favor.

The principle that a legislature has control over its own official creations, in fixing the conditions of suffrage, has been established by various state courts, and has hitherto ruled, in legislative enactments, in this state, and no one seemed to fear for the integrity of the Constitution until this change was wrought in the elective status of women.

Indeed, as has been said, no attempt was made to conceal the fact that devotion to the Constitution was far from being the motive which inspired this bitter attack upon a statute law. In Cayuga county, injunctions restraining the county clerk and certain town clerks from distributing the women's ballots were granted to two candidates by Judge Rumsey. The complaint sets forth that "the females registered will use said ballots at the election aforesaid, in voting for a candidate for the office of school commissioner . . other than the plaintiff in this action, to his irreparable injury, damage and probable defeat."

The history of the school commissioner law in this state proves anew that politicians will exhaust ingenuity in efforts to bar out women from long sought and hard won rights. Sex prejudice was also a factor; and yet, very many men stood squarely by the women, and at the very ballot-box, sturdily championed their cause. Our indictment is not against men as a whole, but against certain classes of men.

The constitutional amendment campaign of the present year furnishes another suggestive chapter of history. Even before the school commissioner law was known to be in jeopardy, the eyes of our women turned expectantly toward the constitutional convention to be in session the past summer. They ventured to hope that it would have breadth of vision to perceive that all the currents of advancing civilization were setting steadily in the direction of the fullest individual equality for women, and that it would be just enough to accord the womanhood of the state that political liberty so sedulously guarded for every male citizen. When our law was finally nullified by the court of appeals, and the little that we had taken from us, we felt that we had a double claim upon the convention—redress for a recent as well as an ancient wrong.

Petition work was undertaken with great energy. It was carried on by the W. C. T. U. as a society and individually, in coöperation with the state campaign committee that had in charge a mammoth general petition. The latter was indorsed by the state grange. The committee held a mass-meeting in each of the sixty counties, every one addressed by Susan B. Anthony and nearly every one by Rev. Anna Shaw.

The petitions, as finally presented, represented nearly seven hundred thousand adult citizens. After weeks of consideration (?) the suffrage committee reported adversely by 13 to 4. Several evenings were given to discussing whether or not women had any political rights which men were bound to respect. August 15 the adverse report was adopted by ninety-seven ayes to fifty-eight nays, and the constitutional convention of 1894 had made for itself an indelible record upon one of the greatest of modern issues.

But time, the great enlightener, is ever our ally. We are assured that, if it has not been fruitful in immediate and tangible results, our labor has not been in vain. The question has become, for the first time, a real, live issue in the state, and it can never be relegated to its former insignificance in the public eye. The legislature has always power to grant us that appeal to the people, so unjustly denied by the present convention. We shall lay freshly to heart the parable of the unjust judge, and continue to plead our righteous cause, until the empire state is enabled to write her name fair and broad upon the banner of political equality, and her daughters wear, at last, their civic crown.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE CONGRESS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The president of the Sixth International Peace Congress, Monsieur Honzeau de La Haie, member of the Chamber of Representatives of the kingdom, had kindly suggested to me that the last day of the congress would be the most appropriate time for the resolution respecting the World's Petition to be brought before the House. He had signified his readiness to assist in my efforts to influence the delegates. As I went into the room he remarked: "It is just nine years ago that Miss Willard was in this very room, and held a large meeting of the Temperance Union. I met her then." In the auspicious moment he lost no time in offering the resolution, just as I had given it to him, to the congress, and, with bated breath, I waited the issue.

I had seen these delegates drink glass after glass of wine at our banquet on the Scheldt river given by the Belgium government. Would they vote for temperance now? I feared not. In French and in English the question was laid before them. The president called for the vote of those in favor of its adoption. I hardly dared to look up when I heard a ripple of applause. The vote was unanimous! In the same room, as if putting a seal on the proceedings, Mr. Clark, M. P., from Great Britain, arose and stated that a farewell banquet was proposed to be given to the president and other officials, but he added: "I want it understood that if wine be included in the expenses incurred for this parting ovation some of us English speaking delegates will be obliged to stay away, for we will not pay for wine; we are temperance people."

Thus, dear UNION SIGNAL, this room will be historic in the records of the W. C. T. U. First, by Miss Willard's meeting of nine years ago; second, by the adoption of the resolution formulated the exact words used by Miss Willard and just as she gave me my commission as your delegate; and third, by the stand for temperance at a dinner in wine-drinking Belgium.

Another graceful act performed by the president was the presentation to me of the flag of peace of Belgium to present to the Human Freedom League of the United States of America. In receiving this souvenir liberty bell the president said: "I am very sorry that I cannot thank you in your language, so I beg to speak in French. . . . I experience a profound emotion in seeing on this table this bell, proving that the friends in America are consecrated to liberty and peace. I receive it in the name of the congress with profound expressions of thanks. I beg of you to convey to the committees of the Human Freedom League and the Columbian Liberty Bell the warmest expressions of gratitude of this congress. We will keep this in a place of safety, and guard it with jealous care. We will send it to all future reunions and will never permit it to ring except for the work of human freedom and peace. I will now ring it for the first time in Antwerp, in a territory that is neutral ground. Thanks to our friends in America for this touching attention."

Germany sent here her first delegates to a peace congress. Mr. Haberland, a banker, and Dr. Grelling, have commenced a Peace Society, which although only about one year old, numbers over two thousand members. The last echoes of the Peace Congress were reaching the press and the resolutions adopted by the two branches of the congress were being discussed, when the inter-parliamentary conference convened at The Hague to discuss the same question,—the abolishment of war and the establishment of an international bureau or court of arbitration. Only members of parliaments of nations should be delegates to this conference.

I understand there are twelve hundred who are members of this organization for the promulgation of arbitration. Fourteen different countries were here represented—Germany, England, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Hungary, Italy, Norway, Portugal, Holland, Roumania, Sweden and Switzerland.

It was a greatly deplored fact that the United States had no representative in this parliament of the nations, where the men of state were striving to abolish war. Nevertheless, the fact was recognized that the United States was a most active adherent of the cause of peace. One delegate in the Peace Congress mentioned the fact that, in over one hundred and eighteen years of national existence we had only suffered about eighteen years of war; and, in the Parliamentary Conference, Mr. Creamer, Member of Parliament of Great Britain, stated that there was before the committee of foreign affairs in the United States a bill of "motion" that was intended to carry out the principles of a court of arbitration and peaceful settlement of difficulties with all nations. Mr. Creamer urged the adoption of such a sentiment by this conference, and it was carried unanimously! The same gentleman further urged that a notice of this be sent to the United States to the chairman of foreign affairs, and also to Senator John Sherman, so that he might urge his colleagues to act on this same question. The result would be, he said, that the old world governments would be invited to join in an international court of arbitration.

It is a singular coincidence that the first peace congress should have been held in Belgium, the land where Jacob Van Artveldt made the first movement for liberty and freedom from the despotism of the feudal barons early in the fifteenth century, and that the inter-parliamentary conference should have been held in Holland, the birthplace and the scene of the labors of Hugo Gratius, who taught, in the seventeenth century, that war was contrary to all religious doctrines, and legally was a crime. The Hague is also not far from Utrecht, where was held a peace congress in the year 1714. That, however, had first received a baptism of blood, for the flower of the Dutch army had first fallen at Malplaquet. I had begun to feel alone in a strange land when an invitation came from Mrs. Wm. Quinby, the wife of the American Minister Plenipotentiary, asking me to come to their home to dinner. His Excellency, Mr. Wm. E. Quinby, resides in a magnificent house, the property of the Baron Groeniux van Zoelen, who, like many of the foreign noblemen, married a rich American girl, who was a great granddaughter of Mr. John Jacob Astor, of New York.

I went with one of the minister's family to visit the child queen's palace in the woods. Although only about fourteen years old, little Queen Wilhelmina has seven magnificent palaces, and will soon be called upon to rule over thirty-two millions of people. They all idolize her, and every one testifies that she is extremely gracious and not the least spoiled by all her glory and adulation.

In her palace in the woods I saw one room that it took nine artists (all pupils of Rubens) four years to paint. It was the daughter-in-law of William, the Silent, who planned and ordered these historical and allegorical paintings. Life here at The Hague is more quiet and less convivial than in Belgium. I do not here see the sidewalks crowded with tables and men and women sitting down by them and drinking together. Cleanliness is a marked feature everywhere. Beauty of architecture and a pleasant absence of poverty seem also to be characteristics of the country. Some important signatures are already gained for the Polyglot Petition. I will add names continually.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering, for he is faithful that promised.—Heb. 10:23.

When these lines meet the eye of our readers the Chicago reception to our great leader, Miss Willard, on her fifty-fifth birthday, and the unveiling of the Chautauqua and Willard fountains will be a thing of the past, but as I write we are in the midst of preparations for the notable event. One of our leading daily papers says after having read the program, "The order of exercises already arranged for the reception indicates that Miss Willard will receive such a welcome home as has never before been given to a Chicago woman, if indeed a similar event has ever taken place." The unveiling of the fountains, however, more especially belongs to this column; I will therefore confine myself to a description of the Chautauqua fountain. It is placed near the center of the corridor which leads into Willard Hall, in a corner formed by the expansion of the hallway at that point from twelve to fourteen feet. It is 11 feet 7 inches high and 4 feet 8 inches wide. Most precious materials enter into its composition—alabaster, marble, bronze. The lovely fountain is the design of a brilliant young architect of Chicago, Jules F. Wegman, formerly associated with Burnham & Root. Within an alcove of richly veined alabaster, supported by two delicately fluted columns of beautifully tinted green Italian marble stands a group in bronze modeled by the eminent Danish sculptor, Carl Rohl-Smith, of Chicago. It consists of a Cupid two feet high, smiling and radiant with delight as he stands perched on the head of a dolphin, from the mouth of which a sparkling stream of pure water flows into a beautiful alabaster basin, around the rim of which is inscribed in mosaic, "CHAUTAUQUA COUNTY, N. Y., THE BIRTHPLACE OF THE W. C. T. U." In one hand the boy carries the trident of Neptune, and in the other are the reins with which he directs the course of the dolphin. The marble work of the fountain was selected in Italy by Mr. Wm. H. Burke, of Chicago, and reflects much credit on his artistic taste. It was all executed in Italy.

The above description gives but a faint idea of this unique fountain. It is the crowning jewel of the white marble-lined corridor, exquisite in design and glowing with rare stones which have been filched from the bosom of old Mother Earth and fashioned and polished by the cunning of man until it surpasses in beauty anything of the kind to be found in the great metropolis of the West. This is the verdict of the press of the city as well as all who have been favored with a view. We have had the fountain photographed and all who send us twenty-five cents can have a picture of it free of postage. This fund will go towards aiding the noble white-ribboners of Chautauqua county, N. Y., to complete their payments on the work, on which they are behind some three hundred dollars. It must be to them a great gratification that after three or four years of hard work and patient waiting, led by their gentle but persistent chairman, Mrs. V. H. Danforth, they have at last succeeded in placing this beautiful memorial in Willard Hall, formed of indestructible materials to commemorate an event pregnant with wondrous hope and promise, not only for the elevation of women but the entire race, which twenty-one years of trial has proved the most wonderful occasion to women that has ever occurred in the history of the world.

The following clipping has been sent me: "The will of Mrs. Martha Case, late of Danvers, was probated yesterday. It is dated February 15, 1894, and was witnessed by Messrs. C. C. Rowell and J. Smith. To Mrs. James Kincaid is left the house and lot in Danvers; to her nephew, Mr. A. W. Harriss, of Stanford, is left $300 in cash and to her grandnephew, Mr. J. A. Harrison, also of Stanford, is left $500. The remainder of her estate is devised to the trustees of the Temperance Temple at Chicago." This is the only intimation we have had of this bequest to the Temple. We would be glad to know more in regard to it but as we do not know to what state to write, we will have to depend on some friend who may be conversant with the facts to inform us. Will some one kindly do so? A true and faithful white-ribboner, Miss Dora Harris, Ypsilanti, Mich., pledged $100 some time ago. She has just sent a beautiful letter, enclosing $34 in which she says: "At last I have some money to send you. I have earned and saved it since I wrote you and will surely pay the rest as fast as I can. I shall make an extra effort as I realize it is needed now more perhaps than next year." Another dear white-ribboner in California sends stamps for three mite-boxes, and praises in unstinted terms the Temple and its founder. She adds a postscript to her letter as follows: "Dear sister, while writing the above the thought has been growing upon me of how contemptibly small it is in me, insignificant as I am, to claim even a small interest in that grand building for which I have never done the slightest thing except praise it. I hope you will forgive me, for even now I cannot do very much, but I can and will do all that is in my power." I hope an arrest of thought on this subject will come to thousands of our white-ribboners who have so far only praised the Temple and that now they will show, like our California sister, their appreciation by their works.

All persons sending $1 to the Temple will receive the beautiful Columbian souvenir. Any individual who fills a mite-box during 1894 will receive a solid silver Temple souvenir teaspoon. This, however, does not apply to persons filling boxes for unions; they receive the Columbian souvenir. All money orders and checks should be made out in the name of William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, the Temple, Chicago, Ill.

JUST TO BE GOOD.

Just to be good
This is enough—enough!
Oh, we who find sin's billows wild and rough,
Do we not feel how more than any gold
Would be the blameless life we led of old
While yet our lips knew but a mother's kiss?
Ah! though we miss
All else but this,
To be good is enough.

It is enough—
Enough—just to be good!
To lift our hearts where they are understood;
To let the thirst for worldly power and place
Go unappeased; to smile back in God's face
With the glad lips our mother used to kiss.
Ah! though we miss
All else but this
To be good is enough!

CARPETS VERSUS BOYS.

BY MRS. F. BUTTS.

"I must have new carpets in the chambers," said Mrs. Fairwether, as she looked thoughtfully out of the window.

The leaves on the great horse chestnut in the front yard were already yellowing and a chill breeze was soughing in its branches. The dahlias stood in a stiff row along the fence like slim soldiers at review; the tall white phlox breathed out its dying breath, and a belated butterfly was warming itself in the scant sunshine.

"How fallish it looks," replied Mrs. Smythe, following her sister's glance and shivering a little. She took no notice of the remark about the carpets.

"You never think I ought to have anything new," complained Mrs. Fairwether. She changed her position as she spoke and wrapped a white wool shawl about her shoulders.

"There goes Tom Carpenter," said Mrs. Smythe. "I fancy his mother has something to think of besides carpets. They say his father is none too steady."

"His father! Why, his father is Mr. Fairwether's bookkeeper."

"Yes, I know. I am surprised that he will employ such a man."

"Such a man! James Carpenter is one of the most skillful accountants to be had. It isn't his fault if his son is a little wild—that is, he may not be to blame. So long as Carpenter attends to his duties Mr. Fairwether has no business with his private life."

"Do you really think so, Maria? It is my opinion that every man who is not a good citizen is a menace to the community—a point of contagion."

"Forty yards at—how much is good English brussels a yard, sister?" asked Mrs. Fairwether, quite oblivious of Mrs. Smythe's last remarks.

Mrs. Smythe gave the required information, adding: "If you are determined to buy the new carpets why don't you do it?"

"Why? You know that you consider the old ones good enough. Mr. Fairwether doesn't approve of carpets anyway, wants a bare floor with a rug or two, so that the germs can be shaken out easily. I'm not the person to go off and get carpets when everybody in the house is against me."

"Well, I do think the money might be better spent in some other way. But if you have made up your mind to refurnish those chambers, why, I will help you all I can."

Mrs. Fairwether's face brightened. She was a plump, little dimpled woman, suggesting cream and beefsteak and unlimited bread and butter. She liked cushions and chat and a bit of easy knitting. It was difficult for her to make way against the more positive personality of her sister. So when the latter withdrew her silent disapproval of the new carpets, Mrs. Fairwether's heart leaped up with joy.

When Mr. Fairwether came home that evening his wife had on her second best cashmere gown, the one with the lace bertha that was so becoming to her; a little cap lay on the puffs of her gray hair and gave her a singularly youthful look. Mr. Fairwether liked his wife to dress well; but on this particular night he seemed blind to her appearance, deaf to the softness of her voice, and altogether oblivious of her efforts to please. She was thinking of the new carpet, but it was evident that he was thinking of something entirely different. Rob, the sixteen-year-old son came in just after the family were seated at the tea-table. He was a bright, manly boy, tall and handsome ,and possessed of that peculiar attractiveness that makes the social favorite.

The father ate his bread and butter in silence. There was a stern as well as a worried look upon his face. Mrs. Fairwether cast now and then a glance at him, hoping to surprise a sympathetic expression so that she might introduce the subject of the carpet. She hoped the coffee jelly, a favorite of Mr. Fairwether's, might soften him to interest in matters domestic. But he ate the delicious morsels as if he were swallowing so much oatmeal mush, deigning no word of praise or appreciation. When he had satisfied his appetite he sat for a moment balancing his teaspoon on his cup. This bit of playfulness on the part of the head of the house was ominous. Very disagreeable words had been spoken in former times while Mr. Fairwether so amused himself. While the family waited to hear what was coming, the head thereof darted a look at Rob and said: "Robert, where were you last night?"

The boy flushed and moved uneasily in his chair.

"Answer me," thundered the father.

"Tom Carpenter and I—"

"Tom Carpenter!" broke in the mother, her voice full of anxiety and surprise.

"What were you and Tom Carpenter doing?" demanded Mr. Fairwether. "Tell the truth now."

"I always tell the truth," said the boy proudly.

"That is so," said Mrs. Smythe, laying her hand on Rob's shoulder.

"Well, out with it then."

"We—we were down at Nelson's."

Mrs. Fairwether turned pale.

"There ain't anywhere for a fellow to go anyhow," said Rob doggedly.

"Don't let me hear of your being in that place again," said the father, beginning to swallow his tea excitedly.

"My boy at Nelson's! My Rob gambling and drinking, perhaps. Why, it was only yesterday that his soft pink cheek lay against my breast, and I looked down into his innocent blue eyes and almost wept for joy to think that he was mine!"

Then there came before the mother's vision the motley crowd, the bar, the card tables—and Tom Carpenter. Yes, she had heard without any special solicitude that Tom of late frequented very undesirable places, Nelson's among the rest. And was not he as dear to his mother as Rob to her, Mrs. Fairwether?

The family rose from the tea-table each occupied with his own thoughts. In Mrs. Smythe's mind lingered the words of Rob: "There's nowhere for a fellow to go anyhow." Then she remembered that she had heard something about W. C. T. U. coffee rooms, that very few persons had taken any interest in them, that they had been kept up awhile and then discontinued. The matter presented itself to her in a new light. "Nowhere to go." She had not supposed that Rob needed anywhere to go except his own home. It seemed that he thought differently. And there were Tom Carpenter and George Arnold and Charley Eldredge—all of them bright little fellows in pinafores not so very long ago. Some of them had no mother, she remembered. Were they all getting into the habit of going to Nelson's? And were those who should look after them all busy buying new carpets for the accommodation of germs?

Mrs. Fairwether concluded that if she had new carpets she would have new furniture throughout. Rob seemed to be doing well, and Mr. Fairwether had appeared somewhat more genial and communicative of late. Several calls for money in the interest of coffee rooms, reading rooms, a gymnasium, etc., had been refused by Mrs. Fairwether who said that she had uses for all the money she could get hold of. She was on the point of going with Mrs. Smythe to the city to select the furnishings that she had decided upon. She waited only for the funds which she hoped would be forthcoming soon. Suddenly there came a thunder-clap, so to speak, out of a clear sky. Mr. Fairwether awoke one morning to find himself famous in a very unpleasant sense of the word. He was known as the father of a son who had taken money from the paternal till and had absented himself indefinitely. Tom Carpenter was his partner in peculation and absenteeism.

"Five hundred dollars! That would have bought a good deal of furniture," said Mrs. Smythe to herself when she heard the news. "Come to think about it seriously it would be cheaper to have safe places for boys to be jolly in, looked at from the financial point of view."

As for Mrs. Fairwether, she couldn't bear the looks of her old neighbors. She persuaded her husband to sell out and move away. Rob heard by means of a "personal" that he would be forgiven if he would come back to his father and mother. But his self-respect was lost and his father's heart broken. Tom Carpenter ran a short and wild career in the West and filled a nameless grave.

Other hands built up the good cause in the home town of the Fairwethers, and it became an axiom there that whatever the people denied themselves the boys must be saved at all hazard and at all cost. Another sentiment found favor, namely—nobody need lack for useful or beautiful things were temperance the established law of the land. And there were those who talked of building homes on volcanoes, and furnishing elegant houses and leaving a lot of dynamite in the cellar, etc., etc. But such illustrations were perhaps a little far-fetched when so many better ones were at hand.

OPIUM AND CHLORAL INEBRIETY.

BY DR. NORMAN KERR.

"Though the victims of both alcohol and opium inebriety become, unless cured of their dire malady, utter moral wrecks, the opium drunkard is, on the whole, more of a slave than the alcohol drunkard. It is more difficult to keep within limited indulgence with opium, so that "moderate" or "restricted" opium consumption is very much more difficult of accomplishment than "moderate" or "restricted" drinking of alcoholic intoxicants.

"Another difference lies in the continuity of opium inebriate indulgence compared with the two alcoholic phases of continuity and periodicity. There are probably on the whole more periodic than constant drinkers, but those persons who are addicted to the opium habit are generally constant in their devotions. There are some exceptions to this rule, but periodicity in opium is mostly involuntary on the part of the indulger. By this I mean that he consumes opium whenever he has the chance, but the opportunity is afforded only periodically, for example, at night when the day's work is over. Excessive opium users must have a daily supply of their narcotic or they break down and cannot work, whereas the periodic alcoholite has his sober intervals, during which he can fulfill his duties with vigor and comfort.

"There is some difference, too, in the proportion of the sexes. Female alcoholic inebriates, especially in England, are very common. Female opium inebriates are rare, though I have known one at ninety years of age. She was blind, and was accustomed to go to a chemist's shop in the forenoon, drinking two drachms of laudanum there, taking another two drachms away with her. The same performance was repeated every evening. In China and other Eastern countries a very much larger proportion of females are victims of opium inebriety than in Britain or America. In many opium dens in these Oriental regions women form no inconsiderable ratio of the smokers. Even in England, English girls are now occasionally met with in these dens, slaves to the opium crave.

"The modern hydrate of chloral, not thirty years old, a most valuable medicinal remedy, for a time rapidly advanced in popular estimation as an inebriating agent among both sexes. Of recent years, however, this form of inebriety has been somewhat on the wane, though it is unhappily all too common yet.

"Chloral, unlike opium, but like alcohol, reduces vital temperature.

"This inebriety does not assume a social form, being indulged in privately.

"Chloral is decomposed within the blood, giving off the chloroform which induces sleep.

"I have generally found the chloral habit originate in its employment as a means of securing a night's rest to the sleepless. Some few have resorted for the first time to the drug to obtain a short respite from severe pain. Still fewer have been alcoholic inebriates, who, to escape the torture of long, weary, wakeful nights, have had recourse to the soporific services of the seductive potion. Medical prescription has initiated the habit in some cases, and I have been informed by medical colleagues of a fatal habit of chloralism following their therapeutic administration of a moderate narcotic dose.

"The effects, after the intoxication from this sleep producer has passed away, are most unpleasant. The digestion is liable to be upset. The capacity to sleep naturally is, to a large extent, lost. The circulatory fluid is badly nourished and insufficiently aerated. The circulation is oppressed. The heart labors. The secretory and other functions are disturbed. The inhibitory power of the various nerve centers is lessened. Muscular unsteadiness is the equivalent of nervous instability. In some confirmed cases there is a feeling of general muscular weakness, cardiac debility and reduced vascular tension; there is some vasomotor disturbance, witnessed by coldness and blueness of the extremities, the tip of the nose, etc. Often, too, there is a dull, listless lack of energy."—Science of Inebriety.

THE FOX AND HOUNDS.

BY C. R. VAN OSDEL.

MY DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS OF THE UNION SIGNAL:—I have had it in mind to write you a story of a fox and hounds; and as the kind editor intimates that she would like to see that fox, I have loosed the hounds and if they chase him through "The Temple" a snap-shot at him with her kodak will reveal to you a beauty; for this was a red fox, and a large fine one.

The night before the morning when I saw them, I was awakened by the baying of hounds at intervals of about two hours. The fox had laid out a runway or circuit in the form of a kite of which the long diameter ran north and south, with the large end to the south, and in this south end of his path, going east, he had mapped out in a dense thicket near my house, the most crooked path you could imagine; a real labyrinth, in which he hoped to confuse the dogs and so escape their constant dogging of his tracks.

But the unerring scent of the leading hound, which was the oldest of the pack, enabled him to follow every crook and turn as certainly as though he were winding up a thread which the fox had unwound.

The fox has a fear of this and will not go direct to his home, but keeps on trotting all night and all day with the hope that in some way the hounds will lose his trail and he will get a good rest, or possibly escape altogether.

While he can hear their barking he trots on, when their baying ceases he rests, but usually keeps about a quarter of a mile ahead of his enemies.

I suppose very few of you have ever heard what is called "the baying of the hounds," so I must tell you, if I can, what the sound is like which poor Reynard hears.

If the baby is not asleep and your mother has no company, you might, with her permission, step to the piano and getting the keynote of A below C natural sing or speak in that tone, "Ouch," "Ouch," "Ouch," "Ouch" at the rate of twice in a second, and now having the tone and the movement you can drop the consonants from the word and leave only the sound of the two vowels; and this is the constant warning which the poor fox hears and which wakes the poor sleeper as it did me that night, as often as they wound through the labyrinth.

Sing it no more, but come back to the story.

At seven o'clock the next morning I had hitched up "Cæsar" and gone into the woods some twenty rods away, and as I soon ascertained, had stopped my sleigh squarely across the runway of the fox, for as I looked to the west here came the beautiful creature, of which you may see a good picture in the Century dictionary, if your neighborhood is blessed with one.

When within about two rods of me he stopped and looked me over saying as plain as his eyes could speak, "Hello, sir, by what right do you obstruct my path?" And I answered, "Well, Mr. Fox, you beauty, what can I do for you under the circumstances?"

And that silent sneak took the distance between him and me for a radius and described a half circle in front of my horse. As his gait was a plain trot I wished to see him give a better exhibition of himself, and so tossed a billet of wood at him which he jumped over and gave a few graceful bounds showing himself to be supple and strong, notwithstanding he had traveled all night.

Striking his path again he soon jumped through a rail fence and went a short distance into the labyrinth, and in a few moments came back again with a new idea; for he made the same detour about Cæsar, and meeting his old path again took the back track and moved toward the approaching dogs until he came to a point about six rods away where his path was a tangent line to the bend of a creek, whose waters were about six feet wide, and here he leaped over it to his left and turning to his right, soon flanked the dogs and went north while they were coming south.

"Ah, ha!" thought I, "here is some active natural history at close quarters, and I shall soon see what the hounds will do about this new order of things." And by the time I had placed a few more sticks of fire-place wood upon my sleigh, the hounds were nearing the creek and I watched to see if they would notice the return track which the fox had just made. No. With his nose close to the ground the leader comes right alongside of it with an earnest manner as though his life depended upon the accuracy of his work, and as he approaches me I notice what a fine fellow he is. Of gray color with large brown spots and long brown ears hanging against his cheeks like pieces of velvet. And behind him are five or six young hounds two-thirds grown, of black and tan color.

As he sweeps around the half circle with his companions following him like boys on a "merry-go-round," I am calling him in the most persuasive tones to stop and listen to me. But as though he were snuffing the groove of a cable car track, he gives not the slightest heed to me, but goes on into the labyrinth and back again, and no doubt Cæsar thought, as they curved around him again, that this was a revolving menagerie for his especial benefit.

They soon reached the creek, and all was quiet. The leader had stopped, and they had all stopped their baying. He moved quickly to the right and left, pushing the other hounds away with an air of, "What do you know about a lost scent?" After snuffing about for a few moments he stood and looked into the water steadily until he appeared to be thinking. And I was very much surprised to see him crowd the hounds away from his left and walk firmly up towards me with his head raised higher than his shoulders, and, when within a rod, he gave me such an humble, honest, questioning look, that my heart went right out to him as it would to a child, for he was saying to me as best he could, "My dear friend, you did all you could to attract my attention awhile ago, but I was so bent upon the pleasure of seeking that fox that I gave you no heed, and now that I have lost the trail I have come humbly to acknowledge my wrong, and to ask you to direct me."

And, if the dear girls will forgive me, I gave that beautiful fox away by raising my left hand and pointing over the dog's head to the "tangent line," and then made a motion to the left, indicating that the fox had leaped over. And that honest old hound made me the most profound bow of acknowledgment, that said to me distinctly enough, "I understand you, sir, and I am very grateful," and he silently turned and trotted back to the creek, and, smelling for a moment to get the last scent which the fox had left on that side, he sprang over and in an instant discovered the trail, and raised his bass solo, to which the other hounds added their chorus in high glee.

And while the sound of their jubilation was diminishing, I completed my load and the while thinking, what a lesson is here for man, as exhibited in the memory, humility, intelligence and good sense of this hound.

And my dear boys and girls, there comes welling up in my soul this question. If a dog could remember that, some time before when he was in the pursuit of pleasure with the greatest eagerness, he had heard a voice calling and calling to him, and at the moment when he felt that his pursuit was vain and unprofitable could immediately and with great frankness, go and confess his dependence upon that higher intelligence and to it make his prayer for guidance, how much more should man who, when he discovers that the pursuit of sinful pleasures is vain and unsatisfying, as well as debasing to the soul, remember, that he has repeatedly heard in his soul the call of God, "Son!" "Daughter!" "Give me thine heart," for out of it are the issues of life; and open his heart at once to the confession of his error to God who is around and about him, and to the reception therein of Christ with his full forgiveness and salvation.

You should "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness" and then the bright pages of the record of your life will be free from the stain of any blot of sin and will hold just the bright imprint of loving and lovable deeds that shall increase in number and in their influence as the days go by.

This story was not written to tell you that later in the day this fine red fox was shot by the hand of a hunter who crossed his path, but to commend to you the wisdom of the repentant hound, and to commend [illegible] to the loving care and guidance of Him who said, "C[illegible] the lilies."

HOW THE ESKIMO COUNT.

So many Arctic exploring expeditions have been sent out during late years that we are fast learning about the people and geography of the ice-bound north country, Dr. Nansen, a noted Swedish explorer, tells us these interesting facts:

The Eskimo count upon their fingers—one, two, three, four, five. Above five and up to ten they use the second hand; thus, "six is the first finger of the other hand." Above ten they employ the toes. Thirteen, for instance, is "three toes upon the one foot," and eighteen "three toes on the second foot." Twenty they describe as "a whole man." They seldom go farther than this, but they can do so if necessary. For example, they express twenty-two by saying, "two on the second man"; thirty-seven by "two toes on the second man's second foot"; forty is "the whole of a second man." They cannot, or at least do not, count beyond one hundred, which is "the whole of the fifth man."

"AND who is this?" asked Aunt Clara, pointing to the picture of a chubby child in skirts. "That," said Robby, who had been wearing trousers for some time, is me when I was a girl."

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—By the time you read this the beautiful Willard fountain, to which so many of you have contributed your dimes, will have been put in its place on one of the main streets of the World's Fair city. This part of our paper is put in type too soon for me to tell you this week about what was done on this occasion, and how the little bronze girl looks in front of the Willard Hall entrance to the Temple. Next week, however, look out for a full account of all that occurred when your gift to Chicago's thirsty people was received and placed in position.

Five is not a very large number but take two fives side by side and that means five repeated eleven times. The great temperance leader, whom children, as well as grown folks love—Miss Willard—has been five years old ten times and she celebrated the eleventh time last Friday. You can read all about her "birthday party" on another page of this paper, and about the part the children took in it. If every boy who has been helped to total abstinence by Miss Willard's teachings had been present to escort her, there would have been the biggest boys' brigade ever seen on Chicago's streets. If every girl who loves the great leader and has pledged herself to be a temperance woman, had been there to throw a rose, the church would have held nothing else, and I am glad there were boys and girls there to take part, aren't you?

Affectionately your

Aunt Jane

COZY CORNER CORRESPONDENCE.

Iowa boys and girls, attention, please! Here is a call from your state superintendent of the Loyal Temperance Legion. Listen to what she says:

IN THE UNION SIGNAL of August 30, I saw a letter from Cora Abbott, answered it, and now she has organized an L. T. L. Now I ask every Iowa boy and girl who sees this to send me their name and address on a postal card, and I will gladly write you how to form an L. T. L. and become a worker in this great cause you love. Write right away, don't wait, use your influence now, and you will never regret it. Your older sister,

Brighton, Ia.

There is a fine chance for boys and girls who do not belong to the L. T. L. to find out all about it. Don't fail to write.

DEAR COZY CORNER BOYS AND GIRLS:—I met your Aunt Jane one day and took dinner with her and I thought she was ever so nice, and I thought I would tell you a little bit of a story about how I used to live away off, high up on the mountains of Lebanon, the same old mountains of Lebanon we read about in the Bible. There are more than six hundred villages scattered over those mountains, and perhaps I might tell you a few stories about the people who live there, that is, if you and Aunt Jane wish.

Your loving,

Minneapolis, Minn. GRANDMA BENTON.

Who wants to hear Grandma Benton's stories? I guess there's a unanimous vote, dear grandma. We adopt you into our circle and shall look for a story soon.

THE OFFICIAL CALL

For the Twenty-first Meeting of the National Women's Christian Temperance Union, November 16-21, 1894.

The child of the Crusade comes of age in the third week of November, 1894, and is rallying its kinsmen, clan and comrades to the old home hearthstone, Cleveland, Ohio. Some will be inclined to dispute the chronology, but they must be reminded that the Crusade began on December 23, 1873, and that the National W. C. T. U.—its sober second thought—rightfully dates its origin from that great uprising, though in point of fact it was not organized until the following November.

In commemoration of the inspired beginning that has had an efflorescence extending fast and far, we call upon all men and women like-minded with us to assemble at our twenty-first annual meeting in the Music Hall, Cleveland, November 16-21, 1894. We invite as visitors any and all of those good men and true who agree with us in the principles we have so often enunciated—prohibition by law, prohibition by politics, and prohibition by woman's ballot. We also invite those earnest-hearted reformers, the outcome of whose tireless work is the labor party, and the rank and file of whose great and growing host is at one with us in all our hopes and toils. While we deplore the high-license policy of the Republican party, we invite those far-seeing leaders, who in some of the states have boldly flung down the gauntlet against the saloon and who in recent times have girded on the sword in favor of the ballot for women, to come with us. We wish we could invite the Democratic leaders, but they have so generally taken a position in favor of the liquor traffic and against the enfranchisement of women that we know they would not come; but while we lament their stubborn conservatism as a party we do not forget that in the South under local option laws the rank and file of the democracy has waged a winning warfare against the abomination of the liquor traffic, and these brotherly allies we should be glad to see.

And now if we so cordially invite the manhood of the nation, what shall we say of its womanhood? We wish that every true home-maker present, potential and prospective, were with us in the warfare of the white ribbon. We invite them one and all, Protestant and Catholic, white and black, cultured and ignorant; they are our sisters, and we would gladly see them banded together in unbroken phalanx for the protection of their homes. But most warmly of all do we urge the presence and participation of our own household of faith, the membership and the following of the W. C. T. U. Come as visitors, come as advisers and counselors; come to do us good and build us up in the most holy faith. We shall all be the better in soul and clearer in sight, for as "iron sharpeneth iron, so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend."

It has long been our custom to invite all other religious, reform and philanthropic societies to send fraternal delegates; the labor leaders, suffragists, women's missionary societies and many others, have responded warmly to this invitation, the object of which is that bonds of friendship and coöperation might be formed among those whose faces are set toward a more just and happy future for mankind.

It is well known that our constitution declares that

The annual meeting shall be composed of the executive committee, one delegate at large from each auxiliary state union, one delegate for every five hundred paying members of auxiliary state unions, state corresponding and recording secretaries and treasurers, National superintendents of departments, National organizers and evangelists, the editors and publishers of our official organs, the editor of books and publications, the business manager of the W. T. P. A. (when a W. C. T. U. woman), chairman of standing committees and the President's private secretary, territories and the District of Columbia to be represented on the same basis.

SECTION 11. Juvenile organizations, known as Loyal Temperance Legions in any auxiliary state or territory or District of Columbia shall be entitled to one voting delegate for every thousand members having paid fifty dollars into the National treasury; said delegate to be a member of the W. C. T. U. and an active worker in the L. T. L.

So this year we shall rejoice to welcome not only our loyal Y delegates, but shall share the inspiration of our beloved L. T. L's. Come, then, one and all; come in your highest and happiest mood. Let us not descend to meet but let our meeting be the stepping-stone of an ascension to better, purer and more helpful things. Let us assemble as those who have no friends to reward, no enemies to punish. Let us rally as those who can "endure hardness as good soldiers." Let us come with the motto on our lips and in our hearts that "we will not speak discouraging words of the work nor disparaging words of the workers." Let us not attribute evil motives but believe that wherein there have been differences they were owing to varieties of temperament and opinion rather than to real opposition at heart. Let us remember, each and all, that unless we bring something good and true to the Convention we need not expect to take away anything true or good. If each one who is to come would begin now to lift up her heart to God and keep doing so until the last gavel-stroke of the Convention, asking that she herself might be sincere and gentle-spirited, our meeting would become another Pentecost. Nothing hinders us from doing this; no one can prevent us save our own slow hearts. Our Heavenly Father is a fixed quantity; the Holy Spirit is to be had "just for the asking."

Many of our sisters from other nations will be at the Convention, as well as many fraternal delegates; may our conduct be so truly Christian that they who assemble with us in the land of the Crusade and the city of our birth shall say with all who witness the Convention, "Behold, how these Christians love one another."

THE HOME VOTE.

It is significant that Dr. Lyman Abbott's paper, The Outlook, which opposes equal franchise, should make no allusion to women in its editorial note on the defeat of Breckinridge. For the facts are that this defeat illustrates several conservative fallacies and strengthens the contention of suffragists. It has been said by them of old time that "women will vote just as their husbands do, hence the result will not be changed."

But the "home protection" campaign in Kentucky—for that is what it was—proved the exact opposite. It has been said by the very same ones who used the argument just named (for like all who take the unjust side they neutralize one argument by another without knowing it) that if women voted "it would destroy the peace of families," but, while feeling has run high, we have no record of alienation or disruption in any home. It has been said that "women could influence their husbands and sons to vote as they desired," and yet, in spite of all their eloquence, an army of men supported the libertine politician through thick and thin. It has been said that "women do not wish to vote," but who doubts that, in the presence of the proposed dishonor of their state, the women who begged men to represent them at the polls against Breckinridge, would not have rejoiced with joy unspeakable to represent themselves?

But to our minds, the strongest point for woman's independent citizenship is this: Without the ballot women won the day for a clean congressional candidate but with the ballot the candidacy of an unfaithful husband and false father would never have been possible.

It is for this reason that we are more than ever convinced that the way to purify politics is to let in upon their polluted sluice-ways the purer current of the home vote. We believe it to be the only way out of the present malarious condition; we contend that every reform waits for this crowning reformation. Who will roll away for us the stone?

A NEW VICTORY.

The Polyglot Petition was signed by the president of the World's Peace Convention at Antwerp four weeks ago, having been adopted unanimously by the delegate representatives of forty societies in twelve countries. The advance of temperance sentiment was never more clearly testified than by this action, and we congratulate the W. C. T. U. in all lands and our delegate, Mrs. Mary Frost Ormsby, whose graphic account we give in our correspondence columns this week. The resolution is as follows and was drafted to meet the peculiar situation in a convention where very few were total abstainers:

The World's Peace Convention hereby expresses its appreciation of the presence and participation of a fraternal delegate from the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union, that greatest of organizations among women, which, from the first, has made the work for peace one of its prominent branches, under the wise leadership of Mrs. Hannah J. Bailey, of the state of Maine, National superintendent of the peace department.

We recognize in the Polyglot Petition circulated throughout all nations by the World's W. C. T. U. and already signed in fifty languages, a strong unifying power for every good cause, and we rejoice that Miss Willard, President of the World's W. C. T. U. and a vice-president of our own society, with Lady Henry Somerset, president of the British Women's Temperance Association, and other leading women, is to carry this Petition around the world in the interest of the fight for a clear brain and the establishing of a single standard of personal purity, and that the highest.

We, therefore, set our seal to the general purpose and spirit of the great Petition, and sincerely hope that its presentation to the governments of the world may achieve that which its framers so earnestly desire—the arrest of thought on the part of governmental leaders as to their duty to the people in putting down the vices that are like fuel to the flame of war and which hold the people down from their high prerogatives of brotherhood.

Approved September 3, 1894.

"HAVING read of the 'minister' who does not want THE UNION SIGNAL and has 'nothing in common with prohibition,'" writes a good brother-in-law from South Amherst, Mass., "I am reminded that perhaps I am wronging you as much by my neglect as this man by his discourtesy, in not thanking you for the good paper I get every week and through you those who have so kindly sent it. The Prohibition party has my respect and generally my vote and I have the greatest admiration for the W. C. T. U. It may be a long day, perhaps never, when all Christian people will think alike on all these important social reforms, but we ought to act together now in a great many more things than we do." Thus are the ills of life often balanced by its blessings. The minister's discourtesy is forgotten in the genial words of our newly heard-of friend, and doubtless many an unspoken commendation found a lodgment in other hearts when they read the harsh words of the heralder of the gospel who prays that he may "never have anything in common with prohibition." Let the W. C. T. U's continue to send THE UNION SIGNAL to their ministers; ninety-nine out of one hundred will welcome it gladly and courteously acknowledge it to the donors.

THE CHIEFTAIN'S BIRTHDAY WELCOME.

It has seemed a strange fatality that, with so many welcomes at different points on the circumference of the great Woman's Christian Temperance Union wheel, Miss Willard's welcome at the "Hub" of it all—Chicago—should have been so long delayed.

But a deferred good is always an augmented good, and, in this case the welcome of our hearts could in no sense have equaled the one given by both hearts and voices on September 28, our Chieftain's fifty-fifth birthday.

It had long been planned that the famous Chautauqua fountain—the gift of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Chautauqua county, New York, should be unveiled and dedicated upon that day, and there seemed a peculiar fitness in blending these exercises and the welcome reception together into one harmonious whole.

The day itself was an ideal one and Willard Hall was packed to its utmost capacity by an eager crowd of white-ribboners and interested friends, long before the hour announced for the beginning of the program, 2 p. m. Miss Willard presided, and it needed only her opening words, set to the measure of her own quaint originality, to assure us that she had come back to her home-life and home-work in very truth her old self.

Only a few of the speakers announced on the program were able to appear, but there was something not announced to fill each vacant niche and the whole went to the spring of a spontaneity as genuine as the presiding officer's humor.

The Crusade hymn was the keynote, the Crusade psalm followed, and Miss Margaret Wintringer, state superintendent of the L. T. L. for Illinois, made the opening prayer.

Of the six original members of the organizing convention held in Chautauqua in August, 1874, Mrs. Mattie McClellan Brown, Mrs. Jennie F. Willing, Mrs. Emily Huntington Miller, Mrs. W. E. Knox, Mrs. M. E. Niles, Mrs. E. J. Knowles, only one was present, Mrs. Emily Huntington Miller. But Mrs. Miller gave an address so chaste and beautiful on the inception of the W. C. T. U. and the significance of the fountain that all were supremely satisfied.

Mrs. Helen Hinsdale Rich read an original poem inscribed to Miss Willard and Lady Henry Somerset. Miss Austin, of the W. T. P. A., and Mr. Shaffer sang gloriously the duet "Love Divine all Love Excelling." Mrs. Stevenson briefly called attention to the beautiful marble busts of Miss Willard and Mrs. Carse, placed in permanent position for the first time that day. Mrs. A. V. Danforth, president of the Chautauqua County W. C. T. U., being unable to be present, sent her admirable presentation of the fountain which was read by Miss Johnson, financial secretary of the Board of Temple Trustees, and most graciously accepted by Mrs. Carse, its president.

After singing "Onward, Christian Soldier," the company adjourned to the corridor, where Miss Willard made one of her brief, inimitable speeches, ending with,

"'Jesus the water of life will give,
Freely, freely, freely.'

Thank God for the noble work already done, and may we do still more in His name who said, 'Whosoever drinketh of the water I shall give him shall never thirst.'"

Just as she uttered these words, the silver sound of running water was heard, the silken stars and stripes were drawn aside by means of the white ribbon in Miss Willard's hands, and the exquisite Chautauqua fountain looked out in all the glory of its alabaster and marble and bronze and the beauty of its sparkling water.

But the evening meeting! The pen must be tipped with flame which shall fittingly record it, and give to the great white ribbon host the impulse of its inspiration.

The Boys' Brigade, one hundred and fifty in number, escorted Miss Willard, Miss Gordon and Mrs. Carse from the residence of the latter to the First Congregational church; then formed in a double column down the center aisle while the ladies passed through to the platform. There was the glad burst of welcome, the applause long and deep, the Chautauqua salute and the inspiration of glad faces everywhere to welcome our great leader to her own home city.

The Adams trio, of Evanston, sang, "Home again from a foreign shore." Mrs. S. M. I. Henry read for a Scripture lesson the 25th chapter of Isaiah, and Dr. Delano led in prayer.

Mrs. Carse in her introductory remarks among other happy things said: "Nothing is too good for a reformer, and we feel that in welcoming this greatest of reformers we give far less than she deserves when giving of our best." She then introduced the first speaker of the evening, Mrs. Louise S. Rounds, the beloved president of the Illinois W. C. T. U., who gave a most inspiring address on behalf of the sixteen thousand women of that organization. She said in part:

I count myself happy to-night in being first on the long list of friends, who, in the presence of this magnificent and representative audience will extend to the honored and beloved leader of the World's white ribbon army—Miss Frances E. Willard—a glad and earnest "Welcome Home."

We meet to celebrate not only the return of one whose long absence brought to our hearts daily regrets and often anxious fears,—all of which are now so happily ended,—but we also come to congratulate her upon this glad anniversary of her birthday.

It matters little where a man is born if so be he is "well born." Perchance to only a comparative few is the birthplace of Frances Willard known, but all the world knows that she was "well born,"—born to the sublime mission and difficult task of being the leading reformer of the age! Where she has lived and what she has done are facts and flowers of history to be further enriched, we fondly hope, by many more years of noble deeds and kindly ministrations.

If, however, "earth's fanatics make heaven's saints," then do we need as never before to tether our Chieftain more securely by all the chords of love to a work on earth whose plummet sounds the depths of the drink craze and curse until settled and satisfactory prohibition laws shall follow the bands of ribbon white "around the world, around the world!"

Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, on behalf of the World's and National union, gave a wonderfully eloquent address, a part of which will appear in our next issue.

Miss Sudduth welcomed the editor-in-chief of THE UNION SIGNAL on behalf of that organ and of the W. T. P. A. as a whole, and presented a copy of "A Great Mother," beautifully bound in white morocco and gold, with exquisitely designed inscriptions and the autographs of the one hundred and nine men and women making up the W. T. P. A. force, from business manager to office boy.

Miss Mary Mahon, secretary of the Y Branch of the Illinois W. C. T. U., graciously extended the greetings of that division of our great army. Her fitting remarks will be given at another time.

A uniquely beautiful feature then followed in the introduction of fifty-five little girls dressed in white, each carrying an American Beauty rose, one for each year of Miss Willard's life, who marched down the aisle and formed in front of the platform. One of their number, little Mary Hastings, then stepped to the front and recited a poem of welcome in which she put so much soul-expression that it was a real marvel to all. The entire number then burst forth into a song, and scattering their roses at Miss Willard's feet, left the room in a whirlwind of applause.

Judge C. C. Bonney gave an admirable address on behalf of the citizens of Chicago, which will appear in full in next week's paper.

On behalf of the clergy Dr. John Henry Barrows said:

It is certainly an honor to speak for my fellow ministers of Chicago for they are too busy fighting the devil to fight each other. It is an honor to speak for them on any occasion for they cannot be excelled anywhere; they make good teachers, good preachers and once in a while like my friend, Dr. Clarke, of the Civic Federation, over there, they make good policemen. But it is my special privilege to speak for the clergy, the Protestant, Catholic, Hebrew and Liberal associations in this city, to Miss Willard, hoping that she may continue the great work of social reform to which she has consecrated her earlier youth and now her second and older youth. She has worked with these ministers, has coöperated in working against the forces of evil, and has touched American life on every hand and has become one in heart with all Christianity.

I suppose Miss Willard had more invitations to speak at the World's Congresses than any other woman in the world. One year ago last night the Parliament of Religions closed in a burst of song with a happy greeting from twelve hundred millions of our human brothers, and I wish Miss Willard could have stood beside Julia Ward Howe and listened to the glorious strains of the Hallelujah Chorus. This meeting seems to be a prolongation of the Parliament of Religions. We have different religions; we do not belong to the same sect, and yet we are one in heart, one in our praises of the energy and courage, the consecration and self-sacrifice with which Miss Willard has devoted her life to God and her native land and now to the great Motherland and to the whole wide world.

It was especially fitting that the welcome on behalf of the educators should have been given by Dr. Henry Wade Rogers, president of Miss Willard's own Northwestern University. His address will be given later.

The entire audience felt as deep a disappointment as the one expressed by Chairman Dickie, who was to have appeared next, extending the welcome of the Prohibition party. His telegram announced the detention of his train and his inability to reach Chicago before 10:30 that night.

Mr. W. J. Onahan, of the Catholic Total Abstinence Society, next extended the greetings of that organization in words as finely cut as his own cameo-like face—but as warm and glowing as a Methodist camp-meeting. We will endeavor to give parts of his address in another issue.

The Adams trio then sang a song of jubilee which so voiced the pitch to which the audience had been exalted, that it was with difficulty the applause could be restrained in consideration of the rapidly passing moments.

Mr. F. E. Page, president of the Chicago Christian Endeavor society, presented the greeting of two million young Endeavorers, reminding Miss Willard of her own enthusiastic greeting by them in the great Cleveland convention last July.

Mr. W. H. Madden, in a straightforward, manly, ringing speech, presented the greeting of the Illinois Federation of Labor—himself its president.

Mrs. Franc E. Finch, wife of the ever-to-be-lamented John B. Finch, presented the greetings of the Good Templars of the country. Lack of space alone prevents a full report of this cordial welcome.

Mr. James Corrothers gave a most touching, eloquent blending of fact, fancy and prophecy on behalf of the colored people.

The members of the Boys' Brigade, also two companies of the Girls' Brigade, then marched to the front, while Prof. O. C. Grauer gave some interesting facts of its history, as well as its welcome to Miss Willard. All then joined in singing the L. T. L's Marseillaise Hymn—Miss Willard's own—"Saloons Must Go."

Mrs. Ellen Henrotin and Miss Ada Sweet were expected to be present to represent, respectively, the National Federation of Women's Clubs, and the Woman's Club of Chicago. Each sent a warm personal letter explaining her unavoidable detention. Mrs. Kells then read a few of the numerous letters and telegrams which had poured in from all points of the country from distinguished men and women.

Again a delightful ripple of enthusiasm swept over the audience as a bouquet of beautiful white roses made its way to the platform carried by a child as beautiful as they, Dorothy Horning, the granddaughter of Mrs. Helen M. Barker, who in a bright little poem written by the editor of the Young Crusader, presented the bouquet to Miss Anna Gordon on behalf of the L. T. L. Taking the child by the hand Miss Gordon stepped to the front of the platform and said:

It is sweet indeed to be welcomed by the lips of a little child, and she represents five hundred thousand boys and girls who march under the banner, "Tremble, King Alcohol, we shall grow up." Oh! I had such a lovely speech to make you about the children and about Miss Willard, but should you put seventeen wreaths of praise upon her brow I will only say after seventeen years of close companionship with her, that from the depths of my heart I know she deserves every word of it, and I believe her crowning characteristic is her genuineness.

The long expected had at last arrived and when Miss Willard arose to respond, the enthusiasm of the audience found vent in a welcome loud and long. In her own wonderful way she recognized each one who had spoken, blending the whole together in a marvelous word mosaic. Leaving out the more personal parts for which our limited space is not adequate, she said:

DEAR FRIENDS:—I have at last adjusted my mind to this occasion. It took me a considerable length of time. At first I was very shamefaced, but then it popped into my head at last that this is all a case of composite photograph. These dear, kind, noble friends who have spoken out of the affluence of their own generous natures have seen in one whom they trusted the charm and quality and the gifts of more women than I could count. You have endowed me in your thoughts with the dauntlessness of a Carse, with the brilliancy of a Rounds, with the statesmanship of a Woodbridge, with the "Marshal Ney" qualities of a Barker, with the Boanerges vigor of a Hoffman, with the massive might of a Lathrap; you have just seen us all in one, and so you have talked to the lot! It is the white ribbon that makes us all seem fair; we have borrowed of its lustre and of its love and of its purity. And so, taking this view, I don't feel very much embarrassed.

I did not know I had lived so long till those little girls went slowly down the aisle, and I whispered to Mrs. Rounds, "That is lengthened sweetness long drawn out." Yet I never felt more chipper in my life. I never felt more as if I could "run through a troop and leap over a wall."

You don't know how proud I felt when the Boys' Brigade came marching along with drum and flag and marshaled us over as a guard of honor all the way from Mrs. Carse's house. With all the hope and confidence that I have in the white-ribbon people nothing has more encouraged me than to know that these young folks are coming with their light steps—you know they don't use any liquor or bad words—and it makes an old lady glad to have them honor the cause and her.

I like the light let in on Old Tammany by the Lexow committee; I like the Civic Federation in Chicago; I believe that when good men are standing up and good women side by side with them to let in the Diogenes lantern turned to an electric light, on the saloons, gambling houses and other kindred abominations of our cities it is not a time to be disheartened. It is time to say, "God is moving among these dry bones. He sent upon us great calamities, strikes, financial troubles, but they gave us such a shaking up that we began to say, "Neighbor, where is your hand? Let me get hold of it in an honest, sturdy clasp, and let us make all this different." And the people who care for home and for purity and righteousness are clasping hands in America to-day and all around the world as they have never done before.

I had a letter this morning from a sweet woman who said, "What shall be the stimulating force in these degenerate times? Shall it not be Christ?" And I had another letter from a labor leader to whom I had written to ask what were the best books and papers to study that I might better understand the movement, and he wrote naming various books, papers and pamphlets. But he closed with the words: "Our great text-book is the New Testament!" Now when the hard hand of toil is turning over the pages of the New Testament, when the National flag floats over the school-house, when the Loyal Temperance music keeps time to the company's music of "saloons must go," I, as a Christian and a patriot, with a strong sense upon me of renewed health and the confidence and the affection of a great rallying host, believe we are going forth, we who represent all these saving influences "fair as the moon, bright as the sun, terrible as an army with banners." Nothing has touched me more to-night with all the gracious words that have been uttered here than when these brothers sang, "Jubilee, Jubilee, Jubilee come!" I said then in my heart, "By God's grace I'll help it come" and so will we all!

It was nearly eleven o'clock when the audience bowed in the hush of Dr. Goodwin's closing prayer and left the church with the feeling of having scaled a veritable Transfiguration mountain.

MINNESOTA.

STATE CONVENTION.

Being unable to attend our annual feast, and failing to secure the local papers from Windom, the place of the convention, the writer is indebted to the reports sent the Journal of this city, by Miss Martha Scott Anderson, an able young journalist and daughter of Mrs. A. T. Anderson, Minnesota's first state W. C. T. U. president.

Mention was made in these columns not long since of the temperance temple being built in Windom, the first in this state. It had been hastened to completion in order that the convention might meet in it. The original plan had been increased in magnitude by the aid and encouragement of the honorary members, until a fine auditorium is the result. It is arranged on the amphitheater plan, with gallery, and will seat about seven hundred, and it goes without saying that the local union had made it beautiful with plants and flowers and banners.

The first session was devoted largely to setting the wheels in motion for the business of the convention. Mrs. L. F. Ferro, state organizer, gave some encouraging words from her observations of the work, and Mrs. E. S. Wright, corresponding secretary, made her reports; two hundred and thirty-five local unions were reported, which, considering how seriously the hard times have affected our ranks, is hopeful.

The first evening was occupied by addresses of welcome and responses. Mrs. Helen Gillam voiced Windom's greeting and Mrs. Bessie L. Scoville responded. Rev. Mr. Savage gave the welcome for the churches in a happy manner, and Mrs. Wilson, of Madelia, spoke for the district. Mrs. Emily Merritt, president of two districts combined in one, and Mrs. Crawford heartily acknowledged the cordial words.

The morning's program on the second day consisted of reports from the districts given by the presidents. Lu Verne, in district number five, has made wonderful temperance progress during the year, through a gospel temperance union inaugurated by Evangelist Cooper, who was employed by the W. C. T. U. From this nucleus in Lu Verne, fifteen societies have been organized in the county. District number six has had more lectures than ever before and some excellent work has been done. Mrs. O. C. Gregg, president of the ninth district, which includes Minneapolis, made special mention of the outing work whereby over three hundred children have been given a week or two of country life. In this work the newspapers have aided generously, both by frequent notices and reports of the work, and by popular subscriptions for the cause.

Superintendents of several departments also reported. Mrs. A. C. McCurdy, in charge of prison and jail work, urged more study of prison reform and more attention to the jails, where the smaller number of prisoners caused them to be overlooked and neglected, and particularly desired efforts to be put forth to induce ministers to preach on some related topic on prison Sunday. Mrs. Effie Burgan reported that large quantities of literature have been sent to the camps by many of the unions. Mrs. L. W. Irvine made a report on Sabbath-school work. Under Mrs. Irvine's able management this department has assumed greater importance and accomplished more than ever before. In St. Paul, Mrs. Irvine's home, the quarterly temperance Sabbath is made a day of energetic work by very many of the churches, and the "Sabbath-school rally" as a feature of the work has been very successful. A mammoth one in St. Paul's large auditorium had an audience of ten thousand, while many were turned away. Another was held in Stillwater, of which it was said that no such sight had ever been seen.

In the afternoon occurred the memorial service for departed friends, conducted by Mrs. Scoville. Many touching tributes were paid to those who had passed on before. In the evening an address was given by Mrs. S. M. D. Fry, of Dodge Center, on how the evasion of prohibition can be prevented. Opinions of Attorney-General Child were read in which he stated that an effective prohibitory law, either for general application or local option, can be framed. The suggested law in the form of a petition was read and the signatures of the men present who approved of it, were secured. Only voters' signatures will be affixed to this petition which will be presented to the state legislature this coming winter. The desired law is so framed as to provide against the sale at wholesale and in original packages.

Thursday morning a conference on hygienic dress was conducted by Mrs. Scoville, who showed samples of and explained the Jenness-Miller system. Later Mrs. Fry spoke on scientific temperance instruction, on which subject she has wide knowledge, having been closely associated with Mrs. Hunt. Mrs. Fry's address caused an intense interest.

Mrs. Irvine gave her report of the work in the tenth district, of which she is president. There has been a greater recognition of the W. C. T. U. than ever before by both press and people. A very successful district convention was recently held (a report of this will appear later, having been delayed in reaching me); Mrs. M. H. Oestergren, of Duluth, in charge of the Scandinavian work, reported that it is growing rapidly. The great need now, in her opinion, is a temperance paper in their own language which shall translate the news of the National and state organs and add something in regard to the work among themselves.

"Our Encouragements" was an ably handled paper by Mrs. M. C. Engstrom, who mentioned the growth of public sentiment against the saloon, the recognition of temperance in school and press, the good citizenship movement.

The afternoon and evening meetings were the Y's convention, presided over by their own secretary, Mrs. Bessie L. Scoville, "a host in herself," as one of their number calls her. The afternoon meeting included a consecration service, conducted by Miss Martha S. Anderson, of Minneapolis, response to roll-call of unions and reports from each. The topics, "How to Maintain Enthusiasm in Local Unions" and "Flower Mission Work" aroused the most animated discussions of the session. An excellent paper on "Our Tools," by Miss Jennie Calvert, of Viola, was read by Miss Patchin, of the same place. In the evening a letter from Mrs. Frances J. Barnes was read, and Mrs. Scoville gave an address, using as her text, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" She enumerated the various young people's societies as an evidence that many young people are early following the Master's example and doing earnest work instead of indulging in frivolities.

On Friday morning occurred the election of officers, always a time of interest, and this year even more than usual, for some changes must be effected. For thirteen years Mrs. Harriet Hobart has led Minnesota's W. C. T. U. At as many conventions she has been elected by very large majorities, and during the years has made many, very many, friends. And now the time had come when she positively must refuse to allow her name to be used for the election. The failing health of both herself and her husband, a staunch old hero of early Minnesota Methodism, combined with the removal to Wisconsin of the state corresponding secretary, Mrs. E. S. Wright, so long Mrs. Hobart's co-worker, made the burden too great for the fragile little tenement of clay that holds the intrepid spirit and she must lay it down. Mrs. Wright's removal, too, made the place she has so long and ably filled, vacant, and necessitated another change. For president the choice of the convention fell upon Mrs. Susan M. D. Fry, whose lecture on Wednesday evening had pointed her out as a suitable leader for the legislative work which must be done this winter. Mrs. Fry is a graduate of Oxford Female College, took her A. M. degree at Ohio Wesleyan University, and her Ph. D. at Syracuse University. For fifteen years she held the chair of Belles Lettres in the Wesleyan University at Bloomington, Ill., and she had charge of the department of English in Minnesota State University during the recent year's absence of the regular professor. Mrs. A. C. McCurdy, former recording secretary, was made corresponding secretary; Mrs. C. S. Soule was reëlected treasurer, and Mrs. Bessie L. Scoville made recording secretary. Mrs. Scoville was also appointed editor of the White Ribboner, which will be removed from Minneapolis to Duluth. Mrs. Chase, former editor, resigned to accept a position on another paper.

CONVENTION NOTES.

Waseca was chosen as the place for the next state convention.

The banners were awarded as follows: For increase in white-ribboner subscriptions, to second district; Scandinavian work, Duluth; Y's banner, Duluth.

Thursday evening a grand gold medal contest was to have taken place, but owing to the absence of one speaker, the medal could not be awarded, and a prize was given instead to Miss Hanson, of Windom.

Mrs. D. L. Williams, of St. Paul, as fraternal delegate from the Catholic Total Abstinence society, presented greetings, expressing a desire for a closer union. She was cordially received with a Chautauqua salute. Mrs. Irvine was appointed fraternal delegate to the C. T. A.

Excellent music was furnished during Wednesday's session by Mrs. Effie Burgan, of Princeton; George H. Henslow, Mrs. Fred Buss and Miss Nellie C. Green, of Windom, and Mr. and Mrs. Orlando Bailey.

And now for a year of hard, energetic, progressive work. Legislative work will claim especial attention during the winter. Let temperance instruction be looked after, training the future legislators. Press workers can greatly aid by judicious work. And above all, evangelistic work, prayer-meetings of one in every W. C. T. U. home, from which we shall come forth to labor more abundantly and effectively for God and Home and Humanity.

MISSOURI.

CONVENTION DAYS.

Some very interesting reports are coming in from the annual rallies and "round-ups" of white-ribboners in various districts, and tempting programs are at hand for some that will be held later in the month. All speak eloquently of the earnest zeal and faithfulness of our local workers and the strength and ability of the district organizations.

The eighth annual convention of the tenth district met in Louisiana, August 30 and 31, with all officers present. Welcome addresses were given by the local W. C. T. U. and by all the missionary societies of the town. Discussion upon the topics "How can we spread W. C. T. U. sentiment," and "How can we make our local unions more efficient," brought forth many valuable ideas. Y evening was heartily enjoyed. Devotions were conducted by one of the Y's and another sang a solo with guitar accompaniment. Mrs. Belle Kimball, our state superintendent of parlor work, gave a very interesting talk on that helpful line of effort. Mrs. F. E. Kizer, of Louisiana, was elected president for the coming year with an able corps of assistants.

A most important factor in the success and inspiration of all the conventions herewith reported was the presence and help of our fearless and peerless state leader, Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman, to whose courage and devotion to the work, its growth throughout the state is so largely due. Besides her many helpful suggestions and general assistance, she gave addresses on one or more evenings at each convention, the one upon "The money question, or the cause of hard times" arousing especial enthusiasm.

The first convention of the twenty-second district was held at Lamar, Barton county. Delegates were present from ten unions, and very earnest and enthusiastic work was done. A full list of officers was chosen, led by Miss A. H. Frey, of Butler, for president. Miss Frey has just been making a tour through a part of her district, visiting Alba, Carterville, Carl Junction, Carthage, Oronogo, Joplin and Webb City, helping much to encourage and build up the work. Mrs. R. B. Hull, of Carthage, state evangelistic superintendent, is now vice-president for Jasper county, and much blessing and prosperity is confidently expected from her leadership.

The eighth district held its annual convention in Marceline, Linn county, August 28 and 29. The four counties of this district were all well represented by delegates from the various unions, and an exceedingly profitable meeting was had, the influence of which will surely be manifest by an increased impetus in local work during the coming year. There were two papers of special note upon the subjects "Equal Suffrage" and "Our Outlook," and many took part in an interesting discussion on "Woman's Sphere." Mrs. E. A. P. Hayes, of Brookfield, as president, heads the list of officers for the ensuing year. Superintendents for seven departments were appointed, and pledges for district work amounting to fifty dollars were given. A Demorest contest, finely rendered, was the special entertainment of one evening, six young ladies giving the recitations to an appreciative audience. The convention of 1895 will meet in Moberly.

The second annual convention of the first district met at Memphis, Scotland county, August 23, 24, with delegates present from all unions but two. Seven superintendents of departments were present with reports, and written reports were sent in by two superintendents who could not attend. Much good work was reported, and more planned for the coming year. Memphis union visited the county poor farm and had a picnic supper with the inmates, together with an evangelistic service. Flower mission work has also been done at Luray. Nine-tenths of the churches in the district are shown to be using unfermented wine. The financial showing was good, the district expenses having been paid, and fifty dollars given to state work. Reports came from Christian Endeavor and Epworth League societies, desiring instruction as to methods of doing temperance work. The press superintendent reported space secured in every paper in the district. Y work, narcotics, and other lines were brought prominently before the convention by able papers. Mrs. Sadie C. Nutter was made president, and Lancaster selected for the next place of meeting.

Maysville reported excellent work two months ago, that, through some mistake, was credited to Maryville, as was also a contribution sent by them to the Temple fund. Maysville has recently held two public temperance meetings, one of them during the Teachers' Institute. Professor Norton, of the Kirksville State Normal School, and Judge Rogers, of Maysville, very earnestly presented the subject of scientific temperance to the teachers assembled. The union has also had a grand lecture from Dr. Brumbaugh, of Kansas, his subject, "Shall the Rum Traffic Rob and Rule America?" and every sentence a center shot. Rev. Mr. Nicholson, of the Christian church, is a most helpful friend and member of the W. C. T. U., often adding members to the Maysville union, and fearlessly denouncing saloon petition signers. Rev. Mr. Walton and Rev. Mr. Shackleford have also given earnest assistance, particularly in gospel temperance meetings.

The energetic Y of Cole Camp, beginning with seven members a year ago, has grown to a membership of fifty-one. They conduct a fine L. T. L., will soon hold their second Demorest contest, find parlor meetings their most available way of creating public interest for temperance work, and hope, God helping them, to do much good work the coming year.

Very successful contests have recently been held in Wellsville, Warrenton and Louisiana. Indeed, it seems as if the contest bells were continually ringing, and the good that shall spring from the seed thus widely sown, who can measure?

Butler has been doing steady work, making a specialty of mothers' meetings, parliamentary drills and flower mission visits to the jail, the poor, sick and needy. One lost girl has been found and rescued from a life of shame by this union, but so physically wrecked by sin and suffering that the end of life seems very near.

Sedalia union has done a fearless thing which ought to be a pattern for all Missouri unions to follow. Believing that the men or women who sign saloon petitions and so fasten this evil upon the community ought not to be able to hide away their names in a county court record that is never looked at, the W. C. T. U. of Sedalia have secured the publication in the Sedalia public press of the entire list of petitioners as they appear upon the court record for all the Sedalia saloons, so that public (dis) honor may be given and responsibility be shown to rest where they belong. The W. C. T. U. of Clinton have joined with the Anti-saloon army in a like publication for that place of the names of saloon petitioners in the form of circulars which have been sown broadcast by thousands. Let us bravely "turn on the light" in God's name everywhere, and call on all who love God and home and human souls to help wipe out the unspeakable liquor evil.

IDAHO.

STATE CONVENTION.

The W. C. T. U. of Idaho is not dead, though so long silent. Through heat and cold, storm and sunshine, we have battled on during the last year. In May we held a very successful district convention at Moscow, North Idaho. A good program was presented, full of interest along the lines of the departments taken up.

The district of Eastern Idaho held its convention at Blackfoot, August 22, which most opportunely had the pleasure of the presence and help of David Tatum for the first evening. Interesting papers and a question-box well conducted were some of the features of this convention.

The state convention convened in Boise City, September 14. The Baptist church was beautifully decorated for the occasion, and the gathering hosts, though few in number, received a warm welcome, not only in the homes but in the addresses given in the evening. The union, pastors and Prohibition Club all gave us a most hearty welcome, which made us feel that a few know that we are "the salt of the earth." After welcomes and songs of cheer, the president read her annual address, after which the choir sang about a man they were looking for who would vote as he prayed.

Saturday morning a consecration meeting was held; though few came in for this service it was a precious season, and all felt that it was good to draw near the Lord, and ask that they might receive. With business, reports and papers, by superintendents of departments, the day was crowded full. In the evening a large audience gathered to hear the contestants for the gold medal, and blows were dealt, with ungloved hands, by a class of six young girls, for home protection and prohibition, that did all our souls good. The medal was awarded to Miss Barshear, of Middleton.

Sunday morning the president accompanied our superintendent of prison work and a number of our delegates to the state's prison, where a very interesting service was held, almost every prisoner thanking us and asking that we come again. Sunday afternoon a children's meeting was held, with two short talks and singing, followed by a memorial service for our late beloved president, Mrs. Sarah H. Black, and five others of our faithful few who have been promoted during the past year. Sunday evening short addresses were made by the pastor and others.

Monday morning we listened to reports of committees and election of officers. All too soon the parting came, when our little tested band must say to each other, "God be with you till we meet again." And so the eighth annual convention of the Idaho W. C. T. U. is a thing of the past, but faith and hope and courage are still ours, with a great unsown field where the gospel plow and sturdy hands to hold it must break up this stony ground and cast in the seed ere we can hope for a great harvest. Much unreported work has been done, our trials are many, our victories few, but with the Lord on our side we will not surrender, though financial, political and social lions crush and growl and slay. We will keep our faces toward the goal, holding fast His hand who leads us on to death for right or victories won.

New officers:—Rebecca Mitchell, Idaho Falls, president; Eva C. Barton, Caldwell, vice-president; Cora Gage, Blackfoot, recording secretary; Mary E. McGee, corresponding secretary, Nampa; S. E. Crow, Idaho Falls, treasurer.

A BIT OF MODERN CRUSADING.

One of our Somerset county unions has been making it uncomfortable for the violators of our prohibitory law in their town. Mrs. Evans, president of the Madison union, thus describes the beginning of the campaign in that place: "We had prosecuted five men for liquor selling, and the trial was to come off the next day, but the Lord stood by us and gave us strength to go through it all. Mrs. Butler and myself were the complainants, and we did not know how we should come out. The union was called together for prayer before we went to court, and we thought of the old Cursaders. We met at three and adjourned till six o'clock that Mr. Hovey might be with us. We were so glad when he wrote us that he could come, for if he had not we should have lost our case. At an early hour the hall was filled to overflowing and the deepest interest was felt by all, some that the rumsellers might go free, others that the victory might turn on the side of temperance and right. The men were convicted of single sale and fined fifty dollars and costs by the judge. We were sorry the fine was not larger, for justice called for a more severe punishment. As the union went in a body from my home to the hall, afternoon and evening, idlers looked upon us with sarcastic glances, but it made no difference to us. We were too intent on business to care for trifles. But when the criminals, one by one, took their seats, our whole soul went out in pity for them, for we saw them in their sins as they did not see themselves. The affair has made a great stir in our community. The high sheriff was with us also, and we had another lawyer at our command at the table. Two of the witnesses left the court and we have been after them to-day. Have not learned the results of officers' work. It is a hard, unpleasant task to punish one of your nearest neighbors, and I have longed so much that they might see the evil of their ways and turn to God."

But the end was not yet. Arrests were made for search and seizure, and several hundred dollars worth of liquors were captured. Three of the culprits were hotel-keepers who, desiring to gain the toleration of the business men, closed their hotels to the public. But the white-ribboners were just a little too sharp for them. They opened a temperance hotel and secured pledges from more than sixty of the most prominent persons in the place, including the ministers, physicians and lawyers who signed a contract to support the women and if necessary, to open their own homes for the accommodation of guests. It has been a trying ordeal, but the union laid its plans wisely, has done a grand work and is warmly commended by all good citizens.

GENERAL ITEMS.

Circumstances beyond our control have delayed news that should have reached Headquarters at a much earlier date.

County and district conventions have been held as well as unions visited by the state president and recording secretary, proving the days are not half long enough to accomplish all our desires in the work of reform. The duty of our women at the polls next November is absorbing the attention of all, and their fealty to the W. C. T. U. should impel a strict adherence to the first principles of our organization, and not fear to proclaim them at the ballot box.

Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman, of Missouri, has won many laurels over the state through her clear, logical and fearless utterances for prohibition, in her addresses on "Our Country's Needs" and "What Legacy to the Future?" In Leadville, where one of the Denver workers has been summering, Mrs. Kittie Scouller writes: "The temperance element of Leadville are having their first fight on the saloons. A petition for Sunday closing signed by 1,000 voters was presented to the city council, and sans ceremonie, laid on the table until a future meeting. This city of 1,300 inhabitants has eighty saloons." Mrs. Scouller has formed two classes for Demorest medal contests, in the Presbyterian and Methodist churches.

The unions in Arapahoe county united in a service of consecration and prayer for the success of prohibition at the fall election. This meeting was held in the Central Christian church of Denver, and leaders were appointed, conducting a service of fifteen minutes each. Mrs. M. A. Cassell, president of the county union, has been compelled to rest awhile, owing to ill health, and her absence is greatly deplored from our social and business conferences. The union is to be congratulated, however, in having a faithful and efficient vice-president, Mrs. W. H. Wrigley.

The annual convention of the Colorado W. C. T. U. will be held in Denver October 18-21, and able co-workers, with Mrs. Wrigley as their commander-in-chief, will entertain the delegates and visitors in the name of the Arapahoe county W. C. T. U.

At the prohibition county convention, Mrs. Wrigley was nominated for state senator, and for representatives, Mesdames E. M. Craise, William Hicks and Sarah L. C. Teetor. The state reporter was absent from the city at the time of this convention, and while en route home, learned of this unexpected honor and herein reiterates her determination to stand firm as the adamantine rocks for the principles of the Crusade days of twenty years ago.

The Southern district held its annual convention at Cripple Creek, and the attendance was quite large. Miss Helen A. Dewey, of Colorado Springs, is the efficient president. Delegates were present from Pueblo, Monument, Colorado Springs and adjacent towns. Mrs. Eva C. Higgins, president of the Colorado W. C. T. U. and Mrs. Sarah L. C. Teetor, state recording secretary, were also in attendance upon the convention, and aided by their counsel and coöperation. Mr. John Hipp, of Denver, addressed an open-air meeting on the public square, where were assembled more than five hundred persons, who listened attentively to his subject, "Effects of Alcohol on the Brain." The election of officers for the ensuing year then followed.

It was decided to recommend to the next annual state convention the abolishment of districts, and favor more county work.

Boulder county union is doing aggressive work with their newly-elected officers. A strong resolution was sent to the county commissioners, condemnatory of their action granting a license for a saloon near Longmont, when that city cast a majority vote of 187 against the liquor element. The resolution also included a request to revoke the license. The Y's of Loveland, numbering ten active and many honorary members, with Miss Mabel McCreery, president, have opened a reading-room that is well equipped with the literature of the day. Number of books and periodicals, 400. The rent of the room is paid by monthly collections or donations of twenty-five cents to one dollar. Miss Mary Pennoyer is the superintendent, and untiring in the discharge of her duties, keeping the room open on week days from half-past nine in the morning to half-past nine in the evening, and on Sunday from two to six in the evening. Loveland has no saloons, and this is truly a refreshment for the mind and a haven of rest for the tired body. We wish that every town and hamlet of Colorado was so favored.

A memorial service for Miss Adelaide Sherman, late railroad evangelist in the National W. C. T. U., was held at the noon hour in the Union Pacific car shops, Denver. Mrs. N. S. McCahey is the state and county W. C. T. U. superintendent of railroad work, and through her efforts this service was planned. Rev. R. M. Barnes, pastor of Simpson M. E. church, with his wife, and Mesdames Higgins, McGahey and Teetor assisted in the Scripture reading, singing and narrating the many virtues of Miss Addie Sherman, who passed away in the early summer at her Maryland home. Many of the railroad men cherish her memory, and her words of exhortation to them, during her recent visit in Denver, will never be forgotten.

More items will be gleaned of our general work in the near future.

EAST WASHINGTON.

TWELFTH ANNUAL CONVENTION.

Our annual meeting assembled in the Baptist church, Dayton, September 12. After a short season of devotion, conducted by Mrs. Julia B. Cole, of Walla Walla, the state president, the convention was formally opened and business begun.

After appointment of committees the reports of superintendents of department work were read and discussed. At eleven o'clock the president's annual address was given, and being fraught with beautiful, earnest thought and helpful plans and suggestions, carried conviction to the hearts of all and inspired the workers to better effort. During the morning session quite a number of visitors were present. The following clergymen were introduced to the delegates: Revs. C. R. La Mar, I. H. Wilson, Perry Chandler, Arthur Royce, each of whom received the Chautauqua salute, and replied by expressing themselves as heartily in sympathy and coöperation with the work of the W. C. T. U. Mesdames Iron and Edgington were introduced as new workers in the state, and made a few happy remarks.

Department work was resumed in the afternoon. As each of these divisions were reviewed and discussed much interest was manifest. A pleasant incident was that of the tying of the white ribbon on Baby Eddie Kendall, who, with his mother, was presented to the convention. There were many good points regarding the laws of Washington brought out by the discussions. Mr. and Mrs. Ashby, of Pomeroy, and Mrs. Range, of Dayton, were introduced to the convention. Mr. Ashby stated that the first woman who came to Pomeroy to organize a W. C. T. U. was going away in despair because no one would serve as officers. After learning the cause of her failure he told her to go ahead and organize and he would furnish a president; that he would go home and see his wife and if she refused to act he would "put on petticoats and be their president himself." It is needless to say the organization was effected. After a few remarks by Grandma Range—who was the oldest member present—prayer was offered by Mrs. Ida Patton Smith.

The evening session was one of special interest. The addresses of welcome by Hon. J. E. Edmiston, Rev. C. R. La Mar and Mrs. E. C. Bodwell were full of cheery welcome, earnest thought and helpful encouragement, and were happily responded to by Mrs. Jennie L. Green. The address of Mrs. Lydia A. Irons on the new but intensely interesting department of mercy was well delivered and as well received, while the music, in charge of Professor North, was an attractive feature at both evening sessions and elicited many appreciative and complimentary remarks.

meetings was read and discussed Thursday morning. The memorial services so tenderly led by Mrs. Claus revealed the fact that one by one our workers had been folding their hands over their gathered sheaves and answering the Master's call, "Come up higher." The saddest feature of this service was the account of the death of two young men of noble Christian character, honorary members of the Pullman union; close friends in life they met their death together by drowning and were buried in one grave.

The election of officers resulted in the election of Mrs. Delle C. H. Cox, president; Mrs. M. E. Claus, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Jennie L. Green, recording secretary; Mrs. Lucy R. Berry, treasurer. The utmost harmony and manifest love and affection prevailed among all the delegates.

Mrs. Cole of Walla Walla was unanimously reëlected and would gladly have been retained as the state president because of efficient service rendered but for her own conviction, which she stated clearly, that the present condition of the work demands a president who can take the field. At her request a unanimous vote was then cast for Mrs. Cox.

Several interesting papers were read, which with the question drawer, in charge of Mrs. Green, brought out many hits and much helpful information during the afternoon. The state quilt, a handsome silk one, planned several years since by Miss Grace Anderson, an invalid white-ribboner of Oakesdale, was exhibited, and Miss Anderson's self-sacrificing work spoken of by Ida Patten Smith, who has stood nobly by Miss Anderson in her work, finishing what the former was unable to complete. This quilt is made up of silk patches from all the unions and contains the names of most of the workers in the state. It will be on exhibition at the state fair, and will eventually revert to Miss Anderson. Mrs. Irons' talk to the children was of equal interest to the grown up folks and it is to be regretted that all the children in the city were not present.

It was found that an increased interest is being taken on all our lines of work and if any who read this report think our platform is not broad enough but needs another plank, please notify us of the fact and name the plank. While on the other hand don't think we can do nothing because we are trying to do everything. Reform means reform along all lines. Altogether our convention was a successful one and while the financial stress caused a small delegation the local attendance was very good and interest unflagging.

The last evening session was a contest interspersed with music and while the number of contestants fell below the limit, thus excluding the awarding of the gold medal, the following recitations were given and a beautiful pin awarded to the one who graded highest, while each of the others received a yearly subscription to Young Women.

"A Plea for the Fatherland," Miss O'Neil, of Walla Walla.

"A Cry for the Home," Miss Minnie Dixon, of Waitesburg.

"The World on Fire," Neva Long, of Dayton.

"The Drink Wolf and the Faithful Hound," Annie Hutcheons, of Dayton.

"High License the Monopoly of Abomination," Miss Minnie Rittenhouse.

Resolutions were passed on suffrage, Sabbath observance, mercy, relation of temperance to labor, enforcement of law, single standard of morals for both sexes, and railroad work, also the following resolution of thanks.

We hereby tender our hearty acknowledgments to the pastor and people of the church so hospitably opened to all our sessions; to those who met and conveyed us from the depot; to all who opened their hearts and homes for our entertainment, to the faithful few who decorated the church; to Professor North and others who kindly furnished the music; to the press for its offer to publish our reports, and to one and all who in any manner contributed to the success of our first convention at Dayton.

NEW YORK STATE NEWS.

Otsego county convention assembled at East Worcester, and was a pleasant and profitable gathering. There are but few unions in the county, and the membership is not large, but courage and enthusiasm are by no means lacking. At Oneonta they hope soon to erect a building; the site has been donated and several thousand dollars pledged toward the building. Several medal contests have been held, and prominent speakers have been secured in different localities for addresses, which have greatly helped the workers. A new committee on "extension" has been appointed, and a lively hope is entertained that this committee will push vigorously into new places until every village in the county shall have a live, aggressive W. C. T. U.

Cattaraugus county W. C. T. U. just closed an enthusiastic convention at Portville. The local union at that place has been compelled to build a home for itself, as the churches for a long time have been locked against it. The temple, with its commodious audience room, and convenient kitchen and parlors, not only reflects great credit on the enterprise of the women, but was found to be a "thing of joy" for convention purposes.

The convention received a hearty welcome from the clergy, and from a prominent citizen, with a thread running through each address, that our methods might not be quite perfect,—that suffrage was not needed, etc. Perhaps nothing is more amusing to those grown gray in the service, than hints and helps from those to whom our work is Choctaw. Mrs. Jennie Graves, of Franklinville, made an impromptu response with the grace and eloquence of a prepared address. No one was ever taken more by surprise than these gentlemen in finding themselves met by a cyclone on their own ground. A medal contest was held the first evening and on the second evening Miss Vandelia Varnum delivered an address, her subject being, "Who pays the freight?" She was very helpful in many ways during the convention in this, her home county.

The convention resolved to take higher ground, work more directly for Prohibition, put less time on non-essentials and strike with stronger blows for the thing for which the W. C. T. U. was organized.

The Clara M. Selkreg union of Ithaca entertained the Tompkins county convention, the sessions being held in the First M. E. church and meals served at a temperance eating house. Delegates were present from each of the thirteen unions, including all the county officers. Seventeen departments of work are taken up and each one reported progress. The president's address was warmly received and adopted. The treasurer reported a balance in the treasury which enables them to purchase a ship library. This state of affairs my reporter tells me is due largely to the department of systematic giving being so persistently kept before the unions.

A new feature introduced was a conference on the question, "What has the W. C. T. U. done for me?" The testimonies were very interesting. A tent was secured for headquarters on the fair ground where literature would be distributed and subscriptions taken for our state paper—Woman's Temperance Work, and THE UNION SIGNAL. The duty of taking these papers was also urged upon the delegates.

Mrs. Ella A. Boole, first vice-president of the state, was present during the entire convention, helping and encouraging in many ways, while her evening address was especially good, and was listened to by a large audience. Reports were all good, and a tender memorial service in honor of the six who have "gone home" during the year, was held. The closing exercises were impressive, and the convention adjourned with bright hopes and prospects.

A little report of some special work done by the Clara M. Selkreg union in Ithaca will not be out of place right here. On the day of the firemen's convention they placed seven barrels of ice water on the most crowded corners of the streets, and kept them filled. A minister of the city was asked for twenty-five cents toward the necessary funds and he replied that "he had nothing to give and did not care what was drank," while the county sheriff,—not a temperance man—gave the committee much valuable assistance in locating the barrels, and permission to call upon him for money if needed. He gave them one of the barrels (the others being loaned) which was placed near the speaker's stand in De Witt Park. The barrel will now be kept near the Y. M. C. A. building, and the secretary of that association will see that the water supply does not fail, while the union will furnish the ice. This is good practical temperance work.

Erie county W. C. T. U. met at North Collins. Every officer was present when the meeting was called to order. Every hour of the convention was filled with work, and a great variety of business, instruction and entertainment. The union at North Collins is but one year old, yet this "infant" had the courage to invite and entertain one of the largest conventions ever held in the county, and did it right royally. Owing to the poor health of Mrs. Shaw, the president, the annual address was given by the first vice-president, and was fine indeed.

Dr. Anna Shaw was speaker of the evening, and an immense audience greeted her, and was well rewarded for coming. A memorial service was conducted by the corresponding secretary. A golden ladder had been prepared for floral offerings, which were placed there as the names were called of nineteen active and two honorary members. The election of officers resulted in an entire change.

Niagara County W. C. T. U. held its annual convention at Wilson, a village on the shores of Lake Ontario—beautiful for situation, a veritable Eden—yet the trail of the serpent is over it all, and the people are asleep while souls are perishing. The convention was very warmly welcomed by Mrs. G. W. Adams, wife of the M. E. pastor, and by Rev. J. H. Sage, pastor of the Baptist church in which the meeting was held. A consecration service and Bible reading by Mrs. Emma G. Dietrick prepared our hearts for the work of the two days, and brought us into closer fellowship with the Master. Reports of superintendents were given, while reports of work done by locals were embodied in the annual report of the corresponding secretary. The treasurer reported a balance in the treasury of a little more than $275. This is explained by the fact that the county controls the dining and lodging privileges at Ontario Outing Park, and nearly $200 were cleared there this year. An invitation came to us (I say "us" in writing up Niagara county because "I belong") to serve also on the fair grounds during the county fair, and although the time for preparation was exceedingly short, it was decided to accept, as we could not afford to lose the opportunity of entering this open door, and so our "minute women" will be on the grounds and beside serving refreshments will have a tent for literature.

The county union and the county prohibition committee decided to issue a county paper to be known as The Life Line, and this is surely a step in the right direction. It has seemed sometimes as though we were forgetting that the chief work of our organization should be for the prohibition of the liquor traffic, and we are glad to join hands with our brothers in this new enterprise. Dr. Anna H. Shaw was present and delivered a ringing Prohibition speech. The president's annual address was well received. and accepted by a rising vote.

My last report comes from Oneida county. The convention was held at Sanquoit with about one hundred present. The county has twenty unions and two Y's. Good reports were given of work done by the unions and also in department work.

Mrs. Boole was at this convention and all listened with pleasure to her evening address. The second evening was given to the L. T. L's and an address on Y work. Mrs. Graves, corresponding secretary, made a powerful address on "The duty of members of missionary societies to the temperance work," and Mrs. Rinkle on literature, and Mrs. Dunham on the franchise question, made telling appeals.

The old officers were reëlected, much to the satisfaction of all, and the coming year promises hopefully, as a fresh supply of enthusiasm was received at this convention.

in time, if you are a sufferer from that scourge of humanity known as consumption, and you can be cured. There is the evidence of hundreds of living witnesses to the fact that, in all its early stages, consumption is a curable disease. Not every case, but a large percentage of cases, and we believe, fully 98 per cent. are cured by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, even after the disease has progressed so far as to induce repeated bleedings from the lungs, severe lingering cough with copious expectoration (including tubercular matter), great loss of flesh and extreme emaciation and weakness.

Do you doubt that hundreds of such cases reported to us as cured by "Golden Medical Discovery" were genuine cases of that dread and fatal disease? You need not take our word for it. They have, in nearly every instance, been so pronounced by the best and most experienced home physicians, who have no interest whatever in misrepresenting them, and who were often strongly prejudiced and advised against a trial of "Golden Medical Discovery," but who have been forced to confess that it surpasses, in curative power over this fatal malady, all other medicines with which they are acquainted. Nasty cod-liver oil and its filthy "emulsions" and mixtures, had been tried in nearly all these cases and had either utterly failed to benefit, or had only seemed to benefit a little for a short time. Extract of malt, whiskey, and various preparations of the hypophosphites had also been faithfully tried in vain.

The photographs of a large number of those cured of consumption, bronchitis, lingering coughs, asthma, chronic nasal catarrh and kindred maladies, have been skillfully reproduced in a book of 160 pages which will be mailed to you, on receipt of address and six cents in stamps. You can then write to those who have been cured and profit by their experience.

A SPECIAL OFFER.

As an award of merit, we will present to the headquarters of the state sending the largest number of new subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL, a handsomely framed, large-sized picture of Miss Willard, and to the state sending the second largest number a copy of Miss Willard's book, "A Great Mother." Be sure to state that the new subscribers are in response to Miss Willard's call in her lithograph letter, "It's dogged as does it."

DID YOU DO IT?

Then don't forget to tell us on a postal card, so that we may all learn how to win one new member to our cause and one more subscriber to our paper.

The New York Lexow investigating committee has entered another week of telling evidence against its police administration.

The state Woman's Suffrage Association met at Racine, Wis., last week with one hundred delegates present. Rev. Olympia Brown Willis was made president.

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, the last of the famous coterie of American poets, died suddenly from heart disease at his home in Boston Sunday afternoon. Dr. Holmes was for thirty-five years professor of anatomy in Harvard medical school, and an eminent prose writer as well as poet. He was born in 1809.

"I AM happy to be able to send you not only 'one' but two new subscribers with my own renewal and hope to send more in the future." That is the kind of letters we are getting nowadays and they rejoice our hearts. The time for this special work extends to the opening of the National Convention, November 16.

HASN'T this a cheerful sound? "It has been such a pleasure to secure these names (five) for 'our paper,' and so easy to do it, too, for THE UNION SIGNAL is an inspiration in itself, an uplift to women, and they are quick to see it. If it were not for ill-health and many home duties in a large family, this list could easily be made a large one, but as the good women come to me I will endeavor to swell your list with new names."

WE congratulate the women of the District of Columbia on the partial passage of the bill by which women can control the educational interests of the District. This is through the efforts of Senator Martin who championed the bill in its progress through the Senate, and he assures us of his confident belief that the bill will pass the House of Representatives at the next session. The District sets the fashion in many ways, and this will help the women in every state to manage the education of their children and keep the worthier classes of women in their fitting places of teachers.

MRS. HENRIETTA SKELTON, our faithful organizer, who has sent in nine subscribers from Arizona, writes: "I hope to do more before we come of age." Another friend sends with her own renewal, remittance for a new subscriber and says: "I have caught the spirit of 'It's dogged as does it.'" From Texas comes this encouraging promise: "As times are so hard I have made up my mind to get all the subscribers I can for our National organ. I cannot get along without my copy; it comes on Saturday and is our regular Sunday reading. When we settle down for our Sunday afternoon quiet hour, my husband gets the Bible and THE UNION SIGNAL; they go together."

To our great regret, the annual Call to Prayer, prepared by our National evangelist, Miss E. W. Greenwood, has reached us too late for insertion in this number, but we gladly give the introductory paragraphs on this page, and later will print the Call in full: "In view of the custom to hold a day of consecration and prayer previous to the Convention, the superintendent of the evangelistic department would hereby summon all local unions to set apart Wednesday, October 31, for this purpose. The continued blessings, not only of the past year, but of twenty-one years, may well lead us, as we celebrate our majority, to tune our voices to thanksgiving, while a profound sense of our failures, mistakes, weakness and dependence should lead us to bow low in confession and earnest prayer for the fresh anointing of the Spirit." Miss Greenwood has outlined a full program, which will be given next week.

MRS. MINERVA B. NORTON, whose name is so tenderly associated with our Chieftain's in joint authorship of that rare book, "A Great Mother," passed away at her home in Beloit, Wis., Tuesday evening, October 2. Mrs. Norton had been bravely battling with a fatal disease for a long time and when the end came it was joyfully accepted by her and all the dear ones as the triumphant victory of the spirit. By a special providence Miss Willard and Miss Gordon were both present, and although no words were spoken, the recognition of the dear friends was complete, and as Miss Willard led in audible prayer when the last breath was drawn, as she did at her own mother's bedside, the spirits of departed ones drew near, and it was a time of great spiritual exhilaration. The daughter, Miss Rilla Norton, whose contributions often grace our columns, will soon prepare a sketch of her mother's life, from which all our readers will profit.

THE temperance atmosphere is laden with the aroma of W. C. T. U. conventions these days. No less than sixteen have already been held during September and October, and three are in session this week. The Maine convention at Auburn had the rare pleasure of Lady Henry Somerset's presence, and the Iowa convention, of Miss Willard's wonderful inspiration. A telegram from the latter states that there were more than one hundred delegates, and that the old officers were all reëlected. Iowa has organized thirty-five new unions the past year, and is rapidly coming to be one of the foremost states of the National. Kansas speaks for itself in another paragraph. All these conventions will be fully reported in our Field department.

AT the North Dakota convention, held recently, Miss Elizabeth Preston, president, had a happy new departure, which we recommend to all our state presidents. It was called "Honoraries' Evening," and the addresses were all by gentlemen who are honorary members of the Y. W. C. T. U., the topic being, "What We Think of Woman's Ballot." There was also an address by an honorary member, subject, "The White-Ribbon Knight." On Sunday morning a white-ribbon love-feast was held, and on the closing day there was an address, "The Children in the Home and the School," by Mrs. Laura Eisenhuth, state superintendent of public instruction for North Dakota. We do not often find so many plums in the pudding of a state program as this one afforded.

A BREEZY note from Emporia, dated October 1, tells us that "Kansas has just closed its 16th annual convention. Six delegates besides her executive committee will represent us in the National at Cleveland. The most gratifying phase of the convention was the number of young, bright, active women participating. Rev. Edith Hill, the rising star of the state, Miss Helen Kimber, the sunny suffragist, Mrs. Burtis, the earnest young county president, and Jessie Maxey, the enthusiastic, active, newly elected corresponding secretary, are elected delegates to the National. Kansas is geographically in the center of the Union. In political, intellectual and educational activity she leads the van." Just now in the midst of the most determined and active campaign in her history for equal suffrage, she will be true to her motto, "Ad astra per aspera," and next year, with her women fully enfranchised, will invite and welcome to her borders the National W. C. T. U.

THE board of education in Chicago having voted to close the public schools on the afternoon of October 10, in order to permit such children as desired to participate in the street parade of Father Mathew's temperance day, the Germans of the city have made a strong protest. It is possible that the board would have rescinded their action in obedience to the behest of the German saloon-keepers and their sympathizers, if it were not technically impossible to do so except at a regular meeting, which does not occur until after the parade. This protest says: "We consider it contrary to the spirit of our liberal institutions to force the children of our citizens to observe a holiday devoted to the advancement of the prohibition movement. We are of the opinion that the temperance agitation is foreign to our public schools and should not be permitted to enter into their management." In view of the fact that the children were not to be "forced" nor even asked by the school board to participate in the parade, this language is a little strained. And considering the further fact that temperance instruction is mandatory in the schools of Illinois, by state law, this declaration of German citizens, that "temperance agitation is foreign to our public schools," is a rather startling one. The gist of the whole matter doubtless lies in the fact that the German saloon-keepers and patrons do not desire that their children be given an opportunity to witness a demonstration against their business and practice

GREETING.

BY H. A. DELANO.

[Opening poem at reception to Miss Willard in Chicago, September 28, 1894.]

Queen of all souls, who love and treasure home,
Friend of all hearts that struggle on alone,
Fighter of battles others leave or shrink,
Our Deborah—who dares the curses of the drink,
Relentless foe of crimes men dare not meet,
Prophet, whose eyes a better future greet,
Large heart, clear brain, full orbed to shine
Upon this night of ours—this evil time,
A million hearts join with us here and o'er the sea,
While at His throne our lips now pray for thee.

THE STRIKE OF DENNIS MORARITY.

BY J. F. COWAN.

"Where's your father, young man?" called a voice over the alley-fence.

"I don't know, sir," answered the boy who had just dumped down in the corner of the little backyard a small pile of coal which he had spent the entire morning picking up along the railway tracks.

"Isn't he in the shop?"

"No, he's on the strike."

"Oh, well, then I know just where to find him," answered the man. "He's down at Jim Brody's place."

The boy raised his head as though about to make some angry reply, and a hot flush mounted to his cheeks, but the next moment his head dropped and he remained silent while the man went his way. He knew perfectly well what his errand was with his father. He was a collector employed by a number of the small tradesmen in that part of the city to look after outstanding bills. He had gone but a few rods, however, before he suddenly stopped, turned back, and approaching the fence, leaned over it, holding in his outstretched hand a paper. "Here," he said, "I was going to try and collect on this, but I suppose it's no use if your father is on a strike, so I'll just write the word 'strike' across it and turn it in. This is pay day, but it's no use to try to collect of a man who has nothing coming to him. Your mother couldn't do anything with this, I reckon?"

"No, sir," answered Dennis, with a tremor of something in his voice,—it may have been shame, it may have been fear, it may have been indignation—"but if you don't mind letting me have it," he continued, "I'll see what can be done, rather than have it turned in as worthless."

"If you could manage to pay something on it," said the man, as he turned on his heel to leave, "of course it would save your credit; otherwise I don't know what the result will be. These store-keepers can't carry forever customers who don't pay anything on their accounts."

Dennis took the paper and sat down again in the corner of the yard, scanning the words which were written across the end of it: "Patrick Morarity, forty-five dollars," and underneath that the single word "Strike."

"Yes," he reflected to himself bitterly, "but that doesn't explain it. Father has had enough coming in every month to pay this bill and all the rest, but he spends it over at Jim Brody's." And then he fumbled in his vest pocket and was rewarded in his search by fishing out a stub of a lead pencil. He glanced first at the paper and then at the pencil, and then laying the former upon his knee, began to scrawl some characters upon it, with a patient persistence which made it evident he was not as familiar with the process of writing as the man who had written above it. But when he had completed his effort and glanced at it, there stood out in legible, if not in beautiful characters, underneath the word "strike," the word "saloon."

"If somebody would only strike against the saloon," he muttered to himself, "the other strikes wouldn't hurt so very much." He started up as the suggestion occurred to his mind, "Why not strike against the saloon yourself?" "Me!" he echoed in his thoughts, "how could I? I am only a boy." The next instant the answer came to him. "If I am only a boy I can say 'yes' or 'no' and stick to it; and here I, Dennis Morarity, strike against the saloon, and the strike is not going to be called off as long as I live. I won't have anything to do with it. I won't have anything to do with the men who carry it on. I won't have anything to do any more than I can help, with the men who support it." And the boy clenched his fist and brought it down upon his knee with a violence which threatened to do himself an injury, while his set teeth and flushed face indicated that he meant what he said with all his soul.

Before starting again to renew his search for the scattered bits of coal which lay along the railway track, he went into the house where his mother was busy with the washing and the children, and silently handed her the piece of paper. She drew her lips closer together and turned pale. "Lord, Lord!" she exclaimed.

"And I've gone on a strike, too, mother," said Dennis.

"Oh, don't say that, my boy. I know it's hard work to be gleaning the scraps of coal when you ought to be in school, but—"

"No, I didn't mean that kind of a strike, mother. I'm just starting again to get some more coal. I meant that I've gone on a strike against the saloons, and it will never be called off as long as I live."

There was something like a lump in the boy's throat, as he saw the tears starting to his mother's eyes and he turned hastily and snatched up his sack and left the house. Sauntering along the railroad track, he suddenly came upon a group of men seated in the doorway of an old box car, with a pack of cards on their knees and two or three empty dinner buckets by their side.

"Ah, there is the very boy we want," exclaimed one of them. "Here, Denny, my lad, we're just out of beer. Take the buckets and run to Brody's and get them filled for us and you can have your share along with us when you come back."

The boy shook his head in silence.

"What's the matter?" demanded the first speaker.

"Oh, let him alone," said another. "Don't you see he doesn't care for the beer, he's too young to drink it, anyway, ain't you, Denny?"

"I'm on a strike against it," said the boy.

The men broke out into a loud laugh at what they considered his very witty rejoinder.

"Well, well," said the first speaker pleasantly, "if you don't want to drink it, you needn't; but run along and get the bucket filled for us and there'll be a dime change left and you can spend it as you want to. That's a good boy."

But still the boy shook his head and looked his unwillingness. "I'm on a strike, I tell you," he said, "against beer, against whisky, against the saloon, against the men that run the saloon and against the men that spend their earnings in the saloons, when they ought to be supporting their wives and children; and this strike won't be called off as long as I live."

The men stared at him in blank amazement. "The boy's gone daft," said one.

"No, he hasn't," retorted another, "he's sensible enough—more so than we are. It's the saloon that hurts and keeps us poor. I've been wondering all this while why Debs and the rest of the leaders didn't see it. The boy sees it right."

"Oh, it's a new labor leader, is it?" chimed in one of the men in a disdainful tone. "Maybe he can do better than Debs did, and gain us the victory. What do you say, men, shall we join the strike?"

"If you do," said Dennis, "I can tell you one thing, it will never be called off, and it will win in the end. You won't need to pay me any money to keep it up, either, or run any risk of bringing soldiers down on you or getting into jail."

When the news was carried to Brody's place by one of the men in the car, who took his bucket and that of his comrades to have them filled, there was a great laugh over it, and the red-faced bar-tender swore a round oath that the boy was a fool and the worst kind of a one at that.

But over in the corner a brawny-framed Irishman rose up and shook his fist in his face, declaring: "It's me own flesh and blood I won't hear denounced. He's a good boy, and has more sense than the rest of us. Good day, men; I'm off."

"Gone to join the new strike," laughed some of the loafers. And so he had, and Dennis Morarity's strike had called out another man that day; and it is on yet.

HOME RULE.

BY HON. C. C. BONNEY, LL. D.

[Welcome to Frances E. Willard at the First Congregational Church of Chicago, September 28, 1894, on behalf of the citizens of Chicago.]

In behalf of the law-abiding and order-loving citizens of Chicago, I greet you and bid you welcome, on your return to the field of your active labors, after your successful journeyings in search of the rest and restoration which ever-pressing demands upon your time and strength would not permit you to find at home. We trust that you come back to us with such a store of health and energy that for many years to come you will be able to discharge the onerous duties of the high positions in which the providence of God has placed you.

We welcome you, not only for your long and splendid career of human service, but even more earnestly because we need your aid in the great emergencies which now confront, not only the citizens of Chicago, and other great cities of our country, but the justice-loving masses of the American people.

The present alarming condition of the country demonstrates the need of some more direct and efficient means and methods of dealing with public disorder and private crime; with conflicts of labor and capital; with municipal corruption; with political demoralization and inadequate public service. We boast an ideal system of free government, but the facility with which a bad man, or an unqualified man may obtain possession of a public office, and administer it for the benefit of himself or his faction, instead of the public for whose service the office was created, shows that while the system is indeed ideal, its actual application to human affairs is far from perfect.

Whatever differences of opinion may prevail about suffrage and office-holding, enlightened mankind agree that it is the right and the duty of women to exert all their mighty influence in favor of virtue, good morals, industry, education, and the general welfare of the people. As we cannot wait for great changes to be wrought in the constitutions and the laws of the states and the nation, but must act at once if we would avert more widespread and appalling disasters than that which we have recently witnessed, we appeal to you, and to the hosts that follow your leadership, to enter without delay upon a great campaign of home rule for the deliverance of the country from the evils to which reference has been made, and from which no merely partisan organization can long keep it exempt.

By home rule I mean the control of the country, the great cities, the states and the nation, not by the liquor traffic, not by the great trusts and combinations, not by labor organizations, not by partisan oligarchies, but by the homes of the country, expressing their convictions through all existing agencies, to secure the dominance of the principles and the interests which these homes represent.

The home is the microsm of the state, the church and the school, all of which exist for the sake of the families for whom the home itself is created and maintained. All public questions should be discussed at the fireside and the table, and for the individual voter should be settled there. He whose political action is true to the sacred interests of home, will never be found false to the true interests of his country or his church.

If this kind of home rule could be established, it would wisely control the high offices of cities, states and nation, and would administer their powers with an efficiency and success that would fill the whole country with satisfaction and rejoicing.

Recent events have demonstrated anew the tremendous power of women in public affairs, when their influence is wisely directed along moral lines. It is the right and the duty of woman to secure a pledge of the honor of every man within the reach of her influence, that he will never, under any circumstances, vote or otherwise act against the interests of home,—its honor, virtue, temperance, industry, enlightenment and prosperity; the peace of the wife and mother, and the welfare of the children; and if this pledge were given and kept, an unworthy man could neither be nominated for, nor elected to any public position. And if only just and able men held public place, the laws would be wise, and their administration would be pure and efficient—adequate for every emergency; able to command the just obedience of every interest, and every organization; to hear, to judge and determine every controversy, whether between persons or organizations, great or small.

To the high apostleship of this new home rule, we bid you welcome. For it, all your previous life has been a lofty preparation. In it you cannot fail. In its success, "the purification of politics" will become more than an iridescent dream"; government more than an organized "force"; politics more than "a battle for supremacy"; the Decalogue and the Golden Rule not "out of place in a political campaign"; the talk of political corruption more than "modern cant"; and the expression of contrary sentiments will be swiftly followed by suitable condemnation.

The greatest questions of our time are moral and social questions, and they must be settled by moral and social agencies. On all such questions woman is entitled to be heard, for she is the divinely appointed guardian of the moral and social welfare of the rising generation.

In the way indicated, so simple and yet so adequate, the women of this country may enter at once upon an active and far-reaching participation in public affairs; a participation to which no just objection can be made, which would do much to neutralize the prevailing partisanship so well described by Washington in his farewell address and which would yield more speedy and satisfactory results than any other now possible.

As President of the World's and National Woman's Christian Temperance Unions, you are the commander-in-chief of the greatest moral army ever enrolled. Lead this army forth in a home rule campaign that would exalt woman and ennoble man; a campaign whose sure results would bless our country and the world.

WELCOME TO MISS WILLARD.

BY MARY A. WOODBRIDGE.

[Chicago, September 28, 1894. Reception at First Congregational church.]

Five minutes time is all too short to bring fitting welcome to our Chieftain, though twice before since your return it has been my privilege and honor to stand before you as representative of the great white ribbon host of which you are leader, to voice the welcome of the half million mothers and daughters and children of the National W. C. T. U. and its honorary constituency—the fathers and husbands and sons whose hearts beat in unison with our own,—and once for the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union, an aggregate of forty-eight National Unions.

Love counts hours as months and months as years, and as the long, long time that you were gone grew longer still, as a mother clasps her child to her heart and will not loose her hold, we have held you to ourselves and to our Lord. England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, the continents of Europe and of America, benighted Africa, enlightened America, with the islands of the sea, bound to one another and to Christ by the white ribbon tie, have spoken in the ear of the Father for you, and thus your leadership has been not only on but up, while we have learned that weakness in ourselves is often strength in God, and we can better understand your own prophetic words, "For God and home and every land."

Yours has been a teaching of broad principles—the brotherhood of humanity and the universal Fatherhood and justice of God. Women have listened and wondered and almost unconsciously followed as you led, while God held you in His own intention until this hour should come, when you emerged in spirit and in power and embodied His handmaidens in the best and holiest human institution known, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

For a time women clung closely to the hope of home protection which you aroused, but as the years and age crept on and still their hearts shed drops of blood, as if to cleanse the home and wash the nation from its sin, they brought to you their daughters, themselves, renewed in youth, a gift of holy motherhood, with prayer that stamp of character like yours might seal each one, until—

"The old order changed, yielding to a new,

Thus girls, who scarce remember when their mothers knelt on sanded floors within the open doors of hell, and, hiding behind the cross, strove to hold some poor, lost soul before the Lord of life and light, are now the strong right arm of our great body, and look with us to that good, glad day when brother and sister shall stand upon the same platform of social purity, upon the same plane of rights and privileges, that through the glorious trinity of man, woman and God, man and woman the instruments, God the power, iniquity shall be banished from the home, the church and the republic.

You could not be with us the Columbian year, but you are here to-night and we are glad, and you know "that following the glitter and glare and music, a cry for bread is heard, and a popular discontent that bodes no good, while the shambling regiments of Coxey's army will not be sneered down, but stand at our gates of power like a judgment. Why all this in a country like ours? Because we have counted our revenues of gold as above broken hearthstones and ruined souls, and God awakes to count the values that bear His image."

We cannot stop. God bids us on; we must and will obey. God bless you now! God bless you ever! Hold fast to the Infinite, the positive pole of holiness and power. Another palm shall strike your own, and on and on—until the negative pole of the world's weakness and sin shall be reached. Then will the divine current flow, and not only will His children be quickened, but the iniquity against which we inveigh shall be shivered and shattered to atoms. Then with voices tuned in the harmonies of heaven, we will sing "glory and honor and praise and thanksgiving to Him who has redeemed us forever and forever." God bless you, beloved, and keep you to that day.

WHAT STATE W. C. T. U. PRESIDENTS THINK.

LOVE THE KEYNOTE.

Love will find a way; it is finding a way in the "do-everything policy," which is surely but slowly undermining the liquor system. "It is love which moves the sun and all the other stars." ELIZABETH PRESTON.

FORGE AHEAD!

The churches must be aroused to greater activity, Christian and moral men must become more interested in the work of the W. C. T. U. and the young people must be secured for the work, or who will carry it when we are laid aside? We must forge ahead.
Brock, Neb. MARY A. WAKELIN.

INDIVIDUAL ACCOUNTABILITY.

Accountability to God for what we are and do and what we might do and be in the temperance cause should rest upon the individual woman in every home.
Riverside, Cal. N. P. J. BUTTON.

HOPE, UNITY—VICTORY.

Discouragement never succeeds. Hope in the heart looks for light ahead. My most ardent desire is, that we, sisters in white ribbon bonds, be filled with Christ. That means no room for self. Unity means victory.
Shelburne, Vt. IDA H. READ.

DETHRONE RUM AND MONOPOLY.

"Peace on earth, good will to man" cannot come while rum and monopoly are enthroned, and woman, purity and labor dethroned. Between Christ and the rum power there can be no compromise. REBECCA MITCHELL.
Idaho Falls, Idaho.

TEMPERANCE REFORM THE GREAT FOUNDATION.

As a sober brain, clear eyes, and steady limbs must underlie the best manhood and the best womanhood, so the temperance reform must underlie all other reforms to give stable foundation. CLARA C. HOFFMAN.
Kansas City, Mo.

BALLOT FOR WOMAN THE KEY.

My hope is in God. My desire is for nothing less than national prohibition. My judgment is that this will be soonest accomplished by the ballot in the hands of women, and at no distant day.
Tacoma, W. Wash. ELLA J. FIFIELD, M. D.

PROHIBITION PARTY.

I would seek the remedy for the drink curse in united political action by a national party pledged to the total prohibition of the liquor traffic—in other words, the Prohibition party. MELINDA A. SHAFFER, Ex-Pres.
Chautauqua, W. Wash.

ROUSE MEN TO RESPONSIBILITY AS VOTERS.

We should strive with greater earnestness to awaken the consciences of Christian men to a realizing sense of the fact of their responsibility to the extent of one vote, for all the crimes committed by the liquor traffic.
Enid, Okla. M. H. SWITZER.

APATHY!

The longer I work in the temperance cause, the more amazed I become at the neutrality of the Christian church and the strange apathy of good men and good women toward this greatest foe to all that is Christlike in this world. How may this apathy be dispelled?
Dallas, Texas. HELEN M. STODDARD.

CONCENTRATE FOR PROHIBITION.

A concentration of forces, patient, persistent, heroic effort for prohibition on the part of each member of the rank and file and a strong pull all together seems to me the next best thing for the temperance cause. May God give wisdom and courage! MRS. N. R. C. MORROW.
Fairmont, W. Va.

BE BAPTIZED AFRESH AND CONSOLIDATE.

The thought, which for two years has impressed me most, and ever laid heavily upon my heart, with reference to the "temperance cause" is first, the imperative need of a fresh baptism of "Crusade fire," second, a consolidation of all true temperance forces. We must take fresh hold on God or fail. ANNA R. RIGGS.
Portland, Ore.

GET OUT OF SELF.

As overcomers of sin and the licensed liquor traffic, we must get out of self before we can abide in Christ. If we do abide in Him, His power becomes ours, and all the works of the devil shall surely flee before us,—and yet not us, but the Mighty God in us. My hope, desire and purpose are to test the power of obedient, believing prayer and earnest, persistent, unselfish effort—and the love that abides. H. A. HOBART.
Red Wing, Minn.

W. C. T. U. STANDPOINT AND THE BALLOT.

My hope is that every humanity-loving, Christian woman will some day see what a hindrance intemperance is to the advancement of all philanthropic and Christian work; and seeing it will have a desire to do something towards exterminating the liquor traffic; that this desire will lead women to join the W. C. T. U., and that when they belong they will be eager to use all their powers to assist, and in my judgment the great majority of them will soon see that they need the ballot.
Stroudwater, Me. L. M. N. STEVENS.

WHOSE ACCOUNTABILITY?

What the temperance cause needs just now is a deep conviction of personal accountability, on the part of Christian men and women, for the support of the liquor traffic, an outspoken Gospel of total abstinence from Christian ministers and the publication of the facts respecting the liquor traffic by the press. CORNELIA B. FORBES.
Hartford, Conn.

WORK TO INCREASE THE VOTE.

My hope: I believe the prohibition of the liquor traffic is obtainable; therefore, I not only desire but expect it.

My judgment: That "the righteous statutes and commandments of the Lord" will prevail; therefore, we should continue to work and pray to increase the vote that shall give this righteous cause ultimate victory.
Ottawa, Kan. LURENDA B. SMITH.

WHAT MANNER OF WOMAN SHOULD WE BE?

With divine guidance we may be the most potential force among human agencies for uplifting the fallen and shedding spiritual sunshine among the lowly of the world. Then what manner of women ought we to be? Pure and patient, loving and gentle, strong to endure, and brave to dare all things "For love of Christ."
Washington, D. C. MARY E. GRIFFITH.

UNITY, AND AROUSAL OF THE CHURCH.

My hope in our work is, that victory shall soon perch on our banners. My desire, that the Christian Church shall arouse from its apathy and realize its responsibility. My judgment, that division in our ranks means defeat, but a concentrated effort must bring the blessed result for which we labor and pray.
Philadelphia, Pa. ANNA M. HAMMER.

LET DRUNKARD-MAKERS LEARN TO EARN AN HONEST LIVING.

"Hope deferred maketh the heart sick," but we still hope and wait for the answer to our prayers that the Great Jehovah may ere long grant our petitions which we offer daily, that the drunkard-makers may cease their infamous traffic and earn an honest living themselves, and let others do the same. L. JANE STAPLER.
Tahlequah, Indian Ter.

VOTE RIGHT AND UNITE.

Let each member of the W. C. T. U. read carefully the preamble of our National constitution that she may decide for herself whether she must vote as well as pray for the annihilation of the liquor traffic. Let her think, also, of some plan by which all temperance forces may unite in such effort throughout the nation.
Denver, Col. EVA C. HIGGINS.

TRIUMPH WITHIN TEN YEARS.

Faith steps upon a seeming void and finds—a rock beneath. So I have faith to see the final triumph of the temperance cause within the next decade, and, as a reason for the faith that is in me, I take the utterances of the official organ of the Liquor Dealers' Association, which under the circumstances may be considered quite good authority. E. A. HILL.
Orange City, Fla.

AN APPLIED CHRISTIANITY.

My hope is in our leader, in the rank and file, and our methods, which are being used by Endeavorers, Leaguers, and King's Daughters. Also, in the disintegration of political parties, the study of good citizenship and municipal reform, and an acknowledgment that we need an applied Christianity, rather than so much theoretical theology. Yours truly,
Newark, N. J. EMMA BOURNE.

LIFE CONQUEROR OVER DEATH.

Since our organization is founded upon the teachings of Christ and His power to dethrone evil, we ought to cease talking about the power of the liquor traffic and its results. It is the law of the spirit of life that makes us free from the law of sin and death, and our work is to know this law and claim this supremacy of spirit of Christ until the whole world shall be manifestly filled with the glory of the Lord. JULIA SEWELL BALDWIN.
Baltimore, Md.

TEACH RESPECT FOR LAW.

The best possible thing for our cause would be the enforcement of existing laws against the traffic in liquor and tobacco, an enforcement that would hold alike the capitalist and anarchist and compel the respect of the masses. The school boy in the primary grades absolutely ignores the law against cigarettes. We are positively teaching the children a contempt for the law. Whether the W. C. T. U. can remedy this I know not, but while we are undertaking so many things it occurs to me we might try on this line for awhile.
Birmingham, Ala. MARTHA L. SPENCER.

WOMAN'S BALLOT THE HOPE.

My hope for the temperance cause is that all temperance workers will join forces and work in harmony. My desire is that the ballot may be put in the hands of the women that we may vote prohibition. My judgment is, that until we get the ballot we will keep on doing the moulding sentiment work that we have been engaged in for over twenty years. FANNY L. CHUNN.

Cotton Plant, Ark.

CAN'T BE USED.

The most impressive thought concerning the temperance cause is this,—It is God's battle. My hope in Him is as an anchor to my soul, that the battle will be won and the victory glorious. My judgment is that the delay of this "glad day" is not occasioned so much by the increasingly aggressive power of the foe we face, as by the fact that God's children, through whom this victory must be won, are not in the attitude where He can use them.

Walla Walla, Wash. JULIA B. COLE.

NEVER SO MUCH HOPE AS NOW.

I never was so hopeful of our cause. I will give you just two reasons why, although I could count one for every finger of my two hands. First, woman's cause is on the home-stretch. Before the new century is ushered in that little bit of white paper, the ballot, will be in our hands and that will mean much for temperance. Second, not only does our organization come of age this year, but thousands of our Loyal Temperance Legion boys come of age this year and every year to come, and this means unending additions to the Prohibition vote.

Los Angeles, Cal. MARY E. GARBUTT.

LET'S BE IN AT THE DEATH IN 1899.

When a child I was impressed by the description in "Waverley" of the great hunt. The chieftains gathered in the highlands and sent out their retainers to form a vast circle about them. For days all was tranquil, even the deer did not know they were being hunted, but as the circle grew gradually smaller the air was filled with the noise of the chase, the baying of dogs, ringing of horns, shouts of men, and the wildly leaping animals which fell before the arms of the hunters.

So with the temperance cause; for years the great moral, social, economic and scientific forces have been drawing the tinchel around the liquor traffic, little heeded by it, but now the circle is narrowing, the forces are drawing closer, the air is filled with sounds of menace to the monster which begins to realize its deadly encompassment!

May we all be "in at the death" and may it not be deferred beyond the year 1899!

Greenville, Miss. LAVINIA S. MOUNT.

THE SALOON EVIL CAN BE PREVENTED.

Why not a broadside and a bugle blast from the pulpit against the politically fortified liquor power? Pulpit labor is not doing this, nor can it, till it is as earnest and constant in its work as the saloon. While the pulpit sleeps the saloon sells; while the pulpit resolves, the saloon acts; while the pulpit prays, the saloon votes. When the pulpit shall unfold the banner of "No Compromise," civilization will mean more and stand upon higher ground than to-day, and humanity will bless the courage and faith that embraced the cause of its redemption.

DR. BUCKLEY ON EQUAL SUFFRAGE.

VI.

BY ALICE STONE BLACKWELL.

Dr. Buckley says: "'No taxation without representation' as an abstract principle is just, but it does not follow that the representation must be identical." But in the present case the legal representation is wholly lacking. George William Curtis said:

> It is not true that, in the ordinary and honorable sense of the words, women are represented. Laws are made for them by another class, and upon the theories which that class, without the fear of political opposition, may choose to entertain, and in direct violation of the principles upon which, in their own case, they tenaciously insist.

Dr Buckley says that "woman's influence in forming the characters and principles of the law-makers insures care for her." Women have always had an influence in forming the characters of the law-makers. Yet, up to the time when the equal rights movement began, the laws in regard to women were almost incredibly bad. Even now they leave much to be desired.

Dr. Buckley says: "The authors of the Declaration of Independence, the framers of the Massachusetts bill of rights, did not perceive any incongruity between declaring that 'all men are born free and equal,' and that there should be 'no taxation without representation,' that 'governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed,' and at the same time relieving women from the responsibilities and burdens of government." The authors of the Declaration of Independence did not perceive any incongruity between declaring that "all men are born free and equal," and sanctioning human slavery; or between declaring that there should be "no taxation without representation," and excluding men from suffrage because of their religious opinions. The logical application of the principles laid down by the fathers goes beyond what the fathers themselves perceived, in more than one particular.

Dr. Buckley says: "Taxation is not levied upon the property of women upon different principles, but upon property as such, by whomsoever held." That is not the point. The point is that, while the taxes are levied equally upon the property of men and women, the women have no voice as to how the money shall be spent. What is complained of is not unequal taxation, but taxation without representation.

Dr, Buckley says: "The property rights of woman are better protected now than they could be if she were actively engaged in politics." In most of the states of the Union, the property laws are still unequal as between men and women, even after all the improvements of the last fifty years. To show that women's property rights are better protected now than if they could vote, Dr. Buckley says that when it was proposed to pave a certain street contrary to the wishes of the property-holders, mostly widows and single women, some of them went to the authorities and succeeded in persuading them not to do it. But if these women had had votes, they would not have needed to do any persuading. As one of them told Dr. Buckley, "Such a thing would not have been attempted." Dr. Buckley admits that she was "a lady of rare intelligence," and that she regarded the incident as an argument for suffrage. She well might. It was only a chance that the women's persuasions were successful. In many cases they are not.

Dr. Buckley says that "the consent of the governed is and must be taken for granted, except as changes are made by constitutional methods." But it has often been taken for granted unwarrantably in the past in regard to various classes of men. We claim that it is now taken for granted unwarrantably in the case of women, and we are asking that a change be made by constitutional methods.

In reply to the argument that "capacity indicates sphere," Dr. Buckley says: "There are various acts for which woman has the ability that she should not be asked or compelled by law to perform." But there are few things for which she has the natural capacity that she ought to be forbidden by law to perform, and there is no proof that the exercise of suffrage is one of them.

In reply to the argument that "the dignity and authority of the ballot would increase her influence," Dr. Buckley says: "Since . . . woman's influence is not derived from authority or her true dignity symbolized by the ballot, the clenched fist or the drawn sword, it would add nothing to her power." The suffrage is exercised not only by military officers and pugilists, but by men of the most peaceful professions, and even by ministers of the gospel. The possession of a vote adds to the minister's power, just as it does to that of men whose professions are symbolized by the sword or the clenched fist. It would add to woman's power in the same way. In every society of which a woman is a member, in every corporation in which she is a stockholder, the fact that she has a vote adds to her influence and dignity. It would be so, of course, in the larger association represented by government, and all the bad elements that do not want the power of good women increased are strenuously opposed to giving them the ballot.

A TEMPERANCE EVENING IN MACEDONIA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Among the mountains of northern Macedonia lies the large and flourishing village of Bansko. Its inhabitants are pure Bulgarians, of the stalwart, mountaineer type, large and robust in body, vigorous in action and capable in mind. They devote themselves for the most part to farming.

The Evangelical church here is one of the oldest and largest in connection with the mission of the American board to the Bulgarians. From the families which compose it, numbers of boys and girls have gone across the boundary into Bulgaria, and have entered the mission schools in Samokov. Thence they have become useful members of society, some of them laboring as teachers and preachers. The pastor of the church in Sophia, the capital of Bulgaria, is a native of Bansko; after studying in the preparatory school in his native village, and later in Samokov, in the collegiate and theological institute, he went to America and continued his education. Several others from Bansko are now studying in America, but a much larger number are in the mission schools in Samokov.

During the summer vacation this year, these students were at home, and earnestly planned a temperance evening, to show to their parents and fellow-villagers a specimen of the work which is being done in connection with the schools. One of the earliest sounds which we heard upon going to the upper end of the village a few days since was the voice of singers, accompanied by a Mason and Hamlin Baby organ. It was the choir of students gathered in the commodious new house of a village preacher, where they were practicing for the proposed entertainment. Preparations went forward enthusiastically. Songs, declamations and dialogues were rehearsed, and a lecture prepared by the young preacher of the Bansko church, himself fresh from his studies in Samokov, with his graduation honors upon him. As the press is fettered in Macedonia as well as in all other parts of Turkey, written copies of the program were made and distributed, with an invitation to the entertainment. The result of all this working was a crowded church on Sabbath evening, and a delighted audience, including many who are seldom found in the house of God. We can but hope and believe that impressions were made both upon the young and upon their elders, many of whom listened for the first time to such truths, which will be permanent.

During the last few years, real progress has been made in temperance work in Bulgaria and Macedonia, vigorous temperance societies are maintained in the mission schools, and frequent meetings are held, sometimes for the members only, but occasionally for the public at large. These societies and meetings become the models for the whole country, as teachers and preachers go out thence to become the evangelizers of the Bulgarians wherever found.

The temperance reform has come to Bulgaria and Macedonia, and has come to stay. ELLEN M. STONE.

MEN'S NATIONAL CHRISTIAN PROHIBITION UNION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Our annual meeting has passed into history and was eminently satisfactory. Of course we did wish, for the sake of the church and the country, that we were an army instead of a single company, but we have faith in God and in His strength we shall prevail.

Twenty months ago, January 24 and 25, 1893, our first conference was held in Philadelphia. We pressed upon the Christian conscience of the country the awful fact that the church, Protestant as well as Catholic, was allied to the saloon in an "ungodly league." Some opposition was aroused and those who felt most strongly hesitated to act with decision without further preparation. On this account the conference adjourned to meet in New York, September 20, 21, 1893.

It met, and despite a small but determined minority who tried to kill the movement, at least nine-tenths of the members present decided to go forward and organize a union, to press upon the churches the fearful crime of complicity with the liquor traffic, and the necessity of direct and open antagonism to the evil to save the church and the nation.

The union is composed of men who really believe that our present condition is one of danger. That we have incurred, and must meet the wrath of offended justice, and they labor in the hope of averting some, if not all, the dreadful results of this sin.

This truth is of necessity extremely unpalatable to a peace-loving and carnal church which resists it with stolid indifference begotten of a false security. In spite of this terrible inertia the few whose souls are aflame with this zeal for God and His righteousness have gone forward at great personal sacrifice in the work.

The growth of public sentiment during the year is astonishing to us. Men who one year ago were timid, to-day are bold. The lukewarm are aroused, the objectors are silenced. A slight difference in regard to details of work always exists, but a deep spirit of harmony and sympathy pervaded the meeting.

The Prohibition clubs were represented, and many churches, through their ministers and the ladies of the county and city unions appointed delegates who added greatly to the interest of the occasion.

I will not attempt a report of the meeting, It is quite impossible to condense it. The great topics discussed were presented in telling speeches by John Lloyd Thomas, Rev. Charles Roads, Rev. J. C. Hogan, James F. Daily, W. Jennings Demorest, Rev. W. H. Berry and many others; and resolutions were passed which, I think, reach points not heretofore brought out in this contest with the liquor power.

The officers for the ensuing year were chosen as follows: President, Rev. Charles Roads, 683 Catharine St., Philadelphia, Pa.; Vice-president-at-large, W. Jennings Demorest, 10 East 14th St., N. Y.; Secretary, D. P. Lindsley, 301 Broadway, N. Y.; Treasurer, John Lloyd Thomas, 10 East 14th St., N. Y. Additional members of the Executive Board are: Hiram De Walt, Rev. W. H. Boole, Rev. L. G. Jordan, Rev. S. C. Swallow, D. D., James F. Dailey, E. D. Nichols, Rev. J. F. Meredith, D. G. Hendricks, Rev. E. B. Sutton, Prof. Alonzo Brown.

The meeting closed on the second day after with five sessions, with a lecture by Hon. John P. St. John in a speech perfectly adapted to the occasion and in full accord with the spirit of the meeting. His subject was "That man." "Woe to that man by whom the offense cometh," etc.

The work will move forward, and with ever increasing power. It is in the hands of good men "tried and true." This was happily conceded by some who had come with misgivings, but went away assured that we were far within the bounds of sober reason in our estimate of the danger which we seek to avert. The danger is in inaction. Only good to the church and the state can come from this agitation.

We seek but to destroy the evil. We shall conserve all that is good, and if it shall please God to give us a land redeemed from this curse of curses and a church awake to righteousness we shall praise God from whom these blessings flow and join with the W. C. T. U. and all kindred bodies in welcoming the reign of peace and righteousness. Yours fraternally and faithfully,

New York City. D. P. LINDSLEY, Sec.

AFTER MANY YEARS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Perhaps the shores of our native land never look so attractive as when one returns to them after a prolonged absence; and however great may have been the enjoyment, we look with longing eyes for the first low line on the horizon that assures us there is "land ahead." The sight is as beautiful to the pilgrim as the land of Beulah, and as much to be desired. My face is turned homeward and I am moving in that direction as fast as the burning of forty-five tons of coal a day will carry me.

Six years ago I stood on the deck of a great steamer sailing through the Golden Gate on my way to unfurl our standard in all the countries of the world. If I live to reach Boston harbor the latter part of September, I shall have girdled the world twice, once each way, putting two bands of white ribbon completely round the globe and the white ribbon on nine thousand women. Added to this is the privilege of preaching the gospel on all the continents of the earth,—and now I'm coming home.

On every hand I hear, "What to do?" and in response to this question I answer, "To lecture." It is well known that in these six years of work during which time I have compassed the distance of one hundred and fifty thousand miles, I have never drawn one penny from the treasury of the society that sent me out, but have given every moment of my time without compensation and have been glad to do it. I state this clearly because the impression has gone abroad that I had both a salary and my expenses paid. But under the stress of the present financial situation in general, and my own in particular, I find it necessary to lecture for a year on my travels that I may once again be in a position to carry on the work. I shall be lecturing under contract with a business manager and shall lecture on my travels, not on the work, but on the countries through which I have journeyed and their people. The lectures will be illustrated by living characters dressed in the costumes of these lands. My engagements begin October 15, in the state of Illinois.

I shall hope to be at the Convention in Onio this fall, and the sight of your faces will do me good.

JESSIE A. ACKERMANN.

NEWS FROM SOUTH AFRICA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Your readers will not for a moment think that we of South Africa have been silent concerning our affairs this long time because the affairs are not both important and interesting. We hope that at least four of our "Huguenot pilgrims" who left us last Christmas for a year of rest and travel, will be with you all at Cleveland, and there you will hear all about us up to the time of their departure and much since, I think, as they keep themselves provided with The White Ribbon of South Africa, and Y's and Otherwise.

Your fourth round-the-world missionary is eagerly anticipating their return and the induction of Miss Emilie Solomon into the office of "minister-at-large" for the W. C. T. U. of South Africa. The fact that she was born and brought up in this country, with parentage and training which amply fit her for such work, indicates that it is quite time I should be taking up labor waiting for me some other where.

The foundation of W. C. T. U. work is well laid here. With seventy-five thousand white English-speaking people in Natal, doubtless we ought to have, at the beginning of our fifth year, more than four hundred members; but this is a greater proportion than our National has in its twentieth year. We have just closed the fifth annual convention for Natal. Within a fortnight all the material for our annual report was in the hands of the printer when a fire in the office so nearly destroyed our manuscript that we shall be able to have no annual report printed this year.

Amongst the most important work carried on is that of the "tea room," situated on the market square at Durban. The Durban union completed this very convenient little building just after the convention last year at a cost of about three hundred and eighty dollars. A "rescue home" has been put into operation at Pietermaritzburg, the capital of the colony, and its responsibility assumed by the colonial union. A plan is forming for erecting "headquarters" here. The idea is a comfortable hall for meetings of branches of the work, in connection with a comfortable restaurant and bedrooms for ladies traveling alone; for Christian women workers who may have occasion to spend a little time in the city, especially is such a Christian home required in a colony like this where so many young women are constantly arriving from over the seas. Several hundred pounds have already been raised toward this enterprise by our consecrated and energetic members in all the unions of Natal, so that its success is as good as assured.

I wish I could introduce you all personally to the leaders in these plans for good. Quiet, modest, godly women, akin to our Crusade mothers, they are saying always, "To the Lord be the glory! The way of the wicked He turneth upside down."

There are now five local unions and one "Y Branch" in the Orange Free State. This little inland state is a Republic with twelve thousand white people, a majority of whom are of Dutch descent. I think I told you all last year about the kindness I received from Mrs. and President Reitz when I was at Bloemfontein, the state capital. I am very thankful for these unions, for through them is the opportunity to reach the great native population. Both in Natal and the Free State there are laws forbidding the sale of intoxicants to natives, but when such quantity of it comes in for the white people, and is sent all over the country, the law is naturally very much evaded.

I have just seen in the Cape Argus that the largest temperance demonstration ever given in Cape Town has just transpired in honor of Miss Ackermann who had arrived there. Mrs. Grey writes me that Miss Ackermann will spend some time in Johannesburg and Pretoria. These are the principal towns of the South African Republic, "Transvaal," as it used to be called. Indeed, Johannesburg may be called the principal town of South Africa, for it is the center of the great gold market. If ever a place on earth is in need of strong Christian effort it is this young and rapidly growing city. I shall be more thankful than I can express if grand Miss Ackermann is able to stay awhile in those towns. I am sure she will leave just the right sort of impress.

There are stupendous difficulties in the way of a National South African W. C. T. U., for the country is in no sense a nation. All these little states and colonies have diverse interests, besides being far apart as to their centres of population. Yet our union is more united than anything else in South Africa about which I know anything, unless it is the Wesleyan church. And I think that in no distant day, long before the scheme of the great African statesman (so called), Mr. Rhodes, is completed of forming a great South African republic with himself as president, we shall see a national W. C. T. U. with duly elected officers and at least triennial conventions.

ALICE R. PALMER.

THE AUSTRALASIAN M. E. CONFERENCE AND WOMAN.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Noticing that on June 14 you had an editorial on "John Wesley and the Woman Question," I think you will be glad to hear of a really important historical event which took place in the Wesleyan Methodist General Conference of Australasia, held in Adelaide in May last. It began further back in March, when on the motion of Rev. J. Bowes, the annual conference of Queensland agreed to recommend the general conference to expunge paragraph 352 from its book of laws.

The paragraph reads as follows: "We are of opinion that, in general, women ought not to preach. 1. Because a vast majority of our people are opposed to it. 2. Because their preaching does not seem necessary. But if any woman among us thinks she has an extraordinary call of God in public (and we are sure it must be an extraordinary call that can authorize it) we are of opinion that she should in general, address her own sex alone. If permitted to preach, it should be, (1) only in her own circuit, upon receiving the approbation of the superintendent, minister, and a quarterly meeting; (2) in any other circuit, upon the written invitation of the superintendent of such circuit, and a recommendatory note from her own superintendent."

This Queensland resolution gave the women an opportunity of which we were not slow to avail ourselves, and a petition supporting the resolution was drawn up, and signed by about fifty Methodist women from the different colonies, most of the signatures being secured at our W. C. T. U. Triennial Australasian Convention in Sydney, which met a month earlier than the General Conference in Adelaide.

We are glad to tell you that the Queensland recommendation was carried, and thus as The Christian Weekly, our South Australian denominational paper, remarks: "In this succinct, yet complete fashion, all restrictions on women as such, from becoming preachers and exercising their gifts, are bodily swept away."

You will, especially, dear UNION SIGNAL, appreciate the fact that it was a son of our honored white-ribboner, Mrs. Bowes, honorary vice-president of the New South Wales Woman's Christian Temperance Union, who moved the resolution in the Queensland Conference to expunge this law, which was ninety-one years old, having been formulated by the British Conference in 1803.

This general conference also marked an epoch in "the woman question" by receiving for the first time a deputation of women from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Australasia. Miss George, Australasian superintendent of juvenile work, and your correspondent had the honor of being the speakers, and the very gracious reception accorded us and kind things spoken and written since make us think that we may have helped a little to remove any lingering prejudice against women speaking in public. As the conference only comes to Adelaide about once in twelve years and as there were several notable temperance workers among its members our colonial officers and executives of city and suburban local unions invited the members of conference, with their wives and daughters and hosts and hostesses, to meet executives of various temperance societies at tea in the town hall. About three hundred and fifty friends assembled, and many said it was a pleasant gathering.

MRS. E. W. NICHOLLS,

Australasian and Colonial President W. C. T. U.

Prospect, Adelaide, N. S. W.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

And they came to him, and awoke him saying, Master, master, we perish. Then he arose and rebuked the winds and the raging of the water; and they ceased and there was a calm. And he said unto them, Where is your faith? And they being afraid wondered, saying one to another, What manner of man is this! for he commandeth even the winds and water, and they obey him.—Luke 8: 24, 25.

There are over three thousand mite-boxes out, in the hands of those who have entered their names to secure the Temple silver souvenir spoon by January 1, 1895. This leaves but eleven weeks and a half before the expiration of that date. We order but a gross of these spoons at a time. It will take a good while to fill the immense order necessary to meet the demand of those who have taken mite-boxes to be filled by January 1, if all fulfill their pledge. We take it, that most persons would like to have their spoons by Christmas. If they would they must send us a postal at once, stating that they want them by that date, so as to give us sufficient time to have them manufactured. They should forward their money by December 1, or not later than the eleventh of that month, so as to give us ample time to get the spoons mailed, for it will be tedious work to send out so many.

Persons who do not send their money until Christmas week need not expect to get them until the first of the year. We have decided to give all persons now filling mite-boxes, no matter how long they have held them, the opportunity of securing the beautiful Temple silver souvenir teaspoon, if they send their $3.65 before the expiration of 1894.

During the heat of August our heroic Jane Weeden has been undauntedly at work, and sent us a check for $35. This includes two full Baby Bands, one in Charleston, Ill., and one in Paris, Ill. The balance was secured by small contributions from individuals in the above towns. Mrs. Sallie E. Murphy, Knoxville, Tenn., has the honor of having secured a full Baby Band of one hundred names. She sends a check for $10. Mrs. Martha Keighley, Vineland, N. J., sends a check for $25. She says: "I have been expecting to see my way clear to give one hundred dollars, but find if I wait until I have the whole amount I may have to wait long, so I have decided to send it in smaller sums. Can I have my name on the New Jersey tablet? Not that I want it there to be great, but, in time to come, if any of my posterity should visit the Temple they will be glad to find they also 'belong.'" There are hundreds, if not thousands of our women that could give a hundred dollars to the Temple just as readily as Mrs. Keighley, if they would only set about it. Why not, my sisters? If you cannot give more than $5 at a time—would you, too, not like to have your name on your state tablet in Willard Hall, to go down to posterity that "you belong" and helped to pay for the noble edifice?

"Enclosed please find three dollars and sixty-five cents towards paying for the Temple," writes Mrs. E. K. Chapman, Ellington, Conn., and adds: "What a little sum it appears compared with the whole cost of the building, and yet it is the one drop which fills the bucket if enough drops go in." Won't all our white-ribboners try to put at least a drop in the Temple bucket? Don't say you are too poor or too old. See what our Quaker friend, Jane Weeden, has accomplished. Like her Master, she has not where to lay her head, and the snows of three score years and ten crown her brow; but she goes right on with a faith that never falters. She is now engaged in raising her third thousand dollars for the Temple. If she can do this why cannot all white-ribboners at least secure three dollars each and thus become part owners of their own beautiful building? Mrs. Lucy L. Hubbard, Lake City, Minn., with seventy years crippling her strength, has gathered $1.50 in her mite-box which she has just sent. In her letter she promises as soon as returning strength permits she will undertake to raise a Baby Band. Mrs. A. E. Rush, Factoryville, Pa., writes: "I am very anxious that the Temple enterprise shall be a success, and am greatly pained that so many white-ribboners seek to tear down rather than build up. In evidence of my interest and good wishes I enclose $5 for the Temple." L. A. R., Macomb, Ill., writes: "Please find enclosed $5 for which send me the Columbian souvenir and a Temple souvenir tea-spoon. I have been trying for a long time to send, but times are so hard now that it is almost impossible to get money. I will as soon as I can, send some more money to help though it will be only a mite, as I am poor." Mrs. C. M. W. Foster and Mrs. B. A. Milligan, New Alexandria, Pa., both W. C. T. U. county officials, send $7.30 as a thankoffering, on account of Miss Willard's restoration to health and safe return.

All persons sending $1 to the Temple will receive the beautiful Columbian souvenir. Any individual who fills a mite-box during 1894 will receive a solid silver Temple souvenir tea-spoon. This, however, does not apply to persons filling boxes for unions; they receive the Columbian souvenir. All money orders and checks should be made out in the name of William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, the Temple, Chicago, Ill. All other matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago. A two-cent stamp secures a mite-box.

SISTER AND SONG.

BY JAMES VILA BLAKE.

I said, "I pray thee, O Song,
Come hither and sing to me;
Sing me a lay as sweet and strong
As in a heart can be."

Said Song, "Why should I sing,
And why call'st thou to me?
That tell me, before I will bring Music to thee."

"For her, the dear, the sweet,
I wish thee to sing, O Song,
That I may drop at her gentle feet
Lays sweet and long."

Said Song, "O not for her
Can I give music to thee;
If but her gentle breath she stir,
She sings to me."

Said Song, "Not for her ear
Music can I confer;
If she but speaks, 'tis I must hear,
And listen to her." —Selected.

ONE "FATHERS' MEETING" AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

BY KATHARINE LENTE STEVENSON.

Strange as it may seem, it was the mothers of Blithedale who originated the fathers' meeting. They had been holding mothers' meetings in connection with their local union for more than a year, with such results that they were beginning to ask themselves how they had dared, in the past, to accept the duties of motherhood with so absolute an ignorance of its vital principles. Their theory of child-culture was being transformed. It was taking its place as the science of sciences, the one study for which a life-time must always be too short, but in which, as in no other, the wisdom and culture of one generation are passed on as the glorious inheritance of the next.

They were discussing this point at one of their regular business meetings when Mrs. Richmond, a bright-faced, earnest young mother sprang to her feet and said: "Madam President, I've been wondering why a 'fathers' meeting' might not be a good thing for Blithedale. We all know that mothers are not alone concerned in the training of children, and we know, too, that a mother's wisest precept is often set at naught by a father's unwise, thoughtless example. I wonder what kind of topics would be discussed in a fathers' meeting; whether they would consider the proper age for boys to begin smoking, and the best brand of cigarettes for them to use, or whether in any way, they could be brought to face the questions we see to be so vital, and which they must face equally with ourselves, if our children are to have a well-rounded culture and the generations yet unborn a true heredity. I suppose this matter hardly lies within the province of a motion, but, if it did, I should certainly move, Madam President, that our union hold a 'fathers' meeting.'"

Laughter and applause greeted this outburst, and one sister quietly reminded the speaker that to "hold" a fathers' meeting might be found outside the province of a motion, even if unanimously carried, there being a well-known proverb to the effect that, though a horse may be led to water he can't be made to drink.

Now, the president of the Blithedale union was a woman who, somehow or other, brought things to pass. Moreover, she was the mother of two bright boys and one girl, aged, respectively, two, five and eight years. Those who knew most of her home life knew that though tenderly attached to each other, there was still no harmony of action between herself and her husband upon these lines of thought. He pooh-poohed good-naturedly at her "new-fangled ideas," and smoked his cigar before his boys, and even puffed his tobacco smoke in Baby Ruth's face in calm disregard of her protest. His wife had long since ceased to talk with him upon the matter, but if he had learned anything from his sixteen years of married life he must have known that that fact by no means indicated that she had ceased thinking or planning.

Par parenthesis, it is a strange fact in marital relations that a husband can rarely bring himself to believe that his wife means what she says, unless that meaning coincides with his own. He had taken her earlier "tobacco lectures" with tolerable good-nature but without allowing them to affect, in any way, his practice. Now that they had ceased he concluded her zeal had ceased also, and did not even notice the very patent fact that whenever Baby Ruth toddled near her father sitting with his cigar, there was a never failing ready excuse to call her away. "I can't have my baby poisoned by her own father," whispered the little woman to herself with set lips.

On the day in question, no sooner had the pleasant stir occasioned by Mrs. Richmond's speech subsided, than Mrs. Everett struck the gavel and said, "Ladies, this idea impresses me very forcibly and I sincerely hope a motion to this effect may be carried and a committee appointed to arrange for a fathers' meeting."

The buzz grew strong in a moment and little cries of "Oh, it can't be done! How could we go to work about it? Why, they would just laugh at us! Nobody would come," were heard from all over the room. But the gavel made its own silence very speedily, and before the union really knew it the motion had been carried, and Mrs. Everett, Mrs. Richmond and Mrs. Clare, whose husband, Judge Clare, was the acknowledged social magnate of Blithedale, were appointed the committee with full powers.

Then the president called on Mrs. Clare to pray, and as she poured out her soul to God for wisdom and guidance in this hour, that the right step might be taken to arouse the fathers of Blithedale to their responsibility for their own children, a hush came over all who knew the story of her own wrecked home, and they joined with her in a prayer of faith which claimed present victory and stilled all fears.

"Now, remember," said the president, at closing, "your committee has full powers and it is not thought advisable to let the union be known in this matter, so whatever happens give no hint and seem surprised."

The next day found each member of the committee in her pastor's study, preferring her request for the calling of a fathers' meeting. Alas, there are pastors and pastors, and but one of the three visited that day heard Christ's call in this appeal, "so outside the pale of our recognized duty," as one politely phrased it; they were perfectly courteous and in a measure sympathetic, but they could not promise to promote such an enterprise, though readily promising to do nothing to prevent and to consider the request as confidential.

But the third—Mrs. Clare's pastor—was hardly more than a boy, and yet his message was already vaguely recognized by the community at large, as, in some sense, different from anything ever given them before.

"He doesn't seem to put much stress on doctrine," said old Deacon Perkins anxiously, after the first two or three months of Mr. Cathcart's ministration.

"No, but he puts a mighty sight on doing," said his harum-scarum grandson, Ned, who had not attended church before for years.

"Too much, I'm afraid," grumbled his grandfather. "'The just shall live by faith.'"

"Now, see here, grandfather," broke in the young man, somewhat disrespectfully, it is to be feared, "it's about time you folks stopped picking to pieces to find a flaw in doctrine the words of a man who's done more to bring the kingdom of heaven to Blithedale than any other ten men ever did. Faith, indeed! If he hadn't faith, and that a good deal bigger than a 'grain of mustard seed,' do you think he'd ever have tried to do anything with me?"

And the force of this argument being so apparent, Deacon Perkins and the few whom he voiced were obliged one by one to cease their complaints or to find themselves in a hopeless minority, for Mr. Cathcart had certainly captured Blithedale.

He sat that day in his study looking pityingly into Mrs. Clare's sad gray eyes. His own eyes were brown with rich red gleams dancing through them and they had grown deeper and darker while she had been talking; now he seemed lost in thought. Suddenly he laughed out the boyish laugh which went far towards making his place in the hearts of his parishioners, and said:

"But my dear Mrs. Clare, don't you see one insurmountable obstacle to my calling this meeting in the fact that I am not a father?"

"No, I do not," she answered solemnly. "You have had a father; and such a father! Tell them what you told me."

The brown eyes grew still darker for a moment and then bowing his head as before a heavenly summons, he answered: "God helping me, I will."

THE W. C. T. U. AND SOCIOLOGY.

BY CARRIE L. GROUT.

Sociology is a word often seen in print and heard from pulpit and platform in these days. It is true that many people have but a vague idea of what is comprehended by the term, but it stands in a general way for an effort to improve social conditions, and as the universal cry is that the times are out of joint people turn eagerly to anything that gives promise of better things.

When Professor Graham Taylor delivered his sociological lectures at Bay View last summer, he created much interest in the subject, and as he treated it from an ethical or, more properly speaking, from a Christian standpoint, he won the sympathy of his audience and stirred many a heart with a desire to do something to relieve social wrongs and distress.

One minister with a saintly face said to the writer, "It is wonderful, but it is all so new and strange."

I venture to assert that his ideas were neither new nor strange to any W. C. T. U. worker who heard him. As an evidence of this, a paper prepared by Dr. Annette Shaw, of Wisconsin, on the work of the W. C. T. U. was read at our institute there, following one of Professor Taylor's lectures, and although Dr. Shaw was not able to be at Bay View herself, her paper contained so many sentiments in line with Professor Taylor's that it was remarked by all who heard them both.

It is a fact that for many years the W. C. T. U. has been studying social relations from the standpoint of the Christian home-maker, and physical conditions, mental development and moral influences have been noted, not, perhaps, as carefully or scientifically as might be, but so as to reveal the necessity for some radical social changes which are even now in process of evolution.

A remark, reported to have been made by Lady Henry Somerset in one of her English speeches, has been saying itself over and over in my mind since I read it. It was to this effect: "We need more sense and less sentiment in our temperance work." While it is true that there has been some careful study and many wise plans suggested for carrying on our work, there seems to be great need for an increase of the studious habit among our women in place of the impulsive efforts so often made.

How would it do for our women to unite with the wise men like Dr. Richard T. Ely and Dr. Josiah Strong, Rev. George D. Herron and others who are pleading so earnestly for the scientific study of social development for the purpose of learning how to apply the truths and principles of Christianity to the social and economic difficulties of the present time?

We all believe that the gospel of Jesus Christ is the only proper remedy for social as well as individual evils, but how to apply it is the puzzling question. How to bring those who are diseased to the Physician is what we do not as yet succeed in doing with sufficient rapidity to keep the epidemic in check.

It thrills me to think of the quiet regeneration of society which might be accomplished if all mothers were as wise as some mothers I know. Our organization is composed so largely of mothers that it affords a wonderful opportunity for the spread of social wisdom where it can work most promptly and effectively. What a great redemption would follow if our women can only be brought into touch with that divine wisdom which lifts motherhood out of the absorption of the petty details of household duties, to a recognition of the wide and high significance of a home life for the whole being, giving ample opportunity for physical, mental, moral, social and industrial development.

By all means let women—the mothers and the possible mothers, study sociology. I do not want to suggest it as a department of our W. C. T. U. work, but rather that every department should be brought into line with the best that science can bring to us along this line.

THE MIGHT HAVE BEEN.

BY C. D. BRADLEE, D. D.

I wonder what sort of a biography might be written of each one of us if we only were to-day what we all might have been. Might have been if we had only just turned a different corner, just kept down a hasty word, just been true to our best impulses, just put aside a great temptation, just practiced a little self-restraint, just had a little more courage; if we had curbed our ambition or smothered our pride or cleansed our imagination; if only some little thing had been different; if our parents had not met with misfortune or had not passed away when we needed their advice; if husband or wife had been just the opposite to what they are, or children or brothers or sisters had taken a different course, what we might have been. Again, I say, look on the other side. Thank God through our Lord Jesus for what you have gained, for the strength that has come through deprivation, for the mere outlook upon what might have been. So, with us all, as we look from Nebo upon rewards not ours, it is something, it is a great deal, it is a magnificent glory, that they might have been ours; and it is a hint of what may yet be ours, if through a true penitence, a holy resignation, a divine peace, we bow before the ordinances of the Eternal God. This leads us to the thought that we would repeat again and again—that, although Moses did not get the grand prize that bathed his eyes, he yet, by true penitence, obtained something better; he fell asleep, and entered the "City of the New Jerusalem," the promised land for all consecrated souls.—Sermons for the Church.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—I was invited to a birthday party the other evening, and I went. It was different from any you ever saw, I am sure. Would you like to hear about it? I knew you would, and especially when I tell you that over two hundred boys and girls were there and nearly two thousand grown folks beside! Did you ever hear of such a big party? I said it was different from any you ever saw, but I didn't think of the numbers who were there when I said that. I thought more of the place and of what happened.

Following a crowd of people who got off a West side cable car in Chicago on that nice autumn evening (one of the last in September) I found myself in the thick of a large crowd on a wide boulevard in front of one of the largest churches in the electric city. The church steps, railing and walks were filled with people, who were singing a familiar hymn while they waited for the "party" to begin. They might have been taken for a surprise party by one who didn't know. But if such an one had followed them into the big church auditorium he would have seen at once that they were all expected—and more, that (different from other parties) this host of people were the hosts and there was but a single guest!

Pretty soon we heard the sound of drums, and knew it belonged to the Boys' Brigade, which was to escort the expected guest. Nearer and nearer they came, and marched down through the aisles of the church, one hundred and eight strong, dressed in their regimentals and looking so noble and manly. The Girls' Brigade, fifty in number, followed. They wore red, white and blue silk turban caps, and were dressed in white. A double file was formed down the middle of the church, and the ranks saluted the guest as she passed through. She had a happy smile on her face, and I was certain that it was caused by the thought that all these young people had resolved to lead the best lives and be sturdy young Christians, pledging themselves never to use tobacco, alcohol or profane words. The company all rose and waved their handkerchiefs as she took a place with several other ladies on the platform behind a bower of green things and a big vase of white lilies.

Then the "party" began in earnest. There were singing and speeches—such fine speeches, all praising the guest for good works, and there were presents, too. One gift in particular she seemed to think a lot of. It was a big white book, and she called it "mother's book" afterward when she thanked the giver. It was the story of her own mother's life, which she had helped to write, and which had been bound in a most beautiful way especially for her—the gift of one hundred and nine people, many of whom were the printers and binders who had helped to make the book.

All the women and men who spoke seemed to take great pleasure in saying their words of praise, and spoke as if they meant them, too. But I must tell you about the children's part.

A note was sounded on the organ, the doors opened and there came marching in from each side of the platform a company of little girls all in white, each holding up in her hand an immense red rose. On they came, and I thought I had never seen a prettier sight, and all the hosts clapped their hands. I counted fifty-four as they marched around and then met on the lower platform in front of the company, which just held them all—the smallest tots being in front. Another girl in white—the fifty-fifth—then stepped in front of the guest and with a great big rose in her hand gave:

THE GREETING OF THE ROSES.

We've such a rare secret to tell you,
  Dear friends one and all, here to-night,
We scarcely can speak for the gladness
  Which fills all our hearts with delight;
We are learning such wonderful lessons
  From the flowers which we hold in each hand;
We are learning the meaning of roses,—
  Can we make you, with us, understand?

Look deep in the heart of this rose here,
  Red and glowing, like rubies distilled;
Catch the sweet breath of perfume it wafts forth
  From censers with ecstasy filled.
Think back to the rose-root which hideth
  In the mold of the dark earth, somewhere;
Think back to the tiny germ, sprouting,
  To the growth whose each leaf was a prayer.

A prayer to the sun for his shining,
  A prayer to the clouds for their rain,
The prayer of persistent endeavor
  Which never is offered in vain.
See the answer,—a crowning of glory—
  A heart of red, winged with flame;
What was first is as naught to what follows;—
  "The best cometh last"—these proclaim.

"And the lesson we've gleaned," do you question?
  You may look in her face here to-night,
As she sits the Queen-rose in Life's garden,
  On her brow Heaven's glorified light.
Do you mind all the years of her growing,
  Each year the unfolding of power,
While the red heart of love grew still redder,
  And the fragrance grew richer each hour?

Do you mind how each year in its flying
  Has opened some blossom more rare,
Some glimpse of a deeper devotion,
  Some triumphing grasp of faith's prayer?
Fifteen roses have bloomed since God called her
  To lead on our white-ribbon band,
And we praise Him to-day that each blossom
  Has but shown more and more His great hand.

Dear Chieftain, we're glad on your birthday,
  We're glad for each swift-rolling year,
As it brings to you fuller unfoldment,
  New heart-warmth, new fragrance, new cheer.
"Growing old," did you say? What a fancy!
  Growing young with God's infinite youth;
Oh, the rose which shall bloom for each New Year—
  Who can picture its glory, forsooth!

(All clasp hands and sing to the tune of "Home Again.")

CHORUS. Roses bright,
Roses light,
Roses by the score,
We bring them all, our heart's alight,
To greet our Chief once more.
Long the days since home you left
To cross the ocean's foam,
But oh, our hearts are glad to-night
To greet you, safe at home.

As the children sang they waved their roses, and looked just like a living rose garden. When they finished they turned and threw their beautiful flowers at the feet of the guest. Do you wonder that she arose and kissed little Mary Hastings, the speaker? I imagine she would have liked to do the same to the whole fifty-five! (I learned that the verses were written by Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson and the beautiful roses were the gift of a generous Chicago lady.)

When the boys and girls of the Brigade gave their greeting they sang the lady's own song, "Saloons Must Go," the song the temperance children know so well.

A little girl (the children seemed to have a great deal to do with this big party) then asked if she could say a word. Her name was Dorothy Horning, and she looked very happy as she went up to one of the ladies on the platform and said these words, written for her by Miss Ada Melville:

I don't know how it strikes you,
But it seems hardly fair
That one little girl, in one little minute,
Should have this big share in the honors that fly
So swift and so high,
But I'm glad I am "in it."

But here, I'm forgetting what I have to do.
Dear Miss Anna Gordon,
My speech is to you.
I bring you to-night, with these flowers so sweet,
The choicest of greetings to lay at your feet:
It is this:
The L. T. L. children, black, red, yellow, white,
Wherever they're found on the round earth to-night,
Would say, if they could, with hearts proud and true,
"We are glad we have lived in this dear world with you."

This lady (who is the leader of the temperance children round the world) took her by the hand and thanked her oh, so sweetly, for the flowers! I knew she was feeling sorry, as I know all the Cozy Cornerers were, when they heard that the children's fountain could not have been running and presented to the city on that day. (I'll keep my promise to tell you all about it later. Did you read on the first page of our UNION SIGNAL last week why it was delayed?)

Last of all the guest herself stood up to speak, and as she arose the people waved their handkerchiefs again and clapped their hands. I can't tell you all she said, but she thanked and said a kind word for everybody—and didn't leave one out. She never does! With a prayer and benediction came the end of the bright evening.

NEPHEWS AND NIECES.

I am a little temperance girl seven years old. I will send you ten cents. I did without a pencil sharpener and a slate sponge (I lost mine) and I went with mamma to a festival and they had a fishing pond and I fished twice and wanted to fish again, but I thought of you and saved a nickel. Papa is an engineer, and he took me for a ride on his big engine and I rang the bell. I want to be one of your children. EVA BELLE STILWELL.

Chicago, Ill.

Yours was the very first dime to come to Cozy Corner from the self-denying boys and girls. Our salute to the little Chicago girl, children!

We three have been self-denying all the time two days now. We don't use any taste of butter, and we do love butter, and Pearl and I don't have any sugar, so we are to have twenty cents apiece, but little Ruth is only six and she can't do without sugar, she thinks, so she won't have but ten cents next Saturday. VERNE SMITH.

Blessings on the helpful Cozy Cornerers who have practiced the art of self-denial!

Study to show thyself approved of God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the work of truth.—II. Tim. 2:15.

LOCAL DEPARTMENT WORK.

Bits of machinery lie here and there in the machinist's shop, for the time idle—apparently useless. In course of time there stands before the door a mighty engine,—wheel laid to wheel, bolt to bolt, plate to plate—ready to overcome.

In the manifold work of the W. C. T. U., Organization is the mighty engine that is drawing the train of Temperance and Purity straight up the hills of Reform. The climb is a steep one. Many-handed, strong-hating Opposition puts boulders on the track, tries to uncouple the cars, would quench the fire beneath the boiler, and throw mud and stones at the passengers. All this is hard to bear, but what care passengers, conductors and engineer, so the engine does not come to grief. While that is strong and swift and steady, let the foe rage and pelt,—reform is moving on!

Heavy upon the shoulders of each one lies a responsibility not to be measured by our finite understanding. Especially heavy does this responsibility lie upon the shoulders of those chosen to direct certain lines of activity—the local superintendents of departments.

Here, for illustration, is a union among whose departments of work, let us say, are those of temperance literature, mothers' meetings and legislation. A crisis is at hand in the little town. A law for the protection of the purity of the home has been violated. Redress is called for. It is the golden hour of Opportunity to put in a mighty blow for God and Home and Native Land. Who is ready? Some one suggests, "There is the W. C. T. U. Call on them. They make that sort of thing their business."

They are called upon.

"Why, yes, we can do something. Our department of legislation can take that up. Mrs. B. is the superintendent. She will help you."

Mrs. B. is called on. She is all sympathy—on the exterior. Within, confusion and mortification.

"Well, really, I would like to help you, but the truth is we haven't laid much stress on this department. (Mark the skillful use of the word "we.") I told the ladies not to elect me. Next time they'll know better, I trust. But there is Mrs. W. She has charge of the mothers' meetings, and they look out for just such things."

Mrs. W. is next sought. Alas! "What can we do. We've only had two mothers' meetings this year. No one was interested, and I didn't know how to interest them. Those who came said their sons and daughters were all grown up and safe. Really, it seemed useless."

The next day was the regular meeting of the union. The subject came up. Alarming ignorance of the law touching the case in hand was displayed on every side. Some did not know there had ever been need of such a law.

"Isn't there some literature we could have that would post us right on this point?" suggests some one.

The idea is a very bright one and snapped up voraciously. "Why, yes, Mrs. S., you are superintendent of our literature department. How is that?"

"I don't know," hesitatingly answers Mrs. S. "I take THE UNION SIGNAL, but don't read it often. I wasn't aware I had to study for the other members, and I don't really know what my department is for, anyhow!"

In the meantime broken law laughs unpunished in their shamed faces, and a stricken mother with an outcast daughter wonders why God and the "good women" didn't help them.

Yet the blame did not lie entirely at the doors of these three good women—Mrs. B., Mrs. W., and Mrs. S. "I told the ladies not to elect me. Next time they'll know better, I hope," tells the story.

The sole requirement of membership in the W. C. T. U. is the keeping of the pledge of total abstinence and payment of the annual fee. But that, alone, is not credential sufficient for election to a superintendency. The blacksmith finds quantities of iron and brass and steel before him, but he selects with care that which he must use for the engine. Some he can use for the wheels, some for the bolts, some for the boiler plates and some for minor parts—necessary but not vital. He makes a choice—intelligent—rigidly just and right. Human life is in the balance of his choice.

When the election of Mesdames B., W. and S. was pending, no one thought or knew of the future emergency. Perhaps there "was no one else who would take the office!" Perhaps they promised well and failed. At any rate they failed—the race was lost. Will "the ladies know better next time"?

It is a problem at the outset of a union's life how to carry on department work, because of the few members. After president, secretary and treasurer are secured, there is sometimes little material left to work with and in the eagerness to "do something," B., W., and S. are elected because they are there and their protests easily overborne.

Better would it be to defer work; to resolve the union into a class for awhile to study W. C. T. U. methods, sending to Headquarters for the very best literature that will explain the work of the departments; taking one department at a time, reading up, questioning, writing to other unions for help; if possible, sending a delegate to visit a neighboring union or a convention so that she may bring home hints and helps as to how others do—all with special reference to the locality in which the union is established.

Two or three months could well be spent in this way. Friends could be invited to attend these meetings—they would be members by and by. Then when each member of the union has an adequate conception of department work and the local needs for it, meet to consider election of superintendents. Meet with prayer. When a woman refuses to act, accept the refusal rather than peril that particular work of the organization. A sincere soul, who has promised God that she will do what she can, will not refuse a sincere call to work, unless the call is a distinct voicing of ignorance. "I told the ladies not to elect me—they will know better next time." Poor woman—she knew she could not work, and her sincere refusal not accepted was a great mistake. Better no department than a failure. We are in too much of a hurry. Wait! If God wants you to do work in a special line, He will raise up a worker. Perhaps she needs training before He lets you know her name. Give Him time.

However, we are human, and humanity blunders. If, therefore, you, poor, burdened superintendent, are convinced as Mrs. B. was, that the union made a mistake in electing you, and it will not accept your resignation—don't fail utterly. Do your best. Perhaps you are the one God has sent after all, untaught, untrained, unwilling, to learn by doing. Get to work. If you can't do anything else, call meetings of the union and ask questions. Make your electors teach you. Find out what you don't know. To know that you know nothing is to know something. Embellish your "nothing." It will add one to itself after awhile and become ten.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE IN ILLINOIS.

The legislature of Illinois in 1891 passed a law entitling "women to vote at any election held for the purpose of choosing any officer under the general or special school laws of the state." This act has been modified and defined by the supreme court to mean that women may vote for any officer who is to hold a school office which is not specified in the constitution. Thus she is entitled to vote for trustees of the state university, but is debarred from voting for state or county superintendents.

The law became operative the same year of its passage, but until this year there was no special effort made on party lines or otherwise, toward securing the vote of the newly enfranchised.

The interest manifested in the coming election by women electors shows that women of all classes are becoming fully alive to the importance of this inch of political ground extended to them by the "people of Illinois as represented by the general assembly," and the advisability of making the most of it; and to make the occasion of still more interest, each of the four political parties has placed women's names on its state ticket as nominee for university trustee.

The press throughout the state is actually treating the question of woman suffrage seriously—not school suffrage merely, but the full enfranchisement of women. Many leading papers regard with much favor this entering wedge; others, of course, "view with alarm," etc.

The Chicago Post is endeavoring to learn the sentiment of the new voters themselves upon the subject, and to this end is sending broadcast circulars, asking in substance the question, Will you vote? The circular states that "both of the great political parties have given women recognition in this campaign" by nominating—the Republicans, Mrs. Lucy L. Flower, the Democrats, Dr. Julia Holmes Smith. Probably the Post did not consider it necessary to mention the fact that the Prohibition and Populist parties have also thus recognized women in this campaign, for the reason that it goes without saying that these younger parties, with their progressiveness and well-known attitude toward women, should place the names of women upon their respective tickets. It would doubtless also be taken for granted that prohibition women, with their well-known progressiveness and up-to-dateness, would not need to be told that Mrs. Amelia B. Sanford, of Bloomington, and Mrs. Rena Michaels Atchison, of Chicago, were their respective candidates.

But it is the Democratic Herald which trembles for the "political integrity" of these women of Illinois who are to be so tempted and tried next November. It is the Herald which in a burst of moral enthusiasm beautiful to see, "confides" to them its own rule of political faith and practice (?)—"honesty is the best policy."

And why this solicitude on the part of the Herald? It has discovered that the women have discovered that it is possible to elect two women candidates instead of one—possible to elect both a Republican and a Democrat! It is much concerned lest women voters join this "startling coalition," betray their party, "knife" the man candidates, "plump" for the two women and secure two out of the nine trustees for the next four years.

Their party! Their candidates! What constitutes the possessive power in this case? Wherein lies the obligation of Illinois women to the Republican or Democratic party? We can understand why white-ribbon women should stand by the Prohibition party; why they should be loyal to prohibition politics and vote for prohibition nominees; we understand, too, somewhat, why Populist women should support Populist candidates, but we do not see why a Republican woman or a Democratic woman should be deemed "guilty of dishonesty" if, being entitled to vote for two trustees, she casts one vote for a nominee of "her own party" and one for a nominee of some other party. If the women of Illinois, or the men either, believe that the interests, not of partisanism, but of the state university—of education generally—would be better served by having two women on the board of trustees instead of one, then true "political integrity" demands that they endeavor to elect two. A great many of the men and women people of Illinois think it a pity that it is not possible at this time to secure four women trustees out of the nine.

It is intimated that women, by using the privilege of school suffrage to elect two of their own sex at the coming election, are taking "more than was given to them voluntarily." The spirit of the law gives to the women of Illinois, they are to distinctly understand, just one-ninth university trustee power. It demands of the elected her time and strength and gives in return—no salary. We hadn't thought much of this before, but the Herald's unfortunate reference to "giving" opens up rather an absurd phase of the situation. It reminds us of the man who bought for his wife's Christmas present some cloth for her to make trousers for himself.

The effectiveness of the "moral" of the Herald's editorial is further marred by its closing paragraph:

The women must recollect that the men still hold the power to grant or deny the general suffrage and to withdraw the partial grant of suffrage that already has been made. They had better treat the men fairly in regard to the school franchise, or they will get nothing more, and even that may be taken back.

What lack of diplomacy, to say the least, does it display when it thus threatens—actually threatens—the women voters of Illinois! How belittling and ignoble the assertion of "power" from the politically strong to the politically weak! We are truly glad that the Herald does not represent the manhood of our state, nor even of the city of Chicago. We should be sorry to think it represented in these dictatorial utterances toward an intelligent class of voters, the Democratic party.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

The women clerks in the Treasury Department at Washington are asking one another this question, almost with bated breath. The friends of the large number of high-salaried women clerks so recently discharged are also asking it, and it bids fair, through the daily press, to be most thoroughly ventilated the country over. This is the statement as it appeared in the Washington Post of recent date:

The large number of women clerks dismissed outright in the Treasury Department during the past few days has attracted considerable attention here. It is said to mark a new policy in Treasury appointments in the future. Of the clerks so far discharged fully five-sixths have been women clerks of the high-salaried grades. The vacancies created by the discharges of the women will be filled by appointing and promoting men to the places. The flood tide of women clerks in the Treasury has been reached, and henceforth, it is said, men will usually be appointed to the higher places. Some divisions are said to be seriously crippled from the heavy preponderance of women clerks, and in some rooms, where the ledgers are very heavy, they have to be lifted into place and shifted, as occasion requires, by the men in the office. As a rule, it is said that the women clerks are absent on account of sickness much more than the men clerks, which has had a potent influence in causing the change of policy as to appointments.

Editorially, both the Post and the Star have spoken strongly on the side of women as government employés. The latter says:

Some person in the department has been guilty of doing a great injustice to the women clerks, when the statement has been made that they are to be dropped from the rolls because they are not efficient clerks. This statement should not be allowed to pass unchallenged. The opposite is the fact. The women of this country have demonstrated the superiority of their qualifications in every branch of business which has offered to them employment. Within the past fifteen years they have gone steadily to the front in the faithful performance of duties which it was supposed could be done by men only. To-day, many of the more responsible places in the offices of large commercial houses are filled, and well filled, too, by women.

Many of them are charged with financial responsibilities, and the highest encomium that can be passed on them is that they are universally honest. There are no defalcations, no skipping to Canada, no stock market speculations. Too much cannot be said in defense of the women of this country, who are a great part of our wage-earning population. They have proved their efficiency long ago in the departments of the government, and there is no danger of their being removed and their places filled by men, as has been said will be done, because the latter can vote.

The former says:

The reasons assigned for this alleged change of policy are such as could readily be gotten up to order if the head of a department had made up his mind to get rid of women because they are not men. It is solemnly urged that women must go because they cannot lift heavy ledgers. Very few women have charge of books too heavy for them to handle. In such cases it might not be impracticable to effect a change of work. At all events a woman clerk should be as leniently treated as a man in her place would be. That is all that sensible women ask or expect. It is impossible for the Post to believe that the administration—the government of the United States—is even contemplating the retrograde movement which is said to have been already decided upon. It is not desired or expected that women should be treated with special courtesy or favor in the departments. Business principles should control public as well as private work. This is well understood by the women clerks, and they have gladly accepted the necessary conditions. The records abundantly attest their capacity and fidelity. Anything like discrimination against them will arouse indignation in the minds of the best citizens of all sections and all parties.

And yet, despite these assurances to the contrary, there is a widespread feeling that the movement is not one for the sole purpose of retrenchment, in which men will, doubtless, share equally with women, but is directed solely against the employment of women in high-salaried positions which a man, armed with that most effective weapon—a vote—would be glad to fill.

If men are to be removed, equally with women, how does it happen that "fully five-sixths" of those already removed have been women? It looks very much like a sex-boycott, and should it prove to be such, there should be a tide of indignant remonstrance poured into Washington, such as that center of our national life has never known.

Women, the country over, should watch the development of this matter with keenest interest. We cannot afford to take a backward step. We must not be forced into taking one.

THE CHICAGO CRUSADE.

Following the example of our English sisters, the white-ribboners of Chicago have commenced a crusade against "living pictures." At the September meeting of the Central union a committee of two—Mrs. L. A. Hagans and Mrs. Jane E. Zimmerman—was appointed to visit the theaters for the purpose of investigation.

The report of these ladies at the monthly meeting last Thursday, October 4, was such as to sicken the heart and rouse the indignation of every woman present. It is not, so said the report, merely in places acknowledged as disreputable, but in so-called "respectable" theaters that the most demoralizing and degrading exhibitions are daily presented to the public, and that moral leprosy—a loathsomeness which destroys both body and soul and which is undermining the very foundations of our national life—is not only openly allowed but assiduously cultivated.

The union promptly decided to pursue extended work on this line, and when W. C. T. U. women do this it means that they will wage incessant war against the iniquity until it ceases to exist. To this end the following resolution was passed:

WHEREAS, Investigation of the "living pictures" at certain places of amusement in this city has revealed the fact that the form of woman is made a shameful exhibit, therefore,

Resolved, That it is the self-evident right of women everywhere to require that the womanly form be clothed in all places to which the public is admitted, and that we ask the coöperation of women as such and of men as men in the enforcement of the law for the suppression of all these things by which pure sentiment is offended.

While it appears there is no state law to which we can appeal we are rejoiced to know that there exists a city ordinance which fully covers the case. We would suggest to city unions throughout the country the advisability of extending this crusade so necessary to the protection of our homes, and if they have no statute, state or municipal, to aid them, it would be wise to set about securing such as soon as possible. Women as a class have no conception of the proportions this crowning evil has already assumed. They naturally shrink from such investigations, but, as Mrs. Zimmerman pertinently remarked, it is a work to be done by women only. Men have no business at such exhibitions even as investigating committees, and, however repulsive the duty, where husbands and sons are menaced no white-ribboner will hesitate.

GOOD NEWS FOR ORDERLY STRIKERS.

An important decision was rendered in Chicago last week by the court of appeals which met to review the decision of Judge Jenkins in the celebrated Northern Pacific railroad case of last spring, when he issued an injunction against the employés of the road. Judge Jenkins had defined a strike as "a combined effort among workingmen to compel the master to the concession of a certain demand by preventing the conduct of his business until compliance with the demand," and is quoted as saying:

It is idle to talk of a peaceful strike. None such ever occurred. The suggestion is an impeachment of intelligence. All combinations to interfere with perfect freedom in the proper management of one's lawful business, to dictate the terms upon which such business shall be conducted, by means of threats or by interference with property or traffic or with the lawful employment of others, are within the condemnation of the law. It has been well said that the wit of man could not devise a legal strike, because compulsion is the leading idea of it. A strike is essentially a conspiracy to extort by violence; the means employed to effect the end being not only the cessation of labor by the conspirators, but by the necessary prevention of labor by those who are willing to assume their places, and, as a last resort, and in many instances an essential element of success, the disabling and destruction of the property of the master; and so, by intimidation and by the compulsion of force to accomplish the end designed.

The reviewing court, presided over by Chief Justice Harlan, decided that Judge Jenkins' injunction was not sufficiently specific in respect to strikes, inasmuch as all strikes are not conspiracies, and that this particular strike did not seek, by intimidation or other wrongful means, to cripple the operations of the road. Hence the court reversed the order of the Judge as to the right of men to strike, declaring that there is a legal discrimination between peaceful leaving off of work and a forceful restraining of other men to take their places. The decision of this reviewing court will be received with joy by the laboring classes and indeed by all who love equity and justice.

"I HAVE just read, 'How did you do it?' in THE UNION SIGNAL and at once go to my desk to write this card. I have been sick for months, not all the time confined to the house, but as we were to have the county convention with us, I much desired to be able to meet with it, and I was permitted to do so. The second one I asked to subscribe for THE UNION SIGNAL said 'yes.' I also asked to have Miss Willard's appeal read, which was done, and then I asked the sisters to pledge they would try and respond to the appeal. The one that gave me her name pledged she would try."

It is in the nature of ignorance to magnify false distinctions. To the Indian his tribe is all; to the statesman his nation; to the philosopher, the world, since the wider intelligence alone perceives that community of interest which a wider outlook alone reveals.

In like manner, the ignorant man—or the unphilosophic—makes much of sex distinctions, overlooking the larger generalization of humanity which includes men and women equally. For it has been demonstrated that sex does not determine any single function of human life, except that it debars a woman from being a father and man from attaining the vicarious sacrifice of motherhood. In all the lower orders of the mammalia, sex cuts absolutely no figure in the allotments of man.

Probably some Yankee farmer will triumphantly point to the cow as an animal of the female sex whose work is differentiated from that of the male bovine in a manner analogous to that between men and women in less enlightened days, but then he does not know that in great nations of Europe and the East no such distinction prevails. Our contention is and will always be that woman is first of all, a daughter of God, whose powers of thought and action should be left free that she may know the truth and that next she is a daughter of Humanity, whose relation to the state should be equal and self-determined, as is that of her brother man.

The Empress of Japan takes the leadership of the Red Cross and makes no distinction between Chinese and Japanese in her ministration of mercy. To-day she is the central figure in her empire for Christian progress; so is the Queen Régent of Spain who will not attend a bull fight; so was the Empress Regent of Germany in her merciful work for the flood sufferers during the hundred days when Frederick the Good was nominally, but the Empress really, at the helm of state; so was the Empress Regent of Brazil, when, during the absence of Dom Pedro, she freed the slaves. Why will not good men, beaten as they are at every turn, in their struggle to make government more humane, see that only by unshackling the merciful hand of woman can they secure votes enough to carry their measures of beneficence in a country where the side always wins that has most votes?

And still the signature problem crops up! It may be some time before On Duty can present the promised "consensus of opinion," as the opinions come in daily. The Household department hospitality entertained a baker's dozen of these interesting dissertations recently, but the Watch Tower is glad to extend all the courtesy that its eighty odd lines and other interests will afford. This week there is room for one only, but that is spicy enough to satisfy all. This is furnished by the well-known author, Abby Felton, whose contributions on art and other questions have at various times enriched our columns:

"The trend of the letters in the Watch Tower of September 6 is to the effect that present customs are satisfactory, and that the use of the prefix Miss to an unmarried lady's name is neither 'pert' nor 'vulgar,' as one previous correspondent seems inclined to think. Suppose a lady's name to be Helen M. Prouty, and that her adult daughter bears the same name. If a letter is received addressed to Mrs. Helen M. Prouty, which is the proper one to open it, if 'Mrs.' is used for both married and unmarried women? If Mrs. Prouty were writing to Rev. Sam Jones she would sign herself simply Helen M. Prouty, but would add, address Mrs Geo. Prouty, 12 Seaver street. Her unmarried daughter would simply give her name and address, and most correspondents would understand perfectly that the letter was written by a Miss. I think it a beautiful custom to retain the Madam for the grandmother, especially if she be a widow, and, moreover, it seems that the embarrassment to a single lady from being called Mrs. or Madam, and being obliged to explain that she was not a materfamilias would be greater than to be called Miss at the first. There is a peculiar honor in being called Miss Prouty, as the eldest daughter, quite equal to that appertaining to the position of the oldest son, and it would seem a pity to sink Miss Prouty in a general potpourri of Mrs. Proutys."

All of this meets my warm approval, except the extra direction "address Mrs. George Prouty," for I can see no reason why the husband's name should be used in correspondence, particularly if the street address is given. On Duty has no objections to the good husbands, but dislikes to see the good wives losing their identity and individuality.

ON DUTY.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD

KENTUCKY.

ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The fourteenth annual convention of Kentucky W. C. T. U. was the best ever held; not strictly on the principle that the last is always the best, either. It was not large numerically, on account of the hard times and great distance to be traveled by the women in the best organized part of the state to reach the convention town—Paducah. The audiences were, of course, large at night and unusually large at the day services. There are grand women in Paducah who had made the good influences of the work felt and had prepared the people for the convention.

Mrs. Mollie McGee Snell, of Mississippi, was with us from the opening to the close, and from the opening devotional exercises men came to hear her, all seemed to put on the "garment of praise," all felt the spiritual uplift.

Reports were good, in some departments better than ever before. Now these are reasons why the convention was our best. The welcome address was given by Mrs. J. G. Miller, for Paducah W. C. T. U., by little Miss Myrtle Hoyer, for the L. T. L., by Rev. W. H. Pinkerton for the ministers. Illness detained Mrs. Stella O. Hubble, who was appointed to respond. Mrs. Addie Northam Fields and Mrs. M. E. Bryan responded for the State W. C. T. U.

We were delightfully entertained by members of the three companies of L. T. L., and had excellent addresses from Mrs. Snell, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, Miss Clara Parrish, of Illinois, and Miss Laura Clay, of Kentucky.

Paducah has a population of about 8,000 and has sixty-nine saloons, but an annual convention has never been held where there was a warmer greeting, more general courtesy and larger audiences. The committee said homes could have been secured for a much larger number of delegates. The noontime lunch was elegant and abundant; from ninety to one hundred persons partook each day, and the committee sent quantities of excellent provisions to the poor.

After the address Saturday evening by Mrs. Woodbridge, the local union held a reception in their beautiful headquarters and served delightful refreshments. One feature of the visit to Paducah that should encourage the good women there, is that one of the most conservative churches of the Southland asked for a woman to take part in the Sunday evening exercises. For other churches the women were eagerly sought.

One thing was developed in the flower mission report by Mrs. Nannie A. Munnell, superintendent, the L. T. L. children on flower mission day pinned flowers on several saloon-keepers. This elicited some discussion and questions thick and fast; the explanation was that the thought was conveyed that the saloon-keepers were being prayed for and the text would be read and the mission of the white ribbon would be recognized. The press of Paducah was extremely liberal, giving full reports of convention to the extent of more than a column in each issue. The mayor, Mr. Yeiser, made a pleasant little speech, giving the W. C. T. U. welcome to the city.

Mrs. Munnell declined reëlection on account of feeble health, and having served faithfully and efficiently for five years thought the work should be given to some other. Mrs. Margaret Anderson Watts, of Louisville, was elected president. Mrs. M. M. Givens, who was elected corresponding secretary when Mrs. Munnell was made president, asked that the burden be laid upon hands less cumbered with other cares. Mrs. Sue Phillips Brown, of Owensboro, was elected to the office—two excellent selections, and with Mrs. M. E. Bryan, of Millersburg, reëlected treasurer, Mrs. Lizzie Knapp Myall, of Paris, reëlected recording secretary, Kentucky W. C. T. U. has grand leaders for the ensuing year. Mrs. Wallace, of Hopkinsville, was elected vice-president. Mrs. F. E. Beauchamp, of Lexington, was again made state organizer.

The standing committee on houses of reform, Mrs. F. E. Beauchamp and Miss Laura Clay, both of Lexington, was continued. A cordial invitation was extended from Lexington for the next annual convention, but the executive committee has the deciding of the time and place.

INDIANA.

CROWNED WITH SUCCESS.

"Rest not! Life is sweeping by,
Go and dare, before you die.
God will crown thy work at last."

The efforts of Indiana's white-ribboners, who have toiled so faithfully for our Industrial School for Girls, have been crowned with success. On the 17th of August the building, which was begun two years ago, was dedicated,—dedicated free from debt, "In behalf of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Indiana in the name of the Lord and for service in His work."

At 9:30 a. m. a bugle call summoned the large audience of about 4,000 to seats in the grove, where a platform had been erected and decorated for the speakers of the day.

Our state president, Mrs. Beck, opened the meeting with an address of welcome on behalf of the state. Mrs. Sarah Hadley followed with an address of welcome on behalf of the county. The orators of the day were President Joseph Swain, E. P. Bicknell, John L. Griffith, Col. E. F. Ritter, Robert E. Carmack and Judge J. V. Hadley,—gifted, earnest men, whose sympathy and glowing prophecies delighted and encouraged our white ribbon sisters. Miss Mary Hadley read a poem on "Giving."

Mrs. M. A. Leavitt, our W. C. T. U. poetess, read a poem written for the occasion. The dedicatory hymn was written by Jennie L. Miller. Miss Hay, the treasurer, announced that the amount of indebtedness to be liquidated was $1,689. Mrs. Calkins' solicitations brought forth donations (and subscriptions on short time) to the amount of $2,057.

This beautiful emblem of the faith and prayers of the W. C. T. U. is a shining gem, a light set on a hill, for it can be seen for quite a distance around. We hope to furnish and put the school into operation this fall. We "praise God from whom all blessings flow."

The most liberal contributor to the building fund was Mr. Robert Carmack, of Illinois, the amount of whose donations is $1,600.

The W. C. T. U. work has been kept up well during the summer. Reports of increase of membership come from many parts of our state.

The superintendent of evangelistic work in Evansville employed an evangelist and his wife to assist her for five weeks in Gospel Tabernacle work. There were many conversions, many signatures to the temperance pledge, and a spiritual uplifting for our own organization and many others. It awakened a great interest in W. C. T. U. work. "The poor had the gospel preached to them," and many heard who never enter a church.

The unions throughout the state will make a grand effort to secure a scientific temperance instruction law from the incoming legislature. The petition was presented by some of the county presidents to the county institutes of public school teachers, thus getting many signatures early in the work. The president of Vanderburgh county thereby obtained 141 signatures and no doubt many others did as well.

One of Indiana's red-letter days, our beloved Mother Wallace's birthday, has been generally observed by giving suffrage teas, the proceeds from the entertainments to be sent to our state paper, The Organizer. Nothing inspires our workers as much as our state and National papers. Without them our work would not progress at half the present pace.

Southern Indiana is becoming aroused and I look for good work from this part of the state in the future. God blesses our work and each day a new song of praise should ascend from our hearts.

N. Cornelia Meadows,

RHODE ISLAND.

"Lead me in Thy truth and teach me."

The revelation of truth is progressive. Step by step, as we follow the call of duty, the horizon broadens and the arching heavens rise higher above our heads. This has been the history of our W. C. T. U. as an organization and of each consecrated worker in its ranks.

Providence union has issued a pretty "Souvenir" giving a brief outline of its organization and development during the past twenty years. It was the outgrowth of a movement which immediately followed the crusade in Ohio, and, organized April 16, 1874, is the oldest union in our state. From this small beginning it has grown in numbers and influence until now, with its large membership, it carries on successfully twelve departments of work besides having the entire management of the Elisha Dyer Vinton Home for newsboys and bootblacks. The president, Mrs. G. F. Martin, has held that office for sixteen consecutive years. This fact testifies more strongly than any words to her faithfulness and efficiency in the work as well as to the high esteem in which she is held by her colaborers.

If the history of our union prove so interesting, we anticipate a rich treat in the little volume now nearly ready, telling of twenty years of work in the whole state. This is edited by our able president, Mrs. M. A. Babcock, while Mrs. J. K. Barney and other workers, whom we are proud to call our women, have opened their storehouses of anecdote and experience to enrich its pages. It will be a valuable memento to every white-ribboner in Little Rhody, and we think many of our sisters beyond the state line will find it both interesting and profitable reading.

And now, although our eyes are turned steadily forward to the work before us, let us cast a glance backward at the pleasant vacation days that have given us renewed strength and courage for these coming duties. Many of our members have been flitting here and there, "sowing beside all waters," for of course a white ribbon must carry its message of warning, instruction and cheer, even in vacation days. But neither have those at home been idle. One of the pleasantest incidents of the summer was our W. C. T. U. day at the Hebronville camp-meeting.

To this beautiful spot a delegation of white-ribboners, representing eight unions in Rhode Island, went on the morning of August 14. At the hour appointed for a prayer service, Rev. A. A. Hoyt, who had so kindly given us the day to talk to the people of our work, conducted us to the place of worship. After a short praise service, Mrs. H. D. Walker conducted the service of prayer, several earnest petitions were voiced and the leader spoke to us from those wonderful words in Isaiah, when the Lord says, "Fear not, neither be thou dismayed."

At 10:30 Rev. Mr. Hoyt introduced Mrs. Babcock as the presiding officer of the day. Miss Thurston, of Newport, led the devotional exercises, and then an address on "Seed time and harvest" was given by Elizabeth P. Nichols. Miss Thurston gave a fine account of rescue work conducted by the Newport Y. W. C. T. U. Her earnestness and enthusiasm helped all to feel that great things may be accomplished by those who have faith in God. A paper on peace, prepared by Miss Mary Olney was read, impressing upon all the blessedness of peaceful settlement of all disputes by arbitration as far better than the warfare between those that disagree. A children's meeting at one o'clock was followed by a Bible reading by Mrs. H. D. Walker from "Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed?"

Mrs. Martin spoke of the difficulty of finding workers in the department of social purity, and yet of the great importance of the work and in words of appreciation introduced Mrs. M. A. Babcock to speak upon that topic. As always, Mrs. Babcock's words were well chosen, clear and sound. Mrs. Stoddard spoke of mission work in Boston. In the evening Mrs. Walker preached a gospel sermon, and a testimony meeting closed the day's service that had been richly blessed to all who were present.

A district convention held at Block Island, the last of August, was also timely as the sail is delightful to those who enjoy the motion of the waves. First on the program came an excellent dinner. This was fully appreciated after the salt sea breezes and fitted every one to enjoy and digest the earnest words that followed. Among the speakers were our president, Mrs. M. A. Babcock, our corresponding secretary, Miss E. P. Nichols, Mrs. G. F. Martin, Hon. H. B. Metcalf and others. Mrs. J. H. Pay aroused the interest of the children and organized a promising L. T. L.

The prohibitory convention met at Steinway Hall, Providence. The "Cincinnati platform" was adopted, two representatives nominated and earnest practical words spoken by different workers. Many ladies were present as delegates from the towns and expressions of appreciation of this interesting and helpful convention were heard on all sides.

AMONG THE UNIONS.

Portsmouth made its annual meeting both educational and social. Friends were invited to the afternoon session, when the business was followed by an address. Supper was served from six to eight, and then followed addresses, recitations, singing and refreshments.

Carolina union is wide awake to its needs, and an able paper by Mrs. Crandall on "How we can best advance the cause of temperance in our village," was wise and practicable in its suggestions. We shall expect to hear more from there soon.

During the past year the Woodville Bands of Mercy, Hope and Peace-makers have met regularly once in two weeks. A picnic, conducted largely by the children, proved pleasant and helped the treasury.

Watchemoket has distributed food and clothing, has given two parlor teas, and gained eleven new members.

The rescue mission at Pawtucket has moved to a better location. Rev. J. N. Collins, who has so satisfactorily filled the position of superintendent during the past three months, will now devote his entire time to the work. The interest in the mission has grown during his labors this summer. Miss Nichols and Mrs. Walker are among the W. C. T. U. speakers who help from time to time.

A parlor meeting at Middletown proved so successful that it will lead the way for others soon.

The Olneyville open air meetings have been held regularly since they were started, and much interest is manifested.

The open air meetings at Pawtucket, addressed by our brother, John Collins, are largely attended, and the seed is sown.

Even little Rhode Island has a few small places where no W. C. T. U. exists, but this cannot be said much longer for one by one they are falling into line. We gladly extend our greeting to Noyes Beach, where Mrs. Babcock has organized a band of faithful women for God and Home and Native Land.

Mrs. Mary C. Leavitt, our round-the-world missionary, has spent a week among our unions, speaking at Phenix, Westerly, Pawtucket, Central Falls and Warren. Her meetings were a great success and we hope to see her again on her return from her winter's sojourn.

RELIEF AND FAIR WORK.

It is felt by our W. C. T. U. workers that relief work must form a prominent feature of their activities the coming year. With a general failure of crops as a result of the long drouth of the past summer, many unions can do but little more than provide for the wants of the needy. Omaha union has already taken up this work. The consolidated union there, with its 103 members, has been very active in various ways.

Headquarters were maintained on the fair grounds, and a temperance program presented each afternoon. This comprised a medal contest on children's day, a lecture on "Purity for our Farmers' Lads and Lassies," a talk on "Hygienic Food for the Farmer's Table," and one afternoon filled by the Y's in charge of Mrs. Waltemeyer. Mrs. W. A. Howland deserves great praise for the success of this work.

The railroad committee, with Miss Hester Miller, superintendent of railroad work, are about opening a coffee house at the Union Pacific shops, where two cups of good coffee are to be sold for a nickel in opposition to the free lunch and beer.

Gospel temperance meetings are held every Sunday in some part of the city. Demorest medal contests have helped the work financially, and the Douglas county convention held at Hanscom Park recently, was a very profitable occasion. There were about eighty in attendance, with Mrs. Margaret Park presiding. Mrs. W. H. H. Tracey read an excellent paper on organization. Mrs. Dale reported the temperance work in the Sunday-schools, Mrs. Jardine that of jail and prisons. Three meetings are held each Sunday and Easter was observed by a distribution of flowers. Mrs. Anna Woodby talked upon work among the children; Mrs. Wattemeyer discussed mothers' meetings, and Mrs. Bryant reported excellent progress in her mission work among the Chinese. "What Came to me in Chicago" was the subject of a paper by Mrs. Henderson. A number of five-minute speeches and election of officers completed the work of the day. Mrs. E. M. Covell was elected president, Mrs. Viola McCartney, secretary.

The seventh district held a very profitable convention in Wayne, although heat, strikes and summer vacations made the attendance rather small. Mrs. Woodward was present, and rendered much assistance, speaking the second evening. The first evening was given to a medal contest, in which Miss Jennie Mettlen, of Nebraska Normal College, won the silver medal. Press work was discussed by Mrs. Woodward and others—two of the editors of the city being present and joining in the discussion. A fine paper, on "Home Influence," was read by Mrs. Pyle, and Mrs. Hitchcock, of Ponca, gave an excellent evangelistic report. Some drove a long distance to attend, but all felt well repaid.

An enthusiastic band of women gathered at Ainsworth in August to hold the sixteenth district convention. The president, Mrs. L. H. Blackburn, was far from well, but God gave her strength and grace to perform her duty through the convention. Mrs. Blackburn is greatly beloved and appreciated by her women. A consecration service, led by Mrs. Rising, opened the work of the convention, and was a season of great profit. Greetings from the state president were read, and an earnest discussion followed a paper on the "Advantages of the Ballot." Another paper, "The Mother of Girls," by Mrs. Mastic, was much enjoyed. The children were not forgotten, but "How to Keep Up Interest in the L. T. L." was discussed, and Mrs. Northup told "How to Raise your Boys and Girls."

The manner of securing prompt payment of district dues was so clearly presented by Mrs. Hornby that each one felt the only task in the office of district treasurer was giving bonds. The honorary members were most helpful, greetings being given by Mr. Rising and Rev. Delong, and a short address by Rev. Moore. Mrs. Chase also welcomed the ladies and Mrs. Ramsey and Havens responded. Mrs. Blackburn was reëlected president and Mrs. Havens corresponding secretary.

York county convention was held in Gresham with an attendance of twenty-five, the Y's furnishing music for each evening. Mrs. Kate G. Northup presided.

Mrs. Levy conducted a very profitable mothers' meeting. Mrs. Walker, president of the fourth district, gave a parliamentary drill in the form of a "Model" union and a "Go-as-you-please" union, which caused much merriment and gave some good hints of right and wrong methods. The children of the L. T. L., under the direction of Miss Lillian Simkins, gave a delightful half-hour of recitations and songs. Mrs. E. M. J. Cooley's lecture in the evening was highly appreciated judging by the hearty applause and the large collection at its close. Mrs. Emma Wellman, York, was chosen president, Mrs. E. W. Smith, York, corresponding secretary. Mrs. Ferguson, president of the district, was present, and a number of visitors from Surprise.

Miss Editha E. Wiard, of Silver Creek, was called to her heavenly home in June. The cause of her death was heart failure. She had just returned from the state Sunday-school convention at York. Miss Wiard had been a cripple since she was fifteen months old, but in the deformed body dwelt a beautiful soul and with all the strength that was given her she labored for the Master. She often met with us in conventions, her face lit up with interest and intelligence. She was always ready with voice and pen to do what she could for the uplifting of humanity. Her beautiful poems have cheered and blessed many a tired worker.

Several of our busy workers have been laid aside for a time by illness. Mother Putnam, Mrs. Brakefield, Mrs. Marshall, Mrs. Clark, yet we hope to greet them all at our annual convention at Lincoln, which is anticipated with much interest.

Many changes will of necessity be made, but we look to God for guidance and in Him put our trust.

LOCAL WORK.

We think there is greater interest and activity in our work in all lines manifested by prompter replies to letters of superintendents and officers. There has been great religious awakening in many parts of the state, and the W. C. T. U. women never fail to respond by greater zeal in their work. Though we are yet in our infancy as regards organized work, our men say that it was the work of the women which has given us a dry state, excepting seven counties.

CORINTH union reports regular meetings with large honorary membership, public meetings held monthly in each of the five churches in rotation, dues well paid up and literature furnished in railroad stations.

CRYSTAL SPRINGS is after the blind tigers, which is a sure sign that she is alive.

EDWARDS union has added seven to its roll and will take up press work at their next meeting.

OKOLONA is "holding the fort" and hopes for help soon.

NATCHEZ union meets every week, has expended fifty-six dollars this year in rents, literature, medals, etc., is paying for a piano, filling two sides of a little paper of their own as they cannot get a hearing in the local press, observing week of Self-Denial and prayer, and has occasional lectures on subjects to educate and agitate, one hundred and fifty-six bouquets have been distributed with texts and two hundred papers and magazines in hospital. All red-letter days have been observed. This union uses Responsive Readings, and in many other things sets an example which we wish all unions in the state would follow.

MCCOMB has no idea of Natchez keeping ahead of her in work; has eleven departments of work, over fifty members, nearly one hundred honorary members and growing all the time; holds gospel meetings every month, with increasing interest; has held a medal contest—Miss Mollie Currie receiving the medal—holds receptions for honorary members, which is an excellent idea. McComb is a railroad town, with the large shops of the Illinois Central road there, and we know this union will be an uplifting power in the lives of those hard working men.

The superintendent of press work has just made her report to the state, urging all unions to united effort on this line.

The state corresponding secretary has been very busy gathering up the loose ends and putting things into shape for work.

The dark clouds of financial depression grow blacker all the time, and five cent cotton paralyzes our energies, but when the day breaks we will try to come out with the sunshine.

HERE AND THERE.

I wish to correct an oversight in my last report. The name of our state president is such a household word on this coast that it was easy to speak of her without giving her name, but seeing the report in print without it, involves this statement, for every reader should know that she who leads this western brigade is no other than Mrs. B. Sturtevant-Peet, and the success of her last school of methods under circumstances so depressing, should add new laurels to the name her loving followers delight to honor.

We are especially fortunate in our superintendent of song, Mrs. L. E. Bailey, whose efficient help at the school of methods was felt by every one.

Our valiant Mrs. Skelton, chief among pioneers, has gone eastward in compliance with the duties of a National organizer, and while we miss her tireless activity and ardent zeal in our special field, we know that her faithful work is telling somewhere else.

Miss I. C. De Velling has done, and is still doing excellent work in the far northern part of the state. I wonder, in reading reports from other states that lie between such near lines of latitude and longitude, how much eastern people realize of what it means to organize a state whose seaboard is more than 800 miles, where railroads are but few, and mountain ranges to be crossed only by exhausting and expensive staging, and where money is more easily obtained for any other object than temperance work; where half the people look at all such efforts as little less than treason to the business interests of the state, in attacking "the great and important industry of wine making."

The fact that the Republican nominee for governor is a leading distiller does not detract in the least from the hurrah of his party, but only serves to increase the respectability of his business. How long, O Lord!

A new factor is rising, which in its influence and results will undoubtedly be highly effective in temperance reform. That the Catholic church in its sagacity should see that the temperance cause is not a thing to be secularized is not strange, and a movement to introduce temperance work as a part of the legitimate machinery of the church is one of the hopeful signs of this progressive era. Two cultivated ladies of high social standing have devoted themselves to this object. Mrs. A. T. Toomy and her daughter, Miss Lily A. Toomy, who will both be remembered among the speakers at the Women's Congresses at Chicago, have been the first women to stand before the altar of a Roman Catholic church and address a congregation.

They have organized a Catholic Woman's Temperance Union in this city and I believe in some other towns, and have entered upon a systematic plan of work designed to cover the state. They are highly indorsed by the bishops and other clergy of their church, and will be able through this and their own winning personality to reach thousands who have not yet had an arrest of thought.

TWO CHAUTAUQUAS.

I send a special report this month in order to make mention of the work done by our honorary state president, Mrs. A. R. Riggs, at two summer Chautauquas in our state. At the one held first, at Gladstone Park, she gave a brief address on the ballot for woman, following one on the same subject by Dr. Ed. Salke. Mrs. Riggs had an hour each day for school of methods, besides an hour's address on "Temperance Day," when her topic was mainly on "God's thought of woman as a factor in all the lines of the world's work." Many words of appreciation reached the speaker afterwards, and perhaps the greatest of all was a request from Dr. Selah Brown for a copy of it, if to be had, in printed form. This, coming from a man of thought, traveled and cultured as he is, was worth a good deal.

The other Chautauqua was at Ashland, South Oregon. Papers from ten state superintendents were read on their different departments, followed by general discussion, and finally clenched by a few words from Mrs. Riggs. Ventilating the work of the W. C. T. U. at Chautauquas seems one of the very best means of exciting interest in it among the thinkers of the community, who have not themselves embarked in it. Mrs. Riggs says: "I was the only W. C. T. U. woman, and I felt honored in being the only woman speaker among so many noted lights of the other sex!"

THE PRESIDENT AFIELD.

Our state paper, The Texas White Ribbon, which has had rather a varied career for the past year, has recently been removed from Dallas to Waco. Mrs. Ada C. Rew has accepted the editorial chair and the first number gives promise of a bright, newsy paper of which we may be proud. Mrs. Rew's greeting is very bright and makes those of us who are hedged in by domestic duties feel that perhaps we may do something after all.

Mrs. Stoddard, our state president, is almost a perpetual motion machine. Just after convention she went to Granger and held three meetings. This town has the honor of an L. T. L., organized and conducted by a Baptist minister. A union was then organized at Round Rock. The beautiful state banner was presented to the Rockdale L. T. L. by Mrs. Stoddard and several meetings held with the women.

Then on to Cameron she went, where she addressed the teachers of the summer normal on the subject of scientific temperance instruction. At Belton a good union was organized.

At Baylor University Mrs. Stoddard addressed one of the largest summer normals in the state. The teachers there, as all over the state, are alive to the great importance of thoroughly teaching scientific temperance in all the schools.

A large public meeting was held at Rheinhardt; one of the audience was the only saloon-keeper in Dallas county, outside of the city of Dallas. A union of twenty women and twenty-three men was organized.

The local option election, which has been called in Brooklyn Heights, a suburb of Ft. Worth, is exciting much interest. Mrs. Stoddard has spoken there several times, once giving a chart lecture at which Miss Grace Calhoun sang, "Will it Pay?" The "Fanny L. Armstrong" L. T. L., which is prospering under the superintendency of Mrs. Bessie Ligon, will go in a body to Brooklyn Heights to help local option with their inspiring songs.

Fort Worth union has devoted most of its efforts to rescue work this summer. Almshouse work is being prosecuted, the superintendent and assistants visiting the county poor farm every Monday. The Pathfinder series of physiologies have been introduced into the public schools of Fort Worth as well as into many others.

Fort Worth had a grand temperance rally recently at the Christian church, our state president giving a chart lecture on scientific temperance instruction which was pronounced by the speakers who followed her to be the best they had heard. Four ministers and a judge made short speeches. Judge Halsell made a rousing speech in which he gave an account of the scene in Congress when the bill making temperance teaching obligatory in all the schools under government control was raised. He referred feelingly to the anxious faces of the women in the galleries.

Midland union keeps up an active L. T. L., distributes temperance literature, edits a column in the paper and meets every two weeks, when not hindered by sickness or sandstorms. The union considers itself blest in having a Methodist pastor in the town who helps them in every way. He preached a sermon on Mary anointing the Saviour's feet, and the disciples finding fault, dwelling on the words of Jesus, "Let her alone." He spoke of the work of the W. C. T. U., and said there were those in the church who were throwing themselves directly across its path, and added, "It is a shame."

Midland union is fortunate in having as one of its most faithful members our state evangelist, Mrs. E. M. Haughton.

Our state superintendent of L. T. L. work, Miss Margaret Angus, has traveled 1,000 miles this summer in the interest of her department. New Legions and unions have sprung up all along her way. Full of enthusiasm, the children are charmed with her talks. In San Antonio she addressed the Central union, spoke in Trinity church at night, talked to the Comal street L. T. L. Saturday afternoon, attended a Y social that night, Sunday afternoon organized an L. T. L. at Sherman street, addressed the L. T. L. at West End, gave a Bible reading in West End Methodist church that night, Monday morning reorganized the L. T. L. at the Orphans' Home, and that afternoon made a wrapper for her hostess! She has no idea of the meaning of "a little more folding of the hands to rest."

West End L. T. L. moves on quietly, the faithful superintendent, Mrs. Rountree, never misses a meeting, often going when a less energetic person would be in bed. There have been two medal contests this summer, and another is to take place in a few days. The two medals were won by two sisters, Bertha and Lillie Mehlin.

PROMOTED.

Temperance work in Texas has sustained a great loss in the death of Mr. Canfield. Our president says, "Never had the W. C. T. U. a nobler, truer friend and brother. Mrs. Canfield, who was our efficient secretary, has the profound sympathy of all who know her." San Marcas union mourns the loss of Mrs. Agnes Vest, who has so faithfully filled the place of recording secretary since its organization. Miss Rebecca Edwards, of Huth W. C. T. U. died July 17, the first of their union to be promoted.

MRS. CORNELIA KEITH CARTER,
State Reporter, San Antonio.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

MRS. E. H. CHASE, former editor of the Minnesota White-Ribboner, has resigned that post to become literary editor of the Minnesota Housekeeper, where she will have frequent opportunity to ventilate temperance truths. Mrs. Bessie Laythe Scoville, of Duluth, former Y. W. C. T. U. state superintendent, assumes the vacant editorial chair.

IN response to popular appeal, Miss Emma Bates, of Fargo, N. Dak., has become nominee for the office of state superintendent of public instruction by both the Prohibition and Republican parties. Miss Bates has been a prominent W. C. T. U. worker, especially in social purity, and was for some time the efficient state reporter to THE UNION SIGNAL. Her high characteristics and her large experience in educational lines eminently fit her for the important public office to which she will undoubtedly be elected.

MR. ROGER F. M. ANDREWS, of Stanford, Conn., is a young man of fine antecedents, education and promise. He has taken up the cause of the W. C. T. U. and is giving acceptable lectures (illustrated) under the auspices of local unions, by means of which he is raising money for our enterprise, and, as a matter of course, meeting his own expenses. Mr. Andrews is warmly thought of by our Mrs. Forbes, of Connecticut, and her endorsement is as good as any young man could desire. We wish him well, and that many other bright young people may and would dedicate their lives to the white ribbon movement, and that they could not find one more in harmony with the highest ideals of their mothers, or more truly woman's answered prayer.

THE South Side W. C. T. U., Chicago, has aided the work started by the Champaign, Ill., local temperance union in sending a petition signed by three hundred and fifteen names to the Illinois legislature asking for the enactment of a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within four miles of the University of Illinois and other colleges and universities which receive state appropriations.

THE Chicago Central W. C. T. U. has resumed its winter work with great vigor. In place of discontinuing some of its many missions, as was first thought unavoidable, because of the financial stress, they will all be retained and considerably extended. This was accomplished by permitting each individual member to select the mission to which she would give her best effort. In this way every member has "something to do." At the close of the initial fall meeting, September 6, an appetizing luncheon was served and a genuine social time enjoyed.

SOCIAL purity work in St. Louis received an impetus by an enthusiastic all-day mass-meeting in the Union M. E. church, September 24, the first of the kind ever held in that city. The attention of Christian workers was called to the necessity for rescue homes, and liberal donations were taken up. Mrs Charlton Edholm took active part in the meetings, taking for her subject, "The Link Between Rescue Work and Liquor Question." She attended the Indiana W. C. T. U. convention, October 5–9, and gives addresses under the auspices of W. C. T. Unions wherever called.

THE Cuba, N. Y., temperance assembly held its annual meeting August 14 to 18. Addresses were delivered by Dr. Anna Shaw, John G. Woolley, Rev. A. C. Dixon, T. V. Powderly, Rev. M. C. Peters and Mr. M. Van Bennett. Mr. and Mrs. Beveridge and the Schubert quartette furnished the music. The W. C. T. U. day was exceedingly profitable and a great credit to the participants, Mrs. Julia Merrill, Miss Alice Potter, Miss Edna Bliss and Dr. Shaw. The meeting was a truly memorable gathering, and lack of space alone forbids the full report kindly sent by Mrs. Ella R. Searle.

JOHN G. WOOLLEY'S address, delivered before the Ohio Methodist Conference, September 6, and published in THE UNION SIGNAL of September 13, has been leafleted by the W. T. P. A. and sells at one cent each, or ninety cents per one hundred. Mrs. Woolley, 5535 Cornell street, Chicago, has her husband's great Christian Endeavor speech, delivered at Cleveland, July 13, for the same price; while F. W. Clark, 294 Washington street, Boston, has brought out a cheap edition of the latter which he sells at twenty-five cents per one hundred copies—one dollar and twenty-five cents per one thousand, postpaid. These wonderful words cannot be too widely scattered. Verily, if the church of Christ fails to arouse itself on this question it will not be because the voice has failed to cry, in the wilderness, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight."

A rule interfering with necessary or desired transaction of business may be suspended by a two-thirds vote. The rules cannot be twice suspended for the same purpose during the same meeting. The motion to suspend cannot be debated and cannot be amended, nor can a vote on the motion be reconsidered.

Constitutional law cannot be set aside for any purpose whatsoever. Nor can it be legally altered or amended except in the precise manner prescribed by the Constitution.

By-laws may be amended or "voted out" at any annual meeting by a two-thirds vote, unless your law reads that previous notice must be given in which case they are no more flexible than the Constitution itself.

The secretary cannot cast the ballot if any one objects. In such a case the convention must proceed to a formal ballot.

OKLAHOMA CONVENTION CALL.

The fifth annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of Oklahoma will meet at Guthrie, October 17–19.

MRS. MARINDA H. SWITZER, Pres.
MRS. MINNIE D. STORM, Sec.

COLORADO CONVENTION CALL.

The fifteenth annual convention of the Colorado W. C. T. U. will be held in the First Baptist chuch, Denver, October 17–19. An excellent program is being prepared.

Cor. Secy's Notes.

The following is at hand, for which we return thanks: "Your letter of greeting was received as we were assembled in convention at Lincoln. It was most helpful and encouraging to know we were remembered by our National officers. I believe your prayer for us was answered. We had a most harmonious and profitable convention and trust the influence of it may be a benediction upon our work the coming year. May God's blessing rest upon our approaching National Convention and give to all, both officers and delegates, wisdom and strength to hold up the banner of the Lord.

Most sincerely yours,
DORA V. WHEELOCK,
Cor. Sec. Neb. W. C. T. U.
By order of convention.

Miss Mary G. Hay, chairman of the committee of transportation for our annual Convention, writes: "The Central Traffic Association has granted one fare for the round trip. The other associations will meet next week, and I trust in the next issue of THE UNION SIGNAL I may be able to make a like announcement for all associations, and thus the same convention rate will prevail from all points."

The new president of North Carolina, Mrs. Mary E. Cartland, writes: "Our state executive met last Saturday. We feel encouraged in our work. Several unions are taking on new life. I am anticipating much help from our National Convention."

Miss Hattie Henderson, corresponding secretary Texas union, tells us that space has been given the W. C. T. U. on the grounds of the Waco Cotton Palace and the Dallas exposition, the latter sufficient for a Rest Cottage. They have also provided for the woman's congress, in which W. C. T. U. women are important factors.

We are grieved that errors creep into our column. Last week in presenting a request of the entertainment committee of Cleveland the item read, "delegates wishing to be entertained at the same 'time' will please inform," etc. Please re-read the paragraph, substituting the word place for "time," when you will see how Mrs. Terrill, the chairman of entertainment committee, is striving to arrange for the pleasure and comfort of delegates.

By some means the idea has prevailed that Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, Portland, Mich., superintendent of school of methods and parliamentary usage, is not well. Mrs. Benjamin desires that the mistake be here corrected, and we are glad to state that she is in usual health and ready for service in response to calls.

BUDS, Society buds, young women just entering the doors of society or womanhood, require the wisest care. To be beautiful and charming they must have perfect health, with all it implies—a clear skin, rosy cheeks, bright eyes and good spirits. At this period the young woman is especially sensitive, and many nervous troubles, which continue through life, have their origin at this time. If there be pain, headache, backache, and nervous disturbances, or the general health not good, the judicious use of medicine should be employed. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the best restorative tonic and nervine at this time. The best bodily condition results from its use. It's a remedy specially indicated for those delicate weaknesses and derangements that afflict womenkind at one period or another. You'll find that the woman who has faithfully used the "Prescription" is the picture of health, she looks well and she feels well.

In catarrhal inflammation, in chronic displacements common to women, where there are symptoms of backache, dizziness or fainting, bearing down sensations, disordered stomach, moodiness, fatigue, etc., the trouble is surely dispelled and the sufferer brought back to health and good spirits.

"WOMAN'S ILLS."

MRS. W. R. BATES, of Dilworth, Trumbull Co., Ohio, writes:

"A few years ago I took Doctor Pierce's Favorite Prescription, which has been a great benefit to me. I am in excellent health now. I hope that every woman, who is troubled with 'women's ills,' will try the 'Prescription' and be benefited as I have been."

ANNOUNCEMENT.

CHICAGO, September 13, 1894.

To the Subscribers, Patrons and Contributors of the Chicago Magazine:

On the 10th inst. a reorganization of the Chicago Magazine Pub. Co. occurred, it being succeeded by the Chicago Magazine Co. The change affects the business department solely, the editorial management remaining as heretofore. It has been decided to greatly improve the scope of the publication, and place it on the plane of the popular monthlies by illustrating it profusely, well known artists being secured to undertake this new feature of the magazine. Owing to the large additional work contemplated and the time necessary to its execution, it has been decided to bring out the first issue of the "new Chicago Magazine" on the first of October. All subscriptions have been extended sufficiently to cover the lapse thus occurring, and the new management trusts this will meet the approval of all concerned. Respectfully,

THE CHICAGO MAGAZINE CO.

AN APOLOGY.

To the many white-ribboners who have given us orders for the new and beautiful "white ribbon pin," we wish to say that the delay is an enforced one on our part, the manufacturer having been unable promptly to supply us. As soon as they reach our office orders will be filled in the order in which they have been received.

C. F. GROW, Manager.

WHY NOT TO-DAY?

The time for the twenty-first annual convention of the National W. C. T. U. draws near. Why not get your new subscriber for THE SIGNAL to-day. It will encourage some other good sister if you mention that you have sent in a new name.

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Please find money enclosed to pay for my subscription to THE UNION SIGNAL. Times are really too hard to even try to do without THE SIGNAL. Long may it wave for "God and Home and Every Land."

The ninth annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of Nevada was held in Reno, September 18, 19, and was successful in every way. Great credit is given by the corresponding secretary, Mrs. L. M. Westlake, to Mrs. Henrietta Skelton, who was their efficient helper throughout.

Lady Henry Somerset will attend the National Convention the last day of the session and will speak in the evening. Miss Jessie Ackermann will be in attendance on the 19th and 20th. Madam Barakat, of Syria, Madam Sakurai, of Japan, Mrs. Hauser, of India, and three of our able workers from Wellington Seminary, South Africa, Miss Anna M. Cummings, Miss A. P. Ferguson and Miss E. J. Solomon expect to be with us. MARY A. WOODBRIDGE.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL.

The annual meeting of the Hospital Association was held in the Hospital Building on Monday, September 3, 1894. There was a large attendance. The reports were very interesting and encouraging (see annual report). The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Mrs. M. E. Kline; vice-president, Mrs. J. B. Hobbs; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Ralph Greenlee; recording secretary, Mrs. Watson Thatcher; auditor, Mrs. Fanny H. Rastall.

The matron's report was as follows:

The close of the hospital year brings us to rejoice in our progress and to look forward with new hope and energy to another year. There has been much practical good done, and if each donation has been given in His name, can we not hope that those temporal gifts may reflect spiritual blessings? Donations the past year have not been so generous as in former years, owing to the scarcity of money, fruits and produce

Several rooms have been furnished this year. The L. T. L's all over the country have furnished a beautiful room containing two beds, which has been a great comfort to several sick children. Irving Park, Ill., W. C. T. U., Emmington, Ill., W. C. T. U. and Grand Crossing, Ill., W. C. T. U., have each furnished rooms which are "very homelike," as the patients say, "not like a hospital," is the general exclamation.

THE British government licenses 10,417 opium dens in India.

ONE of the recent signers to the Great Petition of the World's W. C. T. U. is Rev. Father Cleary, president of the Catholic Temperance Association.

IT is the custom in the Leicester Free Library, England, to paste local advertisements over the betting news column of the daily papers that the reader's attention may not be distracted by reading harmful matter.

FROM Japanese sources the information comes that the Empress, who is head of the Red Cross Society for Japan, with her court ladies, is daily occupied in sanitary work for the care of the wounded, irrespective of nationality.

AN English professor facetiously suggests that it may become necessary to confer on lady doctors the degrees of "Spinsters of Medicine and Mistresses in Surgery" in place of the incongruous titles of Bachelors and Masters.

DURING her absence in America this summer, Lady Henry Somerset has placed her Swiss chalêt at the service of workers at the B. W. T. A. headquarters, who have been enjoying in turn the pleasures of a genuine vacation rest.

A CHICAGO daily is authority for the statement that a chemist has discovered a process for "solidifying whisky and other liquors into tablets like chocolate." If in the condensing process, the alcohol is entirely eliminated, even temperance workers might recommend such tablets!

SIR GEORGE WHITE, commander-in-chief of the British army in India, reports that only seventy-three members of the army Temperance society were involved in the 2,680 court martials held during 1893. The Good Templars Watchword rightly views this as another evidence of the fact that drink is at the bottom of nearly all the crime in the army.

FROM a membership of thirty-three in 1877, the Swiss Blue Cross Total Abstinence Association has nearly reached 12,000 in 1893, 4,000 of whom are reclaimed inebriates. In a majority of the Cantons, the governments have provided the schools with temperance text-books and wall diagrams illustrating the effects of alcohol. Ten per cent of the duties on spirits is applied to scientific temperance instruction. These facts are culled from their latest report.

GLASGOW churches and reform circles have been aroused by the verified statement of some members of the Salvation Army, who reported that on a Saturday evening they watched eight saloons and counted the number of visitors; 2,308 men and 365 women entered during a single hour. They also examined the criminal court records, and found that 67,000 women had been brought in on charges of drunkenness and disorderly conduct, of whom more than 13,000 were convicted.

THE splendid mission work of the London Congregational Union is recorded in a little book, entitled, "Ten Years' Work in Outcast London." Its Midland Hall has sheltered one hundred and sixty-two thousand nine hundred and thirty-five poor outcasts in the last decade. The "ministry of old clothes" and the "ministry of boots" supply thirty thousand garments and two thousand pairs of boots to needy ones annually. The union has more than twenty centers of Christian work, including a fresh air mission, training and placing girls in domestic service and aiding immigration.

NEW YORK CITY, according to The Outlook, has five hundred and twenty-two churches, valued at fifty-five million dollars, and with a total seating capacity of four hundred thousand. The gain in the past twenty-three years, while not in equal proportion with the increase of population, has been very great—sixty-three per cent. The Protestant Episcopal denomination heads the list with one hundred and three places of worship; the Roman Catholics have eighty-four; and the Presbyterians and Methodists have third and fourth places, with seventy and sixty-five respectively.

A GOOD SUGGESTION.

The Second Congregational church, Dorchester, Mass., of which our own beloved Rev. Arthur Little, D. D. (formerly of New England church, Chicago) is pastor, in its September calendar of services, announced:

WEDNESDAY.

The regular meeting of the Dorchester W. C. T. U. will be held in the chapel. The special subjects for the meeting will be "Work Among the Sailors and Railroad Work," in charge of superintendents Mrs. Snow and Mrs. Tapley. The devotional exercises will include Frances E. Willard's Bible Reading for August on the "Crusade Psalm."

The thoughtful friend who sends us this calendar makes the annotation, "Good idea—might suggest it to others."

White-ribboners in Great Britain will forward to Miss Gorham, Judde Place, Tonbridge, London. Ohio and Illinois state W. C. T. U. conventions met last week, the former at Cincinnati and the latter at Mt. Vernon. Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Willard were present at the Ohio meeting, going from there to Philadelphia for Pennsylvania's state gathering.

More than two hundred delegates were at Madison, Wis., at the annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The reports showed progress in nearly every field, six hundred and seventy new members having been added to Japanese churches.

MRS. ROUNDS was reëlected president of the Illinois W. C. T. U. last week. Great prosperity was reported at the state convention; in spite of the depressing times, seventy-nine new unions were organized during the year, and every phase of the work has been well sustained. Illinois is the second W. C. T. U. state in membership, the grand old Empire state of New York taking the first place.

THE Ohio W. C. T. U. convention, representing by its delegates five hundred and fifty local unions, in session at Cincinnati last week, has set a keynote which we hope every auxiliary, the wide world over, will repeat. Our Crusade leaders have declared that no woman should be eligible to office who does not read THE UNION SIGNAL, the W. C. T. U. state paper and the annual minutes of the society. This declaration was ordered to be kept standing at the head of the editorial column in the Ohio state paper. "As well might a carpenter expect to build a house without hammer and saw, as a white-ribbon woman to be efficient without reading the National and state organs of the union," said one of the women, in the course of a brilliant debate. Another bright "Ohio idea" was the birthday offerings. Lady Henry Somerset made a speech preceding this exercise, urging all to give, and then the envelopes were passed. Each delegate gave at least a penny for each year of her life.

"I COMMAND Athens, Athens rules the world, and my wife rules me, therefore she rules the world." These words, uttered by an ancient pagan ruler, are quoted in a recent sermon on the "Glory of Womanhood and the Duties of Christian Women," by Cardinal Gibbons, who adds: "So nowadays; while you men control the United States with your votes your wives control you, and so rule this country." Cardinal Gibbons needs dealing with! In contrast to this we would remind our readers of the liberal views of Archbishop Ireland, who has sat upon our platform, listened to a woman giving a Bible reading, and, at its close, pronounced the benediction. We are struck with the similarity between this utterance of a Roman Catholic prelate and the well-known utterances of a bishop of the Methodist church. The ideal of both is woman on a pedestal, rocking the cradle and ruling the world! We wonder how many American men are ready to indorse the statement that this nation is under "petticoat government"!

OUR editorial in last week's paper on "Woman Suffrage in Illinois" may have been a little indefinite as to the women candidates of the various political parties for trustees of the State University, hence we restate them here. The Prohibition party has two women candidates; these are Mrs. Amelia B. Sanford, state treasurer Illinois W. C. T. U., Bloomington, and Mrs. Rena Michaels Atchison, Chicago. The Republicans have named Mrs. Lucy B. Flower, of Chicago; the Democrats, Dr. Julia Holmes Smith, of Chicago, and the Populists, Mrs. Lavina Roberts, of Peoria. The other candidate on the Prohibition ticket is Charles H. Merritt, of Mason City, a prominent leader in his party, and husband of the local W. C. T. U. corresponding secretary. It is important to the welfare of the State University, as well as to the cause of equal suffrage, that the women of Illinois cast a large vote for these trustees, November 6. The act of special importance just now is to register, and this can be done on two days only—in Cook county on October 16 and 23; in all other counties of the state, October 16 and 30 are the dates for registration. If Illinois women eligible to a vote have not already registered when they read this, they should permit nothing to prevent their doing so on October 23 or 30. We are glad to note that the W. C. T. U. are taking a quiet, intelligent interest in this campaign, which augurs well for the home element at the ballot-box, also for the inculcation of temperance principles.

MISS JESSIE ACKERMANN, fresh from her sixth year of service as second round-the-world missionary, called at our office last Friday. She is apparently in the best of health, and began a series of two hundred lecture engagements in this country October 16. A copy of Mr. Stead's book, "If Christ Came to Chicago," fell into her hands while in South Africa; the unfairness of the book impressed her so strongly that she determined to answer it. Accordingly she has been collecting data in England and gathering from her storehouse of experience in Oriental lands, in order to show that there are even greater abuses in the world than the English author attempted to prove existed in Chicago. From the outline submitted by Miss Ackermann, we are confident that the book, which will be called, "Physician, Heal Thyself," will be one of unusual interest and power.

BECAUSE of Mrs. Woodbridge's absence from her office, there is no Corresponding Secretary's column this week, but there are several new and important announcements concerning the National Convention in the Convention Corner on page 13. Mrs. Harris' request about the song books should be especially noted and heeded. Miss Hay's official report of the railroad rates announces that the Central Traffic Association, which controls all the roads centering in Chicago, will give the round trip for one fare. Other roads will give one and one-third rates. These unusually low rates, and the fact that we are about to celebrate our majority as a temperance organization, will undoubtedly make our Convention in Cleveland, from November 16-21, the most largely attended and enthusiastic gathering we have ever held. Every white-ribboner who can possibly do so should attend. The visitors are, in one sense, just as important as the regular delegates, for they are invariably endued with the spirit of the proceedings, and so faithful in attendance that they are part and parcel of the great meeting. For one dollar a good seat can be procured for the entire Convention, which is only a little over five cents a session. As these seats are in great demand, no time should be lost in sending the order for them to Mrs. Grace P. Oviatt, 419 Sibley St., Cleveland, O.

THE Chicago Central W. C. T. U. is engaged in a laudable work, and that is the compilation of a directory of state reformatories for girls. The union has not been able to furnish homes for all the girls whom it has persuaded to reform, and consequently has hit upon the splendid plan of providing for such girls until a correspondence can be effected with the authorities of the reformatory in the state which they claim as their home, and returning them to that institution for protection and reformation. So far they have learned, by private means, of institutions of this character in only twenty-six states. There are doubtless many more similar institutions in the United States, and it is very important that before this directory is completed a full list be furnished. These are the states as yet unreported: Arizona, Arkansas, North Carolina, South Carolina, Connecticut, South Dakota, Florida, Idaho, Indian Territory, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Mississippi, Montana, New Hampshire, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, Texas, Utah, Vermont, West Virginia, Wisconsin, Wyoming. Will not the white-ribboners living in these states and territories take pains to learn the location, and report at once to Mrs. Isabel W. Lake, Room 1116, The Temple, Chicago, the address of any such home, either under state protection or of a private character? The Chicago union is about to inaugurate legislative action, whereby erring girls may be compelled to mend their ways, or at least may be returned to their homes if they persist in their immoral life, and thus relieve the congested centers of our great cities of the awful tide of vice which flows in from all directions, particularly from the country.

MY LOVE.

BY E. H. CHASE.

Coming up the crowded street
  Did you see a lady fair;
Clear brown eyes and glowing cheek
  'Neath softest waves of shining hair?
Did you note the faint rose blush
  As your friend she chanced to see;
Catch the love-light in her eye
  As she bowed to you and me?

Are you sure you saw my love?
  Fairest maiden in the land,
Tender as the little child
  She was leading by the hand!
Married? Fifty years ago!
  Must be old? What's that you say?
Mary never will be old,
  For she treads the King's highway.
Oh, there's many a maiden heart
  Throbbing under crown of gray;
And there's many a man like me
  Drawn by love to gates of day.

JOHN MORRIS' HEADSTONE.

BY NORA KINSLEY MARBLE.

It was a disagreeable duty but Nathaniel Craft felt he owed something of outward respect to a life-long friend, such as John Morris had been, so he donned his best black coat and went to the funeral.

If numbers and the undisguised grief of men and women stood for anything, then must John Morris have been beloved. As the first spadeful of earth rattled upon the coffin, and the solemn words, "dust to dust, ashes to ashes," were impressively spoken, every heart there thrilled, every eye overflowed—except one. In Nathaniel Craft's eyes no suspicion of moisture could be discerned; no one would have been more surprised than himself if there had been. I doubt if he could recall to mind the time when a throb of either tenderness or sorrow had brought a tear to his little bead-like eyes. Surely he had shed none when those same words were spoken above his wife's grave. Why should he? Had he not felt a sense of relief that her burial was the last expense to which she could put him? Her little patrimony had attracted him, not herself. He did love that nucleus upon which he had built a respectable fortune. Thoughts of stocks, bonds and investments only ever made his heart glow. To lose them would wrench it; that would be grief indeed. Possibly in that case tears of anger and disappointment might fill his eyes, but not one tear of sorrow at the loss of any human being, not one. His wife had been extravagant—poor soul—and her son and daughter, he was pleased to say, followed in her footsteps! People who knew Nathaniel Craft smiled inwardly when he made that assertion, inwardly of course, for was not Nathaniel Craft rich, and are not the indifferently well-born, as well as the indifferently well-to-do, always toadies?

"Craft by name, and mean by nature," that was what all men said of him, all men, as well as the two who were bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh. Only yesterday had he overheard his daughter May, in a tempest of grief at his refusal of a "trifle" she called it—as though money in any shape could be a trifle, much less the whole of a five dollar bill—had heard her call him an "old curmudgeon too mean to die," to which his precious son had answered, "that people who are not wanted here were generally not wanted in the world to come."

So they wanted him dead! He had no fatherly feelings to shock—as he thought—but somehow the red blood mounted to his shriveled old face, and he had gone about his business that day with a half-heartedness which surprised and vexed him. When alone in his office at dusk, his mood changed, however, and in the place of that soreness about the heart came a glow of anger which he intensified by mentally enumerating the considerable sums which those ungrateful children had cost him.

"I shall disappoint them," he muttered as he unlocked the ponderous safe in his office, "I shall disappoint them."

With bent brows and a bitter smile upon his lips, he broke the seal of a certain document and proceeded to read it.

"Not now," he said reflectively, as the gray twilight deepened into night, "but to-morrow; I'll alter it to-morrow," replacing the document and locking the safe as he spoke.

The next day, as we have seen, he stood beside the grave of his friend John Morris.

Something akin to a sneer curled his lip at the signs of grief about him. "Most of these people," he thought, "doubtless look for a bequest under the will. They weep out of respect for the dollars,"—he broke off here to calculate the probable worth of the dead man's estate. Not a large one certainly; how could it be? For had not John Morris more than once mildly told him that his greatest ambition had been to lay up treasures in heaven? That to him the accumulation of a million or more dollars meant the loss of competence or hope, nay, possibly, the lives of hundreds of human beings; that a bottle of champagne represented a tear wrung from as many wretched, starving creatures as it cost dollars; that from the canvas, made worth the ransom of a king by the painter's art, peeped forth wan-faced little ones, wolf-like, famished faces of men and women; that from rare, useless bits of the potter's skill, dripped drops of blood wrung from toil-worn hands; from the anguished brows of the widowed, the fatherless and orphaned?

"Widows and orphans, forsooth," thought Nathaniel Craft, as he recalled these, to him, Quixotic notions, "why should not women and children labor for their daily bread? I labor! It's more to their credit, I'm sure, than waiting for dead men's shoes. Um! Dead men's shoes."

His mind would revert to his own children and the words he had overheard,—"He's too mean to die!" and then he fell to wondering if the dead were conscious of the rattling of the clods upon their coffins; of the friendly tear, the sobs of grief, the sighs of farewell from their loved ones.

"I'll not attend another funeral," he resolved on his way to the office. "Die! Why I have no intention of dying, no symptoms of dying, nor have I time for such thoughts. They distract me, indeed, when my mind should be upon business. Let me see! Homebreak Central closed at 87¾. No doubt it has advanced while I have been wasting the morning. 'Twill more than likely break before night. Good time to sell—" and in this way Mr. Craft became himself again.

The next, and several succeeding days saw a flurry in the "market," and he forgot, in watching the "ticker," everything else but the rise and fall of stocks. That document in his safe, the unfilial speeches of his children, everything in the mad rush and whirl of Wall street.

The flurry was now over, Mr. Nathaniel Craft beamed—as near as a heartless man can beam—with undisguised satisfaction. Thousands upon thousands he had rolled up during the storm—the storm which had wrecked so many of his colleagues—and hence was he correspondingly happy.

"I can afford to indulge in a little extravagance to-day," he mused, "and—and at the same time show my appreciation of the mercies extended toward me." Nathaniel Craft sometimes felt that way when he had escaped the perils of the "street," safely landing as hostages many a valuable wreck. "I—let me see! I think I shall buy some simple flowers for John Morris' grave. I'll have my card attached, of course, so it will not be money thrown away. I was never one to hide my light under a bushel," he chuckled, "as John was in the habit of doing. They say he left most of his money to the poor, and none to relatives who did not need it. H'm, well, my money, I'm determined, shall serve to perpetuate the name of Nathaniel Craft, Esq. A church, or institution of some sort, far excelling any structure of the kind in this city. Why, bless me!" a frown obscuring the beaming smile upon his face, "I had forgotten that little matter," and the next moment he had opened the safe and withdrawn that document again. A chilling air from the interior greeted him as he did so. He shivered a little, and fancied he detected an earthly smell, such as a newly-made grave gives forth. In imagination he heard clods falling upon boards which resounded hollowly, saw his own face with an exultant smile, mockingly gazing upward upon the dry eyes of his own children, upon the indifferent faces of the merely curious. The thought was not a pleasant one for even such a man as Nathaniel Craft.

"He's too mean to die." The remembrance of those words drove any softened feelings from his heart, and a few moments later certain parts of that document lay in the waste basket torn into shreds. The remaining portion he restored to the safe, with a grim smile upon his lips, and the next morning he was on his way to the florist.

His face wore its usual cold expression, as awhile later, he entered the cemetery of Greenwood. The solemn tolling of the bell at the entrance disturbed him. "A piece of extravagance," he muttered, "for the living must pay the toller."

From toller to "ticker" went his thoughts, from ticker to stocks, from stocks to prospective millions, and then—but here was the newly-made grave of his friend, John Morris.

"Why, bless me!" he exclaimed, "a headstone already! Well, I must say I commend its simplicity. Suitable, indeed, for a man who left his all to the poor." (I'm afraid Nathaniel Craft sneered a little just here.) "H'm, let me see," reading easily the bold type of name and dates, "I must get out my glasses for what follows. A silly verse by some drivelling idiot, I presume—ah! 'To live in hearts we leave behind is not to die.'"

Twice, thrice he repeated the words, slowly, thoughtfully. The bell had ceased tolling, and presently he became aware of a voice near by solemnly repeating the words:

"I am the Resurrection and the Life, saith the Lord; he that believeth in me, though he die, yet shall he live."

A singular trembling of the limbs seized Nathaniel Craft, so that he was fain to seat himself. Heavy dews rested upon his brow. An unseen hand was toying with his heart-strings. "To live in hearts we leave behind is not to die—there!" And believing he knew, meant something more than faith. "He that soweth little shall reap little. . . . While we have time let us do good to all men! . . . Be not deceived; God is not mocked. Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he reap."

Sabbath after Sabbath had he listened to these words seated in his luxurious pew, but they had possessed no significance for him. Even there stocks and bonds occupied his thoughts most of the time. Mr. Gold, across the aisle, he felt, was instituting a corner in coffee for the coming week. Mr. Rash, who had lost heavily by the collapse of the Comptoer d' Escompte the last—such were his general thoughts. Dr. Divine's discourses were remarkable efforts, no doubt, but was he not merely earning his salary, and a pretty comfortable salary at that? And so Nathaniel Craft found it to his interest to appear regularly every Sunday in his pew—with certain exceptions. Collections for the poor and the missions, both home and foreign—how he hated them! And Christmas, too,—faugh! "To live in hearts we leave behind is not to die."

For him those sculptured words lived to-day. Like a revelation the barrenness of his life, past, present and future, arose before him.

"While we have time let us do good to all men."

There was yet time for him. A week ago he had sneered at the thought of human affection. Even these withered roses which strewed the grave he had deemed but vanity's offering. To-day, with a flush of shame, he stooped and removed the card from his own. Self was sinking from sight. It was now a tribute, indeed, to the dead, to the man who had lived worthily of that inscription—not to the living! John Morris could feel no pride in either case.

Before leaving that grave, Nathaniel Craft gathered a few of the withered leaves upon it. "The ashes of these, John," he said aloud, "shall make my heart to blossom anew. The fruits ye will know when next we meet; farewell!"

But the barriers of such a nature were not to be broken down at once. It was months, indeed, ere he lived with any higher object than by freely giving of his hoarded treasure to deserve that inscription upon his friend's tombstone. The overflow came however, in time, and one day Mr. Craft called his children—who had long marveled and rejoiced at the change in their father—into the room which had once been their mother's own. To each he handed a slip of paper.

"That you may not wish me dead," he said huskily, "I shall hereafter strive to make you happy. In return I ask only for your love and respect." And then he told them of those words regarding him which he had overheard, words which he confessed had stung and angered him; of the codicil to his will he had in consequence destroyed; a codicil, which in a moment of tenderness one day he had been induced to make in their favor, revoking in a measure the original instrument.

"I thought I should exult in my grave over your disappointment," said he, and then followed the history of that memorable day in Greenwood.

"To live in hearts we leave behind is not to die," he repeated, "and my desire henceforth is not only to live in the hearts of my children, but in the hearts of the suffering and unfortunate of mankind."

SEX IN THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

BY A SISTER.

The criticism in THE UNION SIGNAL, July 26, on the action of the National Teachers' Association in electing all male officers, although between eighty and ninety per cent of our teachers are women, brings to memory a Sunday-school convention that impressed me in a similar manner.

This Sunday-school organization was officered entirely by men, and all persons invited to address the convention at this time were men—all ministers except one. In the afternoon of the first day a young German minister made a fine address on the work of the primary teacher. As the primary or infant class teachers are almost invariably women, he of course gave us what we needed, some experimental knowledge on the subject. The same young minister had been quite successful in organizing township Sunday-school associations. He was requested to speak on that subject also. In the course of his remarks he said: "The principal difficulty was to get men to do the work." In the evening among other speakers we had a most excellent address by a noted national Sunday-school worker. He used this significant Scripture as a basis for his remarks: "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man," (Isaiah 4 : 1) to represent the inequality of the superintendent and teachers of our Sunday-schools.

The next day the president took occasion to score the women for lack of interest in Sunday-school work. He told how they wasted their precious time gossiping, of their interest in pug dogs, etc., and even went so far as to tell a story to illustrate his point. Of course there were plenty of that kind of women in the audience—they all attend Sunday-school conventions, and would make such good teachers if they could only be induced to attend!

After the reverend chairman's last remarks some time was devoted to discussions and remarks. I could sit still no longer. I arose, and said in answer to the doctor's comments, that I had been a Sunday-school worker for over twenty years, and I had observed that the women and girls made a better showing in the Sunday-school than the men and boys, as they did in all the departments of the churches to-day; that the burden of the Sunday-school work rested on them, for at least four-fifths of the teachers are women. And in reference to the use of the Scripture, "Seven women shall take hold of one man," I asked: "Why a man for superintendent? One of the best superintendents I ever served under was a woman."

In reference to the difficulty of the young minister in getting organizers, I asked: "Must these organizers necessarily be men? Women make excellent organizers in the W. C. T. U. and women's missionary societies, why not in Sunday-school work? Surely if the burden of the work of the Sunday-school work rests upon the women they have the work at heart, as the men do not."

I was congratulated by a large number, both men and women, a number of ministers among them, on my "timely remarks," "just what ought to have been said," "just what they wanted some one to say." I asked some of the women, "Why, then, did not any of you speak out on the subject?" One woman said: "Oh! I would not have spoken for anything with that D. D. in the chair." That sums it up so far as many women are concerned. They are too timid.

I had most excellent backing in my position by a minister from a large church in one of our Ohio cities. He had heard the chairman's remarks, also mine. He did not refer to either directly, but in the course of his speech paid such a tribute to woman's ability and work as is seldom heard. He not only crowned her with work, but with the respect and equality justice demands. He won all hearts, for although men may applaud the talk of men like the first speaker on the failings of women, yet in reality they have more respect for one who is just to them. This sample convention, with others, has impressed me as follows:

AS TO MEN.

1. Men's arrogation and control of office, and in consequence the habit of electing each other to office, has crystallized into custom. The question of the justice of sharing the offices with the women has not so much as entered many of their minds.

2. I believe many of these men would be willing to share the offices with us if they had "an arrest of thought" as Miss Willard calls it. And these same men are so accustomed to doing the talking, that they not only put each other on the program, but take up the time for discussion with such complacency that we are led to conclude that they believe the right of monopoly is theirs.

3. Man's superior physical presence intimidates many women.

4. Men generally have more command of their time than women, that is, the class of men who take offices of an honorary character. They do not have the care of a house and family and social duties.

AS TO WOMEN.

What is true of them generally is true of them as teachers, whether in the day or Sunday-school.

1. They fail to assert themselves. A prominent instructor in our county teachers' institute expressed the same opinion to me recently. Women have not considered the injustice of the men holding all the offices; many are indifferent; some may be modestly waiting for the recognition of their abilities; still another class would not be thought of as "strong-minded," as they put it. Some even who would like to be recognized would not do anything toward their emancipation for fear of losing caste with some of their male friends; and many are satisfied with things as they are.

2. Women generally are not ambitious for office, their aspirations have not been educated in that line.

3. Many are unwilling to be hampered by office. There are those who want the whole command of their time, some from necessity, others for selfish ends. To many who work continuously year after year, until the nervous system is shattered, everything is a burden, and an office is out of the question, especially when the support of the family, wholly or in part, makes life doubly hard.

4. Public school teachers as a class are not our most progressive thinkers and leaders of reform as some might suppose. This applies equally to both sexes. To teach the same thing over and over again continuously does not broaden the mind or widen the scope of vision.

5. To the tyrant custom women bow much more submissively than men; hence they are less progressive and prove the greatest barrier to their own advancement. As an illustration, I asked a woman not long since to lead the week-night prayer-meeting. My husband, the pastor of the church, was away and had left the meeting in my hands. She answered with such an indescribable look and tone, "No, not so long as there is a man to do it." Women help to vote into office men of inferior ability and attainments and of questionable habits sometimes, because they are used to seeing men hold the offices, although there may be a number of women in their midst of more ability, attainments and piety.

6. There are women who look up to men with a sort of worshipful spirit, and when married soon lose their individuality in their husbands. This class concedes all honors to men. Most men by their attitude toward women show that this is not only well pleasing in their sight, but accept it as their due.

7. Many women take man's interpretations of the Scriptures for God's command. In conversation with a minister on the question of woman suffrage, he remarked, "If my wife should exercise the franchise she would do it under my dictation." I answered, "Perhaps not; she has the same right to exercise her judgment about it that you have." He answered, "No, she must do as I say," and used Scripture as his authority.

W. C. T. U. women should make a business of "throwing light" on these points into our husbands, brothers and sisters, sons and daughters, in the home, and in society seek to make it a prominent theme for conversation. Then we may have hope that a nominating committee, although composed entirely of men, will not in a convention composed four-fifths of women, bring in a list of officers composed entirely of men, as was the case at the convention referred to; and at the National Teachers' Association, the result being the same, we presume the men did the nominating as usual. "The arrest of thought," is needful also to bring about the conditions in our public schools that shall make such inequalities forever hereafter impossible.

SOME OF OUR WOMEN.

"Our Special Artist"—Mary A. Lathbury.

VI.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

When she was still young, Mary A. Lathbury—the child of devoted Christian parents, who never in her life had known the temptations of the great world, felt a special call in her heart to dedicate herself to God, and she has told me that as she knelt in the performance of this holy vow, something seemed to say to her, "Remember, my child, that you have a gift of weaving fancies into verse, and a gift with the pencil of reproducing visions that come to your heart; consecrate these to me as thoroughly and as definitely as you do your inmost spirit."

This she did then and there, and the direct outcome of it was one of her earliest books—an attempt to set forth the life of the soul without commentary save that of a passage from the Word written under each picture. She traced in this way the life of a young man from boyhood through the temptations that come to so many and the triumph that at last enabled him to say, "The entrance of Thy Word giveth light." There is not a line she has penned or drawn which does not help to lead the human heart to a clearer appreciation of that sweet saying which must have been the motto of her long and high endeavor; "To be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace."

A few months ago a group of missionaries was standing at sunset on a beautiful mountain in Japan looking down upon the city of Kyoto; and as their hearts rejoiced in the delightful landscape and soft evening air they broke forth into singing that matchless evening hymn which our brother and friend, Edward Everett Hale, recently told a Chautauqua audience would be loved and sung "as long as Chautauqua shall endure,"—"Day is dying in the West." Of its author he added: "She has marvelous lyric force which not five people in a century show, and her chance of having a name two hundred years hence is better than that of any writer in America to-day."

Thus have the "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs" of Mary A. Lathbury gone to the ends of the earth; but to hear them at their best one must join the grand anthem in the amphitheatre of beautiful Chautauqua where almost all of them have first been sung for twenty years. Her name has been as closely linked with that great summer camp as are those of Lewis Miller, Bishop Vincent and Secretary Kate F. Kimball; indeed, she is the poet laureate of Chautauqua. In the early days when we who went there lived as I have often playfully said "in tents and purposes," she was my earliest friend and comrade, and it was then and there that I ventured to ask for the first home protection song of the White-Ribbon army, "O trust ye in the Lord forever."

In the centennial year of the Republic, 1876, the hymn furnished by her for the Fourth of July,

"Lift up, lift up thy voice with singing,
Dear land, with strength lift up thy voice," has always seemed to me to be the most complete and pathetic utterance of that sublime period; her autumn hymn on page 66 of Anna Gordon's White-Ribbon Hymnal entitled, "The sunset of the year," we are singing at family prayers in the Catskills with tender thought.

From the first she has been most generous and considerate in giving of her best to the white-ribbon army. Not only the first hymn written, but the first sketch penciled for us were free gifts from her. A charming figure of a boy carrying a flag and leaning on a cross was designed at my request for our early children's pledges; our National seal was drawn by her, and she has for twenty years made choice contributions to our literature in prose and verse, while some of our best social purity leaflets are from her versatile and tireless hand; and yet, with the exception of payment for five pictures she has received nothing from us. Of this I really feel ashamed, in view of the fact that she has always been her own bread-winner and that of others.

My first knowledge of Miss Lathbury was in 1874 when on a visit to our Methodist headquarters in New York city in search of Bishop Vincent, whom I did not find. But I did find a tender, gracious woman of remarkable refinement in the editorial office of the Sunday-School Advocate (with which she had lately become connected as assistant editor) who asked me as a teacher of the young if I would be kind enough to talk with her about the best method of interesting the little people. From that day to this we have been like sisters and I can never tell the good she has done me in all things that pertain to Christian character and work.

We have planned summer trips together several times only to have the hope deferred by reason of the constant calls that came to me for work, but evidently Miss Lathbury had thoughts of mercy towards me and was determined that I should summer where I had a summer home. And so it came about that Mr. Charles Wingate (who originated the Twilight Club in New York city and later the Twilight Park among the Catskill Mountains) agreed to give a lot if I would build a summer cottage. Miss Lathbury came to our National Convention in Boston in 1891, bringing the gift of the lot, and later I invested a gift from my dear uncle, Zophar Willard, in building a summer cottage, the erection of which Miss Lathbury superintended and which she has beautified with some of the rarest visions that wait upon her consecrated brush.

Miss Lathbury and her life-long friend, Miss Van Marter, (who takes her place as an editor and who is a worker in our Methodist Woman's Home Missionary Society) have their home together, and a lovely one it is at Twilight Park. Here, too, in the same household are Miss Lathbury's sister and niece, Mrs. Brigham and her daughter Lilian, both artists of fine attainments, and Master Vincent Beebe, the beloved nephew of Miss Lathbury, whom she has reared from early childhood and who promises to realize in character and literary work all the hopes that she has cherished for him.

At my request, a friend who has now long been cognizant of Miss Lathbury's life and work has made the following memorandum: Mary A. Lathbury was born in Manchester, N. Y., in 1841; as a child she was fond of reading, writing, picture-making and illustrating her own poems. When eighteen years of age she went to an art school in Worcester, Mass., where she enjoyed exceptional advantages. A year later she went to Newbury, Vt., where in the Conference Seminary she taught drawing, painting and French. Some time after she went to Ft. Edward Institute where she taught nearly five years, and still later to Drew Ladies Seminary, Carmel, N. Y., where she spent six years doing faithful work and growing in literary and artistic knowledge.

In 1874 she left this delightful home school at the urgent request of Bishop J. H. Vincent, then editor of the Methodist Sunday-school publications, to do editorial work in New York. While there she endeared herself to multitudes of children as the dear "Aunt Mary," who with her gifts of pen and pencil made the Sunday-School Advocate a constant delight.

She was now and had been for some time a contributor to St. Nicholas and Wide Awake. "Fleda and the Voice," a book of exquisite fairy tales, illustrated by herself, was published about this time. Other books followed, both in color and in black and white,—"Out of Darkness into Light," "From Meadowsweet to Mistletoe," "Seven Little Maids," "Ring-round-a-rosy," and others. She has written a number of hymns of which "Day is dying in the West" and "Break thou the bread of Life" are perhaps the best known.

Miss Lathbury has not only the poet's pen and the artist's pencil, but the eye of the seer and an ability to put her wise thought into clear and convincing English. A high, courageous faith, a loyalty to the best ideals, a self-forgetfulness that is sublime, and a devotion to the truth that gives inspiration to all with whom she comes in contact, have characterized "our Mary" from the beginning and will do so in ever increasing measure even unto the end.

ONCE MORE THE GOTHENBURG SYSTEM.

I.

BY KATE LUNDEN.

To study the Siberian exile system at the palace of Peterhof or the needs of a workingman from the parlor windows of a millionaire's home, may be one mode of obtaining information on the subjects, but would it cover the whole ground? The least thought would tell us that it could be but one-sided. To study the Gothenburg system through the spectacles provided by those personally interested in its continuance amounts to the same; it shows one side, but what of the other?

Figures speak, it is true, and yet statistics are only a summary of effects; of the causes that have been at work they tell us nothing.

DECREASE IN THE CONSUMPTION OF LIQUORS IN SWEDEN.

In 1865, when the Gothenburg system was first adopted in Sweden, the annual consumption of spirituous liquors in that country was 11.31 quarts per capita. In 1890 the consumption was only 7.42 quarts. What was the cause of the diminution? "The Gothenburg system" is the answer given by its adherents, and to the average public, unacquainted with customs and conditions of the country, the answer seems plausible. Born and bred in Sweden, and consequently conversant with many facts of which the foreigner has no knowledge and which his informant may not care to mention I beg, to enter my protest against the reply. In its stead I offer the following:

The diminution in the consumption of liquors in Sweden during late years is due, (1) To the religious and temperance movements which, during the last two decades, have swept like tidal waves over the country; (2) To the decrease of prosperity; (3) To local option or direct veto laws, which in the rural districts amount almost to total prohibition.

THE GOTHENBURG SYSTEM NOT THE CAUSE OF DECREASE.

That the Gothenburg system cannot be given the credit of diminishing the consumption of liquor is shown indisputably by the fact that in the prosperous years of 1871 to 1875 the consumption increased to 12.47 quarts per capita. If the system was responsible for the decrease how could its effects be so noticeably changed and the consumption raised to high water-mark under its operation? In order to defend the position taken I ask permission to dispense with statistical tables, and instead glance in retrospect at a period dating from early childhood to the time I left my native land.

THE INTRODUCTION OF THE MODERN SALOON.

The home stills were abolished in 1855 and did not come under my observation. My mother and grandmother used to tell about the time when whisky was manufactured in every home, but I never could find out for what purpose the teetotalers made it, unless it was for the part it played in the well-known Norse hospitality. There were total abstainers even in those days, and I recall many a family, whose members claimed as a birthright the dislike for intoxicating liquors as well as for the obnoxious weed, whose sickening fumes confront us everywhere. Grand men they were, those hereditary abstainers, but of course they were few, only exceptions to the general rule, and while it was considered "manly" to imbibe freely they were held up to ridicule and scorn because they had the moral courage to refuse to degrade themselves. Still the modern saloon had not made its appearance; the people drank at home.

My earliest recollections go back to the time when the railroad was built between Stockholm and Christiania. Hordes of rough, wild-looking workmen swooped down upon the peaceful valleys among the Vermland mountains and in their wake followed the saloon with all its infernal paraphernalia. Fights and gambling were the order of the day and when the road was completed and the intruders departed they left as mementoes the bar, the gambling table and the knowledge of evil they had imparted to the youth of the communities through which they had passed. The home stills were bad; the saloon was worse.

The railroad opened up the natural resources of the mountainous region on the Norwegian border, and after the knights of the pick and shovel came the lumber dealer and the saw-mill owner. "Civilization" followed the panting iron-horse. The elks and bears and wolves that were wont to sojourn in the forests had been frightened away by the blasting of rocks and the locomotive's whistle, and the simple habits of the people were driven out by approaching prosperity. The forests primeval fell for the desecrating ax, saw-mills sprang up everywhere and the giants of the mountains were soon on their way to the sea for export to other lands. The hard working farmer, who had barely eked out an existence from a step-motherly soil, now raked in the gold for his timber and spent it in profligacy. The modest homespun gave place to broadcloth and cashmere, and the frugal fare of the tiller of the soil to the sumptuous table of the timber baron.

This brings us to the time when the increase in the consumption of spirituous liquors is noticeable. At parties wine and punch literally flowed, to say nothing of whisky, and no exception was made if children were invited. I well remember coming home from a party once with my white dress all bespattered with wine stains from overflowing trays and tables. With wholesome fear for the reception I knew awaited me at the hands of my mother, I appealed for protection to our next door neighbor, whose daughter was in the same condition. But at last I had to appear, and though trembling with fear I managed to tell mother that it was "better to have it outside than inside," an opinion in which she evidently concurred; at least I have no recollection of the dreaded punishment being inflicted. I only mention this to show the condition of society at that time, and what better could be expected when the ministers of the gospel in many instances set the example of intemperance? The first minister of whom I have any recollection was a red-nosed, bloated drunkard, who used to quarrel and fight with his parishioners at weddings and funerals. But in justice to Swedish womanhood, be it said, that it has always been considered a disgrace in Sweden for a woman to use intoxicating liquors.

SOME OLD TABLE-TALKERS.

I.

BY MARTHA YOUNG.

Temperance principles have permeated through every branch of literature, through all society. Even in the popular novels of the day one finds bits like this from Madame Sarah Grand's "Heavenly Twins": "Evadne used her glass only to put her gloves in it."

Many, I had almost said most, women who are leaders of society in their own cities, do not know the taste of wine, though perhaps allowing it to be served at their own tables, and though the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union be an unknown quantity to them.

One of our greatest generals and noblest of the world's heroes, General Robert E. Lee, passed through four years of unparalleled hardship in march, camp and battle without ever tasting alcohol in any form. His conquering opponent, General Grant, left his glass unturned at every table where the richest of wines flowed freely.

Since prohibition is now no unusual thing let us look back into those old days when it was a thing almost unique, yet not without its advocates. Let us glance into those old days when there was leisure instead of hurry, letters instead of journalism, epigrams in Latin and Greek instead of imitations of Provencal verse, lumbering stage coaches instead of lightning-speeding Pullmans, and above all, by way of difference, brilliant "table-talks" in place of platform oratory. And, strangely at variance with the wine-lover's claim that the social glass is necessary to create and inspire glowing conversation and flashing sally of wit, we find several of our prohibitionists among these same now world-known table-talkers.

The world that called itself "all the world" then had a short diameter, and one man's voice could reach from center to circumference of that world of art, letters, science, —and that one man was Dr. Samuel Johnson. His world was one worth speaking in. Then, Sir Joshua Reynolds painted and Garrick played and Sam Foote joked and Mrs. Piozzi poured tea; Pope penned his flowing measures, Pitt and Burke roused their hearers with matchless eloquence, and Goldsmith, little as Boswell fancied him or his genius, wrote the greatest of English novels, "The Vicar of Wakefield." Then wine flowed like water, and Dr. Johnson's "Rasselas" has hardly brought him more fame than has his tea-drinking propensity.

The first note of his abstinence from wine is in his early struggles in London when he had come up from Lichfield with Garrick to try his fortunes with the rest of the geniuses of his time. "I dined," he tells his own story, "very well for eight pence with very good company at the Pine Apple in New Street, just by. They expected to meet every day, but did not know one another's names. It used to cost the rest a shilling for they drank wine; but I had a cut of meat for six pence and bread for a penny, and gave the waiter a penny, so that I was quite well served, nay, better than the rest, for they gave the waiter nothing."

Though we find no absolute pledge against drink we find throughout his "Prayers and Meditations" evidence that his abstinence was the outcome of serious thought and intention, and as well for the health of his soul and mind as body. "By abstinence," he writes, "from wine and suppers, I obtained sudden and great relief, and had freedom of mind restored to me, which I have wanted for all this year."

When Collins, the poet, was a victim to utmost dejection, despair and bodily suffering,—"poor dear Collins," as Johnson would have him,—our worthy doctor wrote to his friend Warton, of Oxford: "I had lately the favor of a letter from your brother, with some account of poor Collins, for whom I am much concerned. I have a notion, that by very great temperance or more properly abstinence, he may yet recover."

A very merry account it is of the all night celebration of the success of the novel of an American young woman, Mrs. Lennox. "Harriet Stuart" was just ready for publication, and we may fancy a literary clique to be already familiar with the story, for authors read each other's manuscripts in those leisurely old days. It was Johnson who proposed at the Ivy-lane Club to make a merry night over the advent of the new novel. Crusty Sir John Hawkins objected; he had never spent a whole night out of bed in his life. Johnson insisted. The supper was laid for all the club, crusty Sir J. included, Mrs. Lennox, her husband, a lady friend and twenty guests more. We have Boswell's good word for it that the supper was elegant, and he gives one diverting glimpse of the menu: "A magnificent hot apple pie should make a part of it, and this he (Johnson) would have stuck with bay leaves, because, forsooth, Mrs. Lennox was an authoress, and had written verses."

The night passed in harmless gaiety, and Boswell let us get a glimpse of his jovial company at "about five." "Johnson's face," he tells us, "shone with meridian splendor, though his drink had been only lemonade." So with the good maxims of his Idler: "To temperance every day is bright, and every hour is propitious to diligence."

A PLEA FOR INDIA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—About the time our W. C. T. U. president, Mrs. Hauser, left India I accompanied my husband on one of his Sunday-school tours. Would that I could, my dear American sisters, give to you the wings of the morning and let you fly from Cape Comorin to Mount Everest; from sea to sea, until sunny India had thrilled you with its natural beauty and its human needs. Stop for a moment in the Paunjab, land of five rivers, including as its western boundary the famous Indus, its eastern, the grand old Himalayas; on the north lies Jummoo, the capital of Southern Cashmere, one of nature's loveliest gems, in a setting of eternal snows, soft meadows and flowing streams, but one of the strongest holds of idolatry. In the beautiful valley eighteen Hindoo temples, with their graceful spires pointing upward, mock the very God of heaven with their false gods which crowd every corner.

As we rode on an elephant through the Rajah's grounds our guide said: "No woman ever recrosses the Rajah's threshold; zenana women are in for life." Beautiful Jummoo is only a type of many other cities and villages in this broad Paunjab, fragrant with roses and orange blossoms, Ottar of roses and rose-water form one of the great industries. Rose hedges and rose fields made the view enchanting to foreign eyes. Here the famous Cashmere shawls are made, also shawls whose texture is so delicate that it can be drawn through a lady's finger ring. Think of your dainty handkerchiefs perfumed with ottar of roses at fifty cents a drop, while from your graceful shoulders falls a shawl worth a thousand dollars, and of walking over a rug whose colors are so blended that you cannot distinguish one from another, and the pile so elastic it springs under your footfall; one of them is now in the loom, and has been sold for twenty-five dollars a square inch to a man in New York.

Not only does this broad India claim some of the finest artisans in the world and send its products away for almost their weight in gold, but "these plains shook to the tramp of Alexander's legions," when his victory over Porus laid the Paunjab at his feet. In 1849 they resounded with the roar of the British and Sheik guns, when the Paunjab lay at the feet of the British warriors.

The chief act in the terrible tragedy of 1857 was played here. The Christian church very early began its work in the Paunjab; to-day one single mission has three thousand converts; another which counts its converts at fifty per day throughout India, has many here. The missionaries are indefatigable, in season and out of season. The Sabbath-school work they are beginning for the children is one of the most hopeful signs of the times.

Young teachers from England, Scotland and America are throwing their lives into the work for children, with an enthusiasm that thrills one. You will be glad to know that Bands of Hope are being formed in many places. Teachers in India are eagerly asking for translation of temperance and social purity lessons for their native pupils.

The W. C. T. U. is springing into brighter life. The seed sown by Mrs. Hauser is bearing fruit, even now, not only in the Paunjab, but from the mountains to the cape. Our India women send kindest greetings to their American sisters and especially call their attention to our paper, the White Ribbon; until July it was little more than a leaflet, but we are very thankful that a way has been opened for us to enlarge it, and we ask you to give it a place in your homes, your hearts and your prayers. In no land are there so many women who have set themselves apart for holiest things as in India; how nobly they are giving themselves to poor humanity. The one thing needed now is union, and our little paper is drawing us together as nothing else has. We wish it was four times as large and issued weekly instead of monthly. Could you make it a part of your mission work for India to support our new paper, and obtain for it subscribers and shareholders, and a hearty welcome into your lovely homes? It will give you a glimpse of life which will some day be historical, and of a kingdom to which you have sent so many devoted missionaries. Price, single subscribers, fifty cents a year; unions of twelve, a dollar and fifty cents a year. Many ladies and gentlemen in India are becoming shareholders, will our American friends become so too? By paying a dollar, or as much more as they like in the year, they may become shareholders. Larger sums will be gratefully received to enable us to have a constant fund for the paper and translating work.

OUR NATIONAL ORGAN IN NURSES' TRAINING SCHOOLS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—For a long time I have been trying to think of some way to get THE UNION SIGNAL into the training schools for nurses throughout the country. At last I have it. Let the unions of each town provide for its own hospitals and training schools. In that way it can be done without the expense being felt, and if it is known that they are sent by townspeople they will be read more eagerly than if coming from an unknown source.

Now for the reason. Next to the physician the professional nurse is the trusted counsellor on questions of health, diet and medicine. The good effected would be simply incalculable if the bright women who graduate yearly from these schools were scientifically instructed about the dangers of alcohol and other drugs, as are the members of the W. C. T. U. Many of them are strong temperance women. In some schools they are required to be total abstainers, at least when on duty, but their whole training goes to the developing of faith in these drugs as common remedies. They have no chance to learn the other side of the question. Seeing the evils of intemperance they often reject alcohol as a beverage, but thoroughly believe in it as a drug.

I do not believe that except in very rare cases, as in treating a reformed inebriate, a nurse should refuse to give stimulants at a physician's order. She is the subordinate and must obey, just as a soldier obeys his captain, but she need never give a drop more than the order requires, nor give it on her own responsibility, as is too often done. It is so easy to fly for the brandy bottle in case of emergency, so easy to misunderstand and enlarge orders.

For instance. Last fall I was called to help in a case of malignant diphtheria. I remonstrated at the quantities of brandy the nurse was giving, but she insisted it was needed to keep up the child's strength and that the doctor said she should give as much as possible. I knew she was wrong, having nursed an exactly similar case for him previously, when he was extremely cautious in giving liquor. In point of fact he came in shortly, handed me a bottle of carbonate of ammonia, saying: "Here is your favorite," and stopped the alcohol entirely.

The nurse was conscientious and true to her training, but she did not know that the quantity of alcohol she was giving would lower the heart's action.

The intelligent temperance nurse, too, has many opportunities of influencing the family, especially the young people. Let us place THE UNION SIGNAL in the schools. It will certainly find many readers who will welcome it gladly. We make great efforts to reach the physicians; let us make this little effort to reach the nurses who stand only second to them in medical influence and will be much more easily interested in the cause.

Will not state and county presidents take up this idea and press it with their constituencies? I will answer for one county hospital that it shall be supplied and that right speedily.

FAREWELL SERVICE FOR MRS. BARNEY.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Trinity M. E. Church, Providence, R. I., of which Mrs. J. K. Barney is a member, held a farewell service on the eve of her departure for England where she is to engage in temperance evangelistic work.

It was an ideal one, where all classes gathered—members of different churches—the rich and the poor to pray God's blessing on their "field missionary" (as her church love to call Mrs. Barney) and the work before her; and so blessedly was the Holy Spirit manifested, that one's thoughts naturally went back to the primitive church, where the disciples gathered together and the Holy Spirit said: "Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them; and when they had fasted and prayed and laid their hands on them they sent them away."

The pastor, Rev. J. M. Taber, presided, and after the Scripture lesson and prayer, spoke of Christ's mission to the earth to save the lost, emphasizing the fact that that was the work of the disciple to-day, and that this call of our sister to a broader field was from God, for God, and he believed would be prosecuted in God's strength and according to His plans.

He was followed by the superintendent of the Sunday-school who most appreciatively referred to her as their "honored and honorary member," her faithful labors with them for many years before her public work claimed so much of her time, the large class of young women she gathered about her and who were blessed through her ministrations, and the many young men who were pledged to total abstinence and won to Christ by her words.

The president of the Epworth League, with others, gave ringing testimonies of their interest in Mrs. Barney and the blessing she had been to them.

Mrs. M. A. Babcock, president Rhode Island W. C. T. U., very eloquently and tenderly spoke of what Mrs. Barney was to the Rhode Island women—a safe counselor, a sure friend, a loyal white-ribboner, and while it is very hard to give her up even for a little while, yet as this is a common cause, selfishness ill becomes us, and we send our sister forth with prayers and faith, knowing her fidelity to all trusts reposed in her. Letters were read from Miss Frances E. Willard, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, Katharine Lente Stevenson, Rev. John Collins, secretary of International Christian Workers' Association, and Rev. D. P. Leavitt, a former pastor of the church, during whose ministry Mrs. Barney commenced her public work.

Mrs. Barney in responding, among other things, said that she "had especially craved a fresh baptism of divine power for the coming service," and added: "While I have a natural desire to meet the expectations of those who invited me, yet more and above all, I desire not to disappoint Him, 'whose I am and whom I serve.'"

Her words led to the prayer service, and surely from the opening prayer of the pastor to the close of the service one felt the presence of the Divine Spirit in great power, bringing the Lord's children into a fuller consecration and closer union with Christ and anointing our sister for her special mission across the sea. As "God be with you till we meet again" was sung a telegram was received from Lady Henry Somerset, saying: "I join with you in your farewell service, and feel certain that our sister will be blest and made a blessing. England anxiously anticipates her visit," thrilling the audience and making a fitting close to this tender and blessed farewell service.

Mrs. Barney leaves us October 9, and sails on the steamer City of New York, October 10.

BEER IN DENMARK.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It is nearly impossible for you English-speaking women to understand how small the influence of women is here, but the enormous difficulty is, that the Danish women in general do not wish any direct influence; they are satisfied with the indirect influence of the French Empire. We have even a dozen or two of women physicians. But unfortunately most of these women adopt the customs of men. In some near future we may hope to see the Danish women changed, as we are always moving much more slowly here than in England.

I do not tell you all this to explain that I am giving up the fight; on the contrary, God willing, I shall take it up fully and give all my time to it, but certainly it is my conviction, that I shall have to do a rough pioneer work with very small visible result, hoping always that a new generation shall in God's good providence take in the harvest we are sowing. For almost a year I have been prevented (by illness) from working for the W. C. T. U., but this winter my skillful vice-president has worked up a petition to the Danish king and government asking for improvements of the laws regarding the drink traffic. We ask prohibition for the sale of intoxicants from Saturday afternoon till Monday morning, and to gain the control of this we ask that the sale of intoxicants shall be entirely separate from other things; and last but not least we ask for local option. This petition has been widely circulated, entirely through the efforts of the W. C. T. U., but helped by the money of the Danish union for the right use of Sunday; we have got more than ninety-two thousand women's names and hope to reach one hundred thousand before bringing it to the Minister this autumn. We have had some encouragement in sayings of some of the members of our parliament, and in the fact that this petition has awakened the other temperance societies to take steps in the same direction, which they always have thought useless. We dare not hope for an immediate success, but if you wish to succeed you must begin the fight.

Our beloved leaders have named me organizer and lecturer of Denmark, Holland, Norway, Sweden and Finland, and as soon as the named countries are wishing my help I shall be willing and glad to go there, if God will give me strength and sufficient health. The total abstinence work in Holland is extremely interesting, and the white-ribboners there are unusually capable, being thoroughly trained in Christian work. They have started a beautiful paper for children, named Hoop der Toekomist (the hope of the future), and in The Hague they have formed a branch, which is holding meetings in a very disreputable corner of the beautiful town, inviting the poorest and lowest fallen to listen to a good word about Jesus, singing hymns, and sometimes taking tea. From my personal acquaintance with the dear Dutch workers I venture to prophesy for the Dutch W. C. T. U. a great future influence in the warfare against alcoholic liquors in the Netherlands. The president of the W. C. T. U. in The Hague is going about in the country with a magic lantern, and the secretary of the union is very able to write small stories and tracts, a much needed aid in our European W. C. T. U.

It is very important that we are all members of the same International or World's union; it gives strength to our modest number of poor, struggling women to know that "we all belong, we all belong."

Wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead.—James 2:20.

The evil reports constantly circulated about the Temple show conclusively that Satan is at work striving to destroy that which he knows will be a mighty menace to the progress of his kingdom. The latest canard on this subject comes from Penn Yan, N. Y. A white-ribboner in that town writes to a friend in Chicago, who is also a white-ribboner, and requests a speedy reply to the following: "In talking with a friend the other day she said she learned from good authority that the basement rooms of the Temple were rented for use as 'sweat rooms.' It does not seem to me possible that such could be the case, but I promised myself that I would make an effort to find out the truth in the matter. May I ask that at your earliest convenience you will let me know just how this is?" The lady who received the letter requests that I should answer this outrageous charge through the Temple column. I would say in reply that it is an entire fabrication. There are no rooms in the basement of the Temple rented; they are used for coal, engine rooms, boiler rooms for heating the building and running the elevators, and electrical rooms for lighting the building; also storage rooms.

Mrs. J. J. Davis, Freeport, Pa., writes: "Please describe through the Temple column in THE UNION SIGNAL, the Columbian souvenir." It is a medal, two inches in diameter, made of that new and wonderfully beautiful metal, aluminum. It looks like silver, but has a more beautiful finish—a sort of satin gloss—besides, it does not tarnish like silver. On one side of the medal is a very fine cut of the Temple, with name, date of laying the corner-stone, height and cost. On the reverse side are two profiles—said to be very fine likenesses—of Frances E. Willard and the founder of the Temple; their names are inscribed, with the motto underneath: "For God and home and every land." Any person sending one dollar for the Temple will receive the beautiful Columbian souvenir. Mrs. P. A. Henry, Hatzie, B. C., writes: "I have received the beautiful souvenir you sent and can assure you I was both surprised and delighted. Surprised that my mite should have met such a kind recognition and delighted with the souvenir itself, bearing as it does the impression of the faces of two sisters whom I, in common with many others, not only delight to honor, but love, and also the picture of our Temple, which shall henceforth be the Mecca of our sisterhood."

Mrs. W. P. Smith, Utica, Ill., writes: "The Columbian souvenirs reached me yesterday; many, many thanks for them. They are much handsomer than I expected. I will send one to our president, I know she will be delighted with it." Mrs. Lucy M. Biglow, Bushnell, Fla., writes: "The beautiful Temple souvenir has been received, for which please accept my thanks. I never expect to see the 'House Beautiful' until I look at it from that other Beautiful House in the New Jerusalem, and so I value this dainty gift the more."

Mrs. Hattie A. Carlton, president Geauga county, Ohio, W. C. T. U., wishes the following correction made: $12.15 was credited to Burton, Grange county, when it should have been, the W. C. T. U. of Geauga, Co., O. The Medina, O., W. C. T. U. shows its love and appreciation for their able president, Mrs. E. J. Gray, by sending $38, completing their $100 gift which places the name of Mrs. Gray on the Ohio tablet in Willard Hall. Mrs. Delia A. Wilcox, superintendent Temple work for Medina county, also sends $8.16 for the Baby Band, raised by the W. C. T. U. of Wadsworth, O. "I am glad to be able," writes Mrs. J. M. Woodward, "to send you a check for $35, which completes the $100 pledged to the Temple by our union. We have struggled hard and long to raise this money, but the dear Lord has at last crowned our efforts with success. We rejoice that it is our privilege to have a part and lot in helping to pay for our 'House Beautiful.' We hope to see the name of Sioux City central union, Ia., in the corridor of Willard Hall." Still another brave union is added to the list of those who have completed their $100 gift to the Temple. Mrs. H. K. Osborn, secretary North Johnstown, Wis., W. C. T. U., writes as follows: "Enclosed please find $10 which completes the payment of our $100 pledge for the Temple. We are so glad as a union to be able to pay this amount. Though small in numbers we are great in purpose. It has really been a benefit to us as well as to the Temple fund, as it has kept our work before the public in entertainments, such as socials, ice cream festivals, Demorest medal contests, etc., all of which help to create temperance sentiment and advance the cause for which we are laboring."

Mrs. Jane Beatson, Rockford, Ill., has sent $5, which completes her personal gift of $100 to the Temple. She has been three years in paying the above sum. Thousands of our white-ribboners are just as able to give $100 as Mrs. Beatson; by so doing they would help the cause and honor themselves. Of course it requires self-denial, but that should be considered a privilege by all Christian women.

Mrs. S. E. Church sends $20 from the W. C. T. U. of Danville, O. She writes they have only twenty members. That number is large enough to raise $100; we hope they won't stop the good work until they have raised enough to place their name in Willard Hall. The Shenandoah, Iowa, W. C. T. U. have sent $5 as a first installment on a $100 pledge; $8 has been received from the Des Moines county W. C. T. U. on their second pledge of $100, through Iowa's beloved president, Mrs. M. H. Dunham.

WHAT THE SENATORS DO.

"What do the senators do, papa?
The United States senators do?"

"They are patriots, all, my good little Paul,
They are patriots tried and true."

"But what do the senators do, papa,
The United States senators do?"

"Oh, they talk and debate for the good of the state,
They are statesmen leal and true."

"But what do the senators do, papa,
The United States senators do?"

"Each talks in turn until they adjourn;
They are workers stern and true."

"But what do the senators do, papa?
These United States senators do?"

"Oh, their speeches are sound and very profound,
They are orators wise and true."

"But what—but what do they do, papa,
Oh, what do they do, I pray?"

"Oh, they draw their pay in the regular way,
In the old immemorial way."

ONE "FATHERS' MEETING" AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

BY KATHARINE LENTE STEVENSON.

How it was brought about no one ever quite knew—least of all the forty or more "prominent citizens" of Blithedale who found themselves one pleasant evening in the Grace church parlors, having accepted an invitation to a "fathers' meeting." They looked at each other somewhat sheepishly as one by one they entered the room, but seemed gradually to grow reassured by the fact that the very best element in their social life was really there. Even the two pastors who had wet-blanketed the other members of the committee put in an appearance, saying to themselves that they'd see what tomfoolery those women had coaxed Cathcart into.

When the clock hands pointed at eight Mr. Cathcart arose and said: "Since upon me alone rests the responsibility of bringing you together I must confess at the outset that I have some things I consider very important to say, upon which I hope action may be taken later. I will ask the meeting to appoint a chairman."

Judge Clare had served as chairman in all Blithedale public meetings from time immemorial, therefore though somewhat doubtful as to whether he might not be placing himself in an equivocal position, he still accepted the customary honor, and called upon Rev. Mr. Drayton to lead in prayer. Without irreverence it may be said that if the Lord had had no other source of information concerning the purpose of that meeting than the one afforded by Mr. Drayton's prayer, His ideas concerning it must have been vague indeed.

Then Judge Clare called upon Mr. Cathcart for "remarks, explanatory and otherwise." The young minister stood for a moment in silence, looking into the faces before him; then he said:

"Men and brethren, I should feel that an apology were due you from me were it not that I am very sure that, in calling you together, I have simply been 'not disobedient to the heavenly vision.' Almost from the first of my coming into your community one year ago, I have felt it impressed upon me that I must say to you some of the things I shall try to say to-night. I have hesitated because of my youth; but the time has come when I cannot hesitate longer.

"You know, I am sure, for the wives of most of you are members of that organization, that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of this town has, for the past year, been holding 'mothers' meetings.' It is because I have been so impressed by their brave facing of great problems, and by the perceptible growth I have noted in the mothers themselves, as well as, in some cases, in the children, that I have gained courage to say to you what I believe, viz., that the need of our land to-day lies in a corresponding movement on the part of fathers.

"That I may the more clearly define my position, may I be pardoned if I give you a leaf out of my own life history?

"My mother died when I was a baby, and therefore the whole of my care and training was left in the hands of my father. I fear he was an unusual father. I wish, for the sake of the world, that I could believe him to have been an universal type. I do not know how better to define him than by saying that I never, through all my childhood years, knew what it was to have that peculiar heart-ache for love and sympathy which most motherless children feel. My father always understood me, never repulsed my childish confidences; always, however busy, had time to take interest in my boyish sports and plans; constantly anticipated my wishes and folded my whole being in such an atmosphere of protecting, satisfying love that I, of all human beings, ought to realize the divine meaning of those words: 'Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him.'"

Here there was a perceptible stir in the room, Judge Clare, especially, moving uneasily in his seat of honor; but Mr. Cathcart's clear voice went calmly on: "My father was more than my father, in the ordinary sense of that term. He was more than the one to whom I looked for the supply of earthly needs; more than the power to which I must render obedience; he was my close friend and companion. From my babyhood we had the pretty custom of telling each other 'secrets.' He always came into my room as soon as the nurse had put me in bed, often usurping her function, and, after he had gathered me close into his arms, he would say: 'Well, laddie, I wonder who has the greater secret to-night?' Then he would tell me something out of his day; something, perhaps, of his business perplexities, something that was going on in the great world, or something from some book he had been reading, always adapting it, in simple language, to my comprehension and taking as great care in answering my questions as if they had been the questions of a sage.

"Thus all my life I was in closest touch with my father's business, social and intellectual life, and I never once felt that I was 'in the way.' Is it any wonder that I told such a father all my 'secrets'? Why, it was the gladdest thought of my day that I could tell him its happenings. Some of you have wondered at my memory for detail. I attribute it wholly to the training of those years. While yet in the nursery I used to store in my mind the day's happenings for that evening hour; and so, my father easily knew whether or not the influence of that nursery was good.

"When I grew older and entered school I imparted to him, as a matter of course, all the curious physiological information which had been poured into my ears by the other boys. He never appeared in the least shocked by anything I told him, but he followed out in light the stories they had begun in darkness, and as a consequence, the darkness could have no further charm for me. He was never didactic in his teaching. He would often say, 'Well, Ray, I don't know much about that point, hold it over for a day or two till I read up on it; meantime remember it's "our secret."' That meant it was to be held inviolably sacred between us, mentioned to none other. As a consequence before I was fifteen I knew more about the sacred laws of life and life's development; more about my body, its uses and abuses, than most men ever know; but I knew them all as 'sacred laws.' I saw light in God's light, through the light my father had from Him.

"We kept up the custom till God called him home—five years ago. Not, of course, in just the old baby fashion, but we always talked things over between us. I remember when I thought I should like to smoke cigarettes, I went to him with the statement and asked him what he thought about it. He told me afterward that he was never quite so near giving me a shaking; but his voice had no hint of it when he said: 'Well, Ray, you know I've never cared for tobacco and so I've never looked particularly into the question. Personally it is objectionable to me and I have a vague idea that it is injurious to the development of the highest manhood, but I should not want you to refrain from its use without some more definite reason. Suppose we hold this over for a day or two and I'll look it up.' He 'looked it up,' and the result was such an overwhelming array of facts and figures against nicotine as a deadly enemy to brawn and brain and nerve that my desire to use it as an accessory to manliness passed away never to return.

"As I look back over those years it seems to me that one of two things must have been true; either my dying mother's mantle must have fallen upon my father, or else in the true parenthood, as in Christ Jesus, 'there can be neither male nor female.' Theodore Parker used to be accused of irreverence when he prayed, 'Oh, thou, our Father and our Mother God.' It was the true reverence of one who had caught a swift vision of the heart of God.

"Do you seek the application of this personal experience? It has not been easy to give. Its sacredness makes it so peculiarly my heart's best treasure that I could part with it only for others' good.

"I came into your town twelve months ago, expecting to find it a moral as well as a physical paradise. I had not been here a month before I learned of a moral debasement hardly to be excelled in the slums of a great city. Do you know that the thoughts, words and deeds of the majority of your school children are indescribably vile? Have you visited your public schools and inquired of the teachers concerning the evils they are forced each day to face? Do you know how many boys under fifteen smoke cigarettes? Exactly two-thirds of the number in our town, as I know by their own confession. I have talked with nearly all of them personally. Some tell me, 'Oh, papa smokes, and it doesn't hurt him.' Others say, 'Papa knows I do it: he never said anything.' Others have said, 'Papa said I mustn't, but he didn't tell me why.'

"But smoking is not all. The boys of our town are learning the taste of liquor as well. 'What,' you say, 'when we have no saloon?' Do you know that you have no saloon? Have you kept vigilant watch for the violation of your no-license law? I could tell you things of that new restaurant opened on Elm street, and of the drug store at the corner which would astonish you. I shall tell them, and in a legal court room, too, if you do not arouse to their suppression.

"Nor are our boys alone in danger. There is a flippancy, a deterioration of the finer instincts in our girls which to me is heart-rending. Do you say 'that surely rests with the mothers'? Yes, to a degree, but with the fathers as well, just as the boy's development rests with both parents equally. But I hold fathers especially responsible in that they do not show to their own daughters, and do not require their brothers to show them that fine, courtly politeness which was the mark of the 'old school gentleman' and which, if a girl has known at home, she must turn away with disgust from the flippant familiarity which now seems to her to be quite proper because she has known nothing better.

"One word more. A boy of eighteen to whom I was talking the other day—a boy whose life is well-nigh wrecked before he has learned life's uses, said to me in a passion of indignation with which I could well sympathize, 'Mr. Cathcart, it isn't my fault. Before God, I did not know what I was doing. My father never told me one word about my body nor about life's laws. He ought to bear the punishment; not I.' The boy was right, and I am looking into the face of that father here to-night.

"Oh, my brethren, by the memory of my own father; by the knowledge my own life, through him, affords me that men can be kept pure and true; that wild oats sowing is not a period necessary to the evolution of a boy any more than to the evolution of a girl; by my knowledge of the awful laws of heredity which pass on to one generation the failures as well as the triumphs of another; by my hope for humanity and my desire for the building up of Christ's kingdom upon earth, I beg of you to ask yourselves whether or not you are fulfilling your duty as fathers."

A silence deep as the grave followed Mr. Cathcart's words and then, to the surprise of all, Judge Clare, that rigid parliamentarian, arose and said: "Friends, I am verily guilty before God and before you all. You know the story of my boys. You know why my wife's hair is white and my own head bowed. I have looked upon it as a mysterious affliction and have felt that God had visited me in wrath. I see now that I have been blaming God for that in which I alone have been guilty. I have been the exact opposite of Mr. Cathcart's father from my boys' babyhood to their young manhood. I need say no more." And here the proud man sank to his seat and bowed his head while deep, convulsive groans seemed wrung from his inmost being.

Again there was silence, broken this time by Mr. Everett's voice in prayer:

"Our Father, we know to-night why Thy Son taught us that word. We have seen Thy fatherhood through an earthly father, and our eyes are filled with its glory. We look away from that wonderful record to Thee, and we remember in shame that we have never before thought of Thy Fatherhood as the type of our own. Forgive us that we have failed so miserably in understanding our high calling. Forgive us that we have been such poor fathers. And help us, henceforth, to give up our entire lives, if need be, to learning how we may reveal Thee to our children. Through Jesus Christ, who, because He was Thy Son, is therefore, the type of what Thou wouldst have our children to be, even as Thou art the type of our Fatherhood. In His Name. Amen."

The result? A regular "fathers' meeting" established in Blithedale, do you say? Oh, dear, no; they held but the one, and there are no "mothers' meetings" held there now. But there is a "parents' meeting" each week, where works on child culture, works on heredity and kindred topics, and questions of actual experience are reverently studied and discussed by fathers and mothers together. The book they are taking up now is Drummond's "Ascent of Man," and young John Clare expressed the current opinion very clearly when he said: "Somehow they come out of those meetings with holier faces than they ever brought from a revival service."

What the effect upon the children will be it is, perhaps, premature to say, but the fathers and mothers of Blithedale feel sure that they have a well-grounded hope for a glorious future. Do you wonder?

THE SONG OF THE BELL.

Ding-dong! vacation's done,
Play-time's over, work begun;
Good-by to tennis and croquet.
Put oar and bat and gun away,
Good-by to hours of idle ease,
To summer's lazy luxuries,
To meadow green and forest still,
To sandy shore and breezy hill,
To summer's rest and summer's fun,
Ding-dong! vacation's done!

Ding-dong! for school's begun!
Welcome winter's work and fun!
Come, Jack and Jenny, Bess and Ben,
Take up your books and slates again.
Come with your busy hands and feet,
Your happy hearts and voices sweet,
Bring to your work the sturdy will
That makes the task a pleasure still;
Come, welcome winter's work and fun,
Ding-dong! for school's begun.

A WORD.

Once a little girl I know,
Said a little word;
Whispered it so very low
Just one person heard.

And that person told it o'er,
Just to one or two,
Adding to it one word more,
As so many do!

And at once the two that heard
Told it in a crowd;
Each one adding one more word
Told it quite aloud!

Straightway every one that heard
Shouted loud and clear
'Till the hapless little word
Floated far and near.

Then the maiden raised her head,
She was very glad
That the little thing she said
Wasn't something bad!

HOW NELLIE KEPT HER PLEDGE.

A True Story.

BY HELEN SOMERVILLE.

Nellie was a fair-haired little English girl, and lived at Allahabad, six hundred miles from the great city of Calcutta, the capital of India.

You children who study geography know that far away from our beloved America is India, a very hot country, where tropical fruits of all kinds grow, and the native people have very dark skins.

A great many English people live in India, and Nellie's parents had been in that country several years. But Nellie was now an orphan, and lived with her uncle's family.

She was a sweet little girl, with large, trustful gray eyes, and such pretty, coaxing ways that every one loved her.

Nellie attended the English church and Sunday-school, and one Sunday when she was eight years old, a gentleman talked to the children, telling them how wrong it is for people to drink whisky and beer, and how he wanted them all to promise they would never drink, or use tobacco, or say wicked words.

"Children," he said, "I have here some pledges. All who are willing to make the promise I have asked can have pledges, and sign their names to them. How many will do it?"

Nellie's hand was the first to go up. Her bright eyes were shining, and her sweet face glowed with earnest feeling as she went up the aisle to receive her pledge.

But all at once her face clouded over, and the minister, who was about to hand her a pledge, asked:

"What is the matter, little girl?"

"Oh," said Nellie, looking up, her eyes full of tears, "I do want to sign the pledge so much, but I can't. I really must not without asking uncle James and aunt Harriet first. Please, Mr. Graves, give me one to take home and perhaps they will let me sign it."

Mr. Graves hesitated a moment, then looking down into the child's pure, innocent face, said gently:

"Yes, my child, take it, and may the Lord help you to make and keep the promise."

Nellie carried the pledge home and began to tell about it, when her aunt interrupted her by saying, impatiently:

"There, there, child, that's enough. No doubt Mr. Graves means well, but he goes to extremes. I believe in temperance, of course, but pledges are only for weak-minded people who need a check on themselves, and not for those who have strength of character."

"But, aunty, you won't care if I sign it?"

"Nonsense, Nellie! Take it away and never mention it again."

Nellie sorrowfully laid the pledge away, and for nearly a year it remained untouched, at the bottom of her trunk. During the year the child, who was never strong, became very weak and delicate, and her aunt's physician prescribed beer for her.

"Beer! I can never take beer!" exclaimed the little girl to her ayah, or nurse.

"Oh, but you must Nellie Baba," said the ayah. "It is to make you well and strong."

"I can't help that, ayah. I don't want to get well and strong if I must take beer. Listen, ayah. When Mr. Graves talked to us that day, long ago, and told us how sinful it is to drink beer, I promised in my heart that I would never do it, and the Lord knows I promised it, even if I didn't sign the pledge."

"It's all right, then, Nellie Baba, if you didn't sign the pledge," said the ayah, coaxingly.

"No, it isn't. And I shall sign the pledge this very day, so that I cannot drink beer. They can't make me do it." And Nellie, who was a child with a strong will, ran to her trunk and brought to light the pledge, which she signed in large, straggling letters. Then, holding it up in triumph, she exclaimed, "There, now, I can never drink beer. I've settled it."

And nothing could change this determined little girl from her purpose to be true to her pledge.

"No, aunty, please don't ask me to break my pledge! I'll take all the bitter medicine you give me, but not beer."

"You are a naughty girl to sign the pledge without my consent, Nellie."

"Well, now, I've done it, so do not tempt me to break my promise, aunty."

Some time after this Nellie was invited, with her uncle's family, to attend a dinner-party at the home of some wealthy people. Wine was placed before each guest, but Nellie did not touch hers.

"Will you not have wine, my dear?" asked the hostess, a smiling faced lady, who had taken a fancy to the child.

"No, thank you, Mrs. Rogers, I never drink it," said Nellie, coloring. Her aunt gave her an angry, warning glance, but the child bravely refused to drink the wine.

When they reached home her aunt said, angrily: "You naughty, headstrong girl! What shall I do with you?"

"Oh, aunty," said Nellie, wearily, "I've signed the pledge, and of course could not break it!"

"I told you that you ought not to have signed it. You were very rude to Mrs. Rogers, and I am going to punish you." Nellie received her punishment without a murmur, saying afterwards to the ayah:

"It didn't last long, but if I'd broken my pledge I could never have forgotten it all my life!"

Nellie is a woman now, and teaches a kindergarten in Calcutta, where, by her courage and bravery and the inspiration of her own bright, helpful womanhood, she instills principles of right in the minds of her charges and brings joy and gladness into their young lives.

A SIX-PENNY NAIL.

The slightest deflection from duty, or God's truth, is extremely dangerous.

A Cunarder put out from New England for New York. It was well equipped, but in putting up a stove in the pilot box a nail was driven too near the compass.

The ship's officer, deceived by the distracted compass, put the ship two hundred miles off her right course, and suddenly the man on the lookout cried, "Land, ho!" and the ship was halted within a few yards of her demolition on Nantucket shoals.

A six-penny nail came near wrecking a Cunarder.—Sunday Afternoon.

A 6 BY 9 RHYME.

A queer little boy who had been to school,
And was well up to all sorts of tricks,
Discovered that 9, when upside down,
Would pass for the figure 6.

So, when asked his age by a good old dame,
The comical youngster said:
"I'm 9, when I stand on my feet like this,
And 6 when I stand on my head."

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Did you read about the Falcon which carried Lieutenant Peary and his exploring party to Greenland? If you have then you will remember that she is a stout steamship built to sail among the ice in the north seas.

When she went away on her last trip she took a varied cargo. First, there were the captain and crew and thirteen members of the exploring party, including one lady, Mrs. Peary, wife of the commander. Second, were the Eskimo dogs to drag the sledges over the snow and ice when the members left the steamer on excursions. Third, eight little burros were taken to help in hauling. Last, about twenty carrier doves were added to carry messages. The ship had two whaleboats and a steam launch. Among the supplies we may be sure there were no intoxicating drinks, for Arctic explorers know better than to kindle a flame within and destroy the vitality so needed to withstand the terrible cold.

Thus equipped the ship sailed away for the north one hot day in July, and it was the purpose of those who went on board of her to make geography for the boys and girls of the future. They intended if possible to go to the very tip of the north pole!

But they didn't do it this summer. Old Boreas had a word to say as he generally does when his quarters are invaded. The stout ship and her brave crew have stood many a blast, and on one occasion she was jammed in an ice floe and lifted clear up out of the water. For two days she remained in this dangerous position. And the whole trip was a constant battle with the ice.

The explorations had to be abandoned for this season. And the most of the party returned last month to Philadelphia. What do you think they brought with them? A wee baby who had first opened its eyes on ice fields and Arctic skies—the little Peary baby. Perhaps this baby will be the one in the future to locate on our geography maps the exact surroundings of the mysterious north pole. Who knows? Your,

ARBITRATION THE NEXT STEP IN THE LABOR PROBLEM.

During the World's Fair we had occasion to speak of the enterprise of New South Wales as evidenced by the number and character of its exhibits. Attention is again called to that country for a new and very different reason. It seems that that progressive nation is in advance of us in the labor agitation by this much, that four years ago it had the greatest sympathetic strike ever known, one which involved absolutely all labor organizations. But the most important feature of the strike is the thorough investigation which followed it. The commission of investigation was composed of sixteen persons representing antagonistic interests, and their report is now published.

The report is a quarto volume of one thousand pages and includes, besides the testimony of many witnesses upon the strike itself, special reports upon the operation of courts of arbitration and conciliation in all countries where such courts exist. The report has great weight from the fact that its every clause was adopted unanimously by these sixteen persons whose views concerning the merits of the case in hand were necessarily very different. As a result of their investigation, the commission recommend limited compulsory arbitration, the compulsion to extend merely to the courts having power to enforce the attendance of one party to the quarrel when the other party institutes proceedings. The commission do not think it wise to force arbitration unless at least one of the parties desires it nor to enforce the decisions of the court, the experience of such courts being almost wholly that compulsion is not necessary.

The decisions of courts of arbitration, while by no means universally satisfactory, have been on the whole reasonably fair and in the vast majority of cases both parties have preferred to acquiesce in the decision rather than to prolong a doubtful and costly strife. Public opinion also has acted as a powerful agent and is always in favor of acquiescence after both parties have been given an impartial hearing.

The results of this investigation have scarcely less interest for us than if they had been conducted in our own country, for the conditions of labor in Australia are in all essentials the same as in the United States. Hence, whatever throws light on their problem throws equal light on ours and no one can question that we stand in sore need of illumination from whatever quarter it may come. It is true that the great strike of last summer, from which all of the interests of the country suffered so severely is over, and that, as usual, the weaker vessel went to the wall; but that weaker vessel is not injured beyond possibility of repair, the laborers are not crushed into hopeless serfdom and never can be so long as God reigns. There is therefore no assurance that similar and even greater contests with corresponding calamities are not just before us. The battle last summer decided nothing and, until the great questions underlying the struggle are settled, society can hope for no permanent tranquillity.

The Australian commission showed its clear insight into the problem with which it had to deal when it stated that there was a great distinction to be observed between "disputes which concern the remuneration and comfort of the workmen and those which concern the rights of labor organizations." For the former disputes it expressed the belief that courts of arbitration would in the majority of cases prove a satisfactory solution. The second class of disputes the commission recognized as much the more serious in character. It says significantly that "of late years the latter cause of quarrel has come more and more to the front, and it is becoming a fundamental question between employers and employed." The report adds, "It has not been possible for us to discover a solution." It expresses, however, the hope that courts of arbitration may indirectly help in solving even the second and greater class of disputes by assuaging the bitterness between the disputants, removing much misconception and suspicion, educating public opinion and preparing the way for whatever new legislation may be necessary.

We do not believe that courts of arbitration are the final settlement of the labor problem, but we do believe that they are an invaluable if not indispensable means to that final settlement. The demand of workmen for higher wages or against reduction of wages in any specific case is only in another form the old historic cry of the Anglo-Saxon for "redress of grievances." But as a race we have learned well the lesson that mere temporary redress of grievances is of little worth. The next step has always been, must always be, if permanent results are to be achieved, to render further grievances impossible. Behind the grievance lies the cause of the grievance.

The secret of the success of our race in achieving civil liberty lies in the fact that we have always made the cause, not the effect, our ultimate object of attack. This is why the question of the rights of labor organizations is coming more and more to the front, why it was so prominent an issue in the great railroad strike last summer. Laborers see clearly that for one single body of workmen to strike successfully is merely to win a temporary victory. It may help a few families for a few weeks or months; it gives absolutely no assurance that labor may not in the near future become the bond slave of capital. As against consolidated capital, labor has no chance at all unless the laborers are organized and stand together.

Capital also sees the point. It claims and exercises the right to consolidate and makes the further atrocious demand that laborers be not allowed the same privilege but be compelled to act singly and alone. In their own words, capitalists claim that they should be permitted to "hire in a free field." This is the meaning of the attempt on the part of many large companies to exclude from their employ all union men, the meaning of the refusal on the part of the haughty autocrat to submit his case to arbitration. Could this demand of capital be established, the practical slavery of labor must be the result.

Let us not be misunderstood as saying that capitalists deliberately plot the serfdom of labor. We doubt if a single one of them sees the logical outcome of his own policy. Capitalists are exasperated by the losses inflicted upon them by strikes and naturally endeavor to protect themselves against such injury. The most effectual way to protect themselves is clearly the one adopted, to refuse to recognize labor organizations and insist on treating with laborers simply as individuals. But whatever the motive of the capitalists, the result of such action can only be to place labor absolutely at the mercy of capital. It needs no argument to show that in these conditions labor would be ground down to an intolerable serfdom.

Again and again in the history of the world capital has shown that it knows how to be charitable but not how to be just. The strike last summer afforded an excellent illustration. The public was properly impressed with the magnanimity of the Pullman Company when the statement was first made that that company was manufacturing cars at an actual loss in order to give employment to its workmen. But public opinion was reversed when the investigation showed that during the years of its organization not only had the company paid an annual dividend of eight per cent, but had also acquired a surplus of $25,000,000, while its workmen during the same time had received but $32,000,000.

And this is simply an example of the truth that absolute power, however generous it may sometimes be, is never just. But if capital cannot be trusted with absolute power no more can labor. There is and always will be "a great deal of human nature in folks" and it is an immaterial accident whether "the folks" happen to belong to the capitalist or the laboring classes. It would be equally fatal to hand the interests of the nation over into the hands of either class. The end which must be reached is a condition of society in which the oppression of one class by another is as much an impossibility as the abuses of absolute despotism are an impossibility in such nations as England and the United States. In the nature of the case, therefore, arbitration cannot be expected to be a final solution of our difficulties but it may very materially lessen the fierceness of the strife, and in many ways, as indicated by the Australian commission, indirectly help to bring about the settlement. It would bring untold relief to a suffering public and be a positive assistance to the weaker party in the strife.

TEMPERANCE DAY IN CHICAGO.

One of the most notable of recent victories scored for our great cause was the observance of Father Mathew's birthday, October 10, as a grand rallying center for the Protestant and Catholic temperance forces of Chicago.

The thought of a "Temperance Day" originated with the Chicago Temperance Union, which is a federation of all the temperance societies and the majority of the churches of that city. The committee in charge of the exercises did grand work, and, as a consequence, the celebration was of an epoch-marking nature.

The board of education granted a half-holiday to the children of the public schools, which fact is most worthy of note, and indicates the rapid strides our cause has taken in public opinion in the last decade.

The feature of the afternoon was a grand parade on the lake front. The ranks were composed almost wholly of children and youth, and it was estimated that fully 5,000 marched past the Auditorium where they saluted Governor Altgeld of Illinois, Bishop Watterson of Ohio, and various other notables who were seated in the balcony. It was a most inspiring sight. The procession was headed by a delegation from the associated bicycling clubs of Chicago. Then came a sprinkling of all the youths' organizations of the city; Boys' and Girls' Brigades, Epworth Knights, Junior Endeavorers; all the various Catholic societies; children from the Deaf and Dumb Institute; a delegation from the Waifs' Mission; a company of girls from Armour Institute who marched and saluted with an absolutely perfect military precision, and, last of all, the children of the publ icschools, headed by their teachers. There were a brass band, many banners and devices and several large floats symbolic of the great reform.

At eight o'clock a vast audience gathered in the Auditorium and it was evident at the outset that the enthusiasm of the afternoon had been cumulative, for there was enough and to spare for the evening.

The Fort Sheridan brass band gave stirring music while the audience was assembling; then the president of the Chicago Temperance Society, Hon. W. J. Onahan, made a brief, stirring address, stating the origin of the occasion, and introducing the chairman of the evening, Rev. John Henry Barrows. Dr. Barrows was greeted with prolonged applause and his response was in his usual felicitous vein.

The principal speaker of the evening was Bishop Watterson. The prolonged applause with which he was greeted showed at once how deep a place he has won for himself in the hearts of the temperance host by his brave initiative in denying to liquor dealers membership in the Catholic societies of his diocese. His address was a blending of fiery indictments against intemperance and glowing tributes to Father Mathew's life and work.

The other speakers were many, but so well did Chairman Barrows keep faith with the audience in the matter of the time limit that no one felt wearied and comparatively few left.

Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson represented the W. C

T. U., it being impossible for Miss Willard to be present, and the other general officers being also absent at state conventions. She said in part:

It means something in the annals of our great reform, brothers, sisters, that a gathering like this is possible. It means something that the schools of our city have been closed for "Temperance Day"; that our children have paraded the streets as a grand object-lesson to the mighty power intrenched behind saloon bars, and behind the still mightier barrier of the law. Each step that band has taken to-day has been beating out the rhythm of Miss Willard's own song: "Saloons, saloons, saloons MUST GO." They must go. Under whatever name we stand to-night, under whatever badge, we stand a unit on that proposition. It is glorious to know that we are coming to recognize our unity. If Frances Willard had done nothing else for the world, she would still have performed a deed worthy to send her name ringing down the ages in her practical discovery of the unity of reform forces, and its necessary corollary, the union of reformers. She has taught unity through union. It was time it should be taught by exactly that method.

Far too long the Christian forces, the reform forces of the world had been struggling each with its own little bit of the great work—failing to understand that the work itself is a mosaic in which each part must fit into all other parts, from which one cannot be omitted without a corresponding loss to all. She saw this, and seeing it, she has made the last word of our title a something more than a name in that we have really become, under her generalship, a union of forces, blended together in a union of effort.

Narrow souls have blamed Miss Willard and the W. C. T. U. because we have welcomed on the one hand the representatives of the church whose members form so large a part of this audience to-night, and on the other, the most radical of free-thinkers as chosen allies in our work for God and Home and Native Land. It seems to me that our answer has in it the very heart of the Gospel of Christ.

We recognize and welcome as allies all forces everywhere which tend to the in-bringing and up-building of righteousness.

Tried by this rule we surely recognize each organization represented here to-night. Tried by this rule it is surely imperatively necessary that we recognize the work of him whose birthday we celebrate. It is good to couple their names together—Father Mathew! Frances Willard! It is good to realize anew that "God fulfills Himself in many ways, lest one good custom should corrupt the world." It is good to see drawing nearer and nearer the day when we shall see "eye to eye" as the "Lord brings again Zion."

Rev. P. S. Henson, of the First Baptist church, gave a most inspiring address, in which wit was so mingled with wisdom that it was not strange the laughter at times dominated the applause.

After the reading of letters of sympathy from Monseignor Satolli, Rabbi Joseph Stolz, Archbishop Ireland, Frances E. Willard, Lady Henry Somerset, and others, there followed five-minute addresses from Bishop Fallows, Dr. N. S. Davis, President Coulter, of Lake Forest, Judge Gibbons, Hon. J. B. Hobbs, Dr. Henry Wade Rogers, of Northwestern University, W. H. Kline, of the Independent Order of Good Templars, Father Cleary, president of the Total Abstinence Society of America, and Prof. Graham Taylor. Each one of these speeches was a power in itself and it was constantly a marvel to discover how much could be said in so little time.

The resolutions of the executive committee followed. We give some of the strongest:

2. We believe this union, embracing as it does representatives of the principal religious denominations and of organized societies, ought to maintain a permanent organization and continue on judicious lines the work of propagating the principles and practice of temperance and temperance reform, combining in the cause on general lines every friendly interest for the common good.

3. We regard it as of vital importance that this organization shall be and continue absolutely non-partisan in politics and interdenominational in religion, and that its aims and objects be limited to influencing public opinion by and through educational agencies, by the use of the public press and by means of lectures and addresses and the training of children and youth in home, school and church.

4. While thus guarding the organization against taking part inpolitical action, this restriction cannot, of course, be understood as seeking to prevent its members as individuals from using their opportunities and of exercising their political rights by votes and legislation to curb the growth of the saloon evil and to restrain the abuse of the traffic in drink.

By the time these had been adopted by a rising vote, the vast audience was quite ready to fall under the magic spell of the Imperial Quartette's wonderful rendering of "Illinois," and to join in the still grander volume of "America."

We have given so much space to this meeting because it has seemed to us far more than a local happening, in that it marks the beginning of a new era in reform work—the union of Protestant and Catholic, of Baptist and Methodist, of Presbyterian and Congregationalist, in harmonious concentration of effort. It is time, as Dr. Henson so wittily said, that reformers should learn the old lesson of the Revolution, "We must all hang together or we shall all hang separately." It is good to know that the great hope of our great Leader seems, in her own city, to be so near realization, and, if realized in Chicago, it must go on to the ends of the earth. We shall yet have a practical, working "union of all who love in the service of all who suffer." When we have such a union thoroughly established the day of victory will be at hand.

AN IMPORTANT OBSERVANCE.

In order to give special emphasis to our National evangelist's annual call to prayer, we gladly give it editorial space and indorsement, with the hope that all may read and heed. No women have more to thank God for and to ask of Him in faith than white-ribboners, and this annual trysting-time is a source of spiritual strength which they have ever rejoiced to observe. The date is one not easily forgotten—the last day of October. May it bring great blessing.

CALL TO PRAYER.

The annual meeting of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union will be held in Music Hall, Cleveland, Ohio, November 16 to 21, 1894. In view of the custom to hold a day of consecration and prayer previous to the Convention, the superintendent of the evangelistic department would hereby summon all local unions to set apart Wednesday, October 31, for this purpose. The continued blessings, not only of the past year, but of twenty-one years, may well lead us, as we celebrate our majority, to tune our voices to thanksgiving, while a profound sense of our failures, mistakes, weakness and dependence, should lead us to bow low in confession and earnest prayer for the fresh anointing of the Spirit.

Believing that the multiplication of hours and subjects, and the frequent change of leaders lessens the power for good in such a day, the following program provides for only three divisions and leaders. If by careful advertising, each local union gathers strength and numbers about these three services, the day will leave a sense of helpfulness and joy impossible where meetings are more prolonged and varied.

ELIZABETH W. GREENWOOD,
Evangelistic Supt., Natl. W. C. T. U.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

RELATING to the recent enthusiastic celebration of Father Mathew's birthday in Chicago, as a great temperance demonstration, the following paragraph from Dr. Norman Kerr's "Science of Inebriety" will be found interesting:

Ireland has in the nineteenth century presented to the world two interesting and remarkable series of inebrio-psychological phenomena. In 1838 a simple-minded Roman Catholic priest, Father Mathew, adopted and began to advocate the practice of abstinence from all intoxicating drinks. So amazing was the impression made by him that in three years the roll of the teetotal pledges which he had administered amounted to millions in Ireland, in addition to large numbers in England, Scotland and America. The reality of this epidemic of temperance was attested by the statement of the chief secretary, in 1840, that 'the duties of the military and police in Ireland are now almost entirely confined to keeping the ground clear for the operations of Father Mathew.' Though this great wave of sobriety has gradually receded, till now the extent of drinking in Erin is simply terrible, I am every now and again meeting professionally with sons and daughters of Hibernia who glory in their steadfastness to the pledge which they so long ago took at the hands of the Irish apostle of temperance. An accurate study of this unique crusade would in psychological results amply repay the labors of any earnest student of mental science.

Not long ago we were horror-stricken at the forest fires that swept across sister states, sending up in smoke, village and forest, and wiping out human lives by scores. More than one story of heroism thrilled our hearts, and never to be forgotten are those brave engineers who raced with the fiery foe, urging the iron horse on to the utmost limit of speed and strength. But what could the engineer have done though heart and hand were true, had the engine been less than perfect? One slipping bolt, one weak plate, one faulty valve, and to-day there had been only the story of a brave resolve—frustrated.

The beginning of the "wheel within a wheel" system of our W. C. T. U. is in the individual white-ribboner, even as the beginning of the engine was in the component parts. The local union is the first step toward the building of the machine, and as the losing or winning of that race for life was dependent upon the soundness, fitness and perfect adjustment of minor parts, who can say how our race for the plains of safety that surmount the Hill of Righteousness is delayed by the unsoundness, unfitness, imperfect adjustment of individual members?

"Don't let whisky get the best of you, but get the best of whisky," reads a Chicago liquor paper's advertisement. And I take this as good temperance advice, even at the risk that my interpretation may not find favor in the organ quoted! Does not the temperance reformer always get the best of whisky—in the condensed golden grain? We give the best of us, and will get the best of whisky—in our peaceful war.

Apropos of the Father Mathew celebration in Chicago a brief description of the badge which was worn by his faithful followers of half a century ago will be of interest. One of these, now the property of National Headquarters, was placed in my hands the other day and I looked upon the time-worn souvenir of a blessed ministry with a profound respect and interest. It was a homely object, a leaden medal of about two inches in diameter, yet beautiful in the use to which the base material had been consecrated. On its face was imprinted the sign of the cross supported on either side by a male and female figure, enclosed with the motto, "In this sign shalt thou conquer." Beneath was an eagle bearing in its mouth an olive branch and spears. On the obverse in raised letters was the quaintly worded pledge arranged within the outlines of a St. Andrew's cross. These are the words: "I promise to abstain from all intoxicating drinks except used medicinally, and by order of a medical man, and to discountenance the use and practice of intemperance." Around the rim was the name of the Illinois Catholic Total Abstinence Association and the date, 1841. I could not help but feel that this bit of cold, perishable metal was a vital part of the great movement now encircling the world for the protection of the home and the uplifting of mankind.

There is a book before the public now from the pen of Dr. Arthur T. Pierson, called "The New Acts of the Apostles," whose theme is missions. The story begins where the book of Acts closes, claiming that "wherever, from that day to this, Christ's witnesses have gone forth in obedience to His word, the same essential marks as in the Apostolic age have attended their service and explained their successes." In a wonderful chapter entitled, "The Calling of the New Apostles," he says:

"The one hope of missions is the faith that God's spirit does select and separate unto Himself, call out from His church and send forth unto His work, His own divinely appointed and divinely anointed messengers. Such only can be the apostles of missions. For what is an apostle or missionary but one who is sent? Apostle is missionary spelt Greekwise, and missionary is apostle spelt Latinwise. But both words mean one thing: God-sent. Take fast hold of this thought; let it not go, for it is the life of missions, and our daily risk is in losing sight of it and depending on human argument and appeal and the wisdom of man-selection to furnish the force for the field. . . . We cannot raise up workmen. We do not know God's chosen men and women. Our wisdom is folly; our steps will be missteps and mistakes. We must resort to prayer. At our peril we seek to multiply workmen by human means. God must call, select, separate and send forth those whom He ordains—who hear His call and willingly offer themselves. All other choice of laborers is premature, officious, unsafe." Has not this a message for white-ribboners?

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

NOTES.

Your Adelaide reporter hopes to communicate oftener in future. Very soon after our last Colonial convention our Colonial president, Mrs. Nicholls, visited West Australia, at the request of its Colonial executive, and toured successfully, even through some of its remotest regions. She received a warm welcome, and was the means of much good. A very few hours after her return home Mrs. Nicholls found herself being enthusiastically welcomed by a large number of white-ribbon sisters at a garden party held on the grounds of our Colonial evangelistic superintendent, Mrs. Odgers, at Payneham. The day was intensely hot, but under the magnificent mulberry tree and other veteran shade-givers, and refreshed with fruits and confections, and in due time, tea, everybody was charmingly comfortable. Mrs. Nicholls entertained the party with an account of her travels and work, and one or two ladies spoke in a congratulatory way.

We have had the pleasure of entertaining several visitors who have done us good service in various ways. Miss Ada Murcutt, sister to West Australia Colonial secretary, was with us for some time, and by lantern lectures and by earnest and excellent addresses at public meetings has contributed a large amount of information and help.

The Rev. L. M. Isitt, whose campaign on behalf of prohibition—in which cause he is an outspoken pleader—sufficed to open the eyes of a great many retiring people, who had not previously given the subject a thought, and consequently were purblind about it. He likewise proved a sort of "stirring long pole," poking up some of the friends of the liquor traffic to deep indignation, though they conveniently refrained from taking up the lecturer's oft-repeated challenge until he had returned to New Zealand, since which time a few firearms have been, with characteristic discretion, discharged at the back of this intrepid soldier of prohibition.

Mrs. Masterman, Colonial secretary of New South Wales, also visited our colony, and helped with courteous words of greeting and cheer. Mrs. Barber, the Australasian superintendent of opium, was in Adelaide a few weeks since, and during her stay did much to arouse interest in her very important department. Mrs. Johnston, too, from B. W. T. A., England, exchanged calls with our president, and spoke at a drawing-room meeting and at a prayer-meeting during Thanksgiving week.

The suffrage has for some time been the burning question in this colony, and unsparing as well as judicious effort has been put forth by our present superintendent of suffrage, in conjunction with the Suffrage League. The latter have issued a petition, and our unions have pledged themselves to assist the pushing of it. A large number of signatures have been obtained, yet there are many who have not been reached, and unless they are reached the signatures will not truly represent the position. A bill is now before Parliament.

Our district conventions have now become a marked feature of our work. Most of the districts have held their third annual convention. Some, however, are a year younger, and these remain to be held. The membership and interest are increasing, although our colony is still struggling with financial depression, and paucity of labor.

Broken Hill, though in New South Wales, works under the South Australasian colonial union, and our president and Miss Ada Murcutt have given it substantial attention. Just lately they held a series of meetings there, and were very successful. The ministers of the churches, mostly, heartily coöperated with them, and much good work was done.

During the sessions of the Wesleyan General conference, which was held in Adelaide recently, a deputation from the Australasian union, consisting of the Australasian president, Mrs. Nicholls, and Miss George, waited upon the conference, according to arrangement made at the Australasian convention. They were heartily received, and several delegates, both ministerial and lay, spoke in warm approval of the union's aims. A resolution of sympathy with the work was carried. The able and eloquent pleading of woman's cause and claims by the deputation, called forth remarks of a highly complimentary nature in a subsequent issue of the Christian Weekly, the Adelaide Methodist paper. Toward the close of the sessions of the conference, the delegates were invited by the executives of the city and suburban unions, to meet the honorary members and representatives from the various temperance societies. It was a large and happy gathering, and was held in the banqueting room of the Town Hall. Fraternal and sympathetic sentiments were exchanged, and every one felt that it had been a profitable time.

Colonial convention draws nigh. Already the local branches are appointing their delegates, and the air is full of official and documentary import. Domiciliary and commissariat preparations are going forward, and we are looking for a good time. The executive have secured the services of Mrs. Harrison Lee, lecturer for the Victorian Alliance, and Australasian superintendent of work among railroad men and shearers, for the evenings during convention. We are hoping for a successful season, and praying that all our hearts may temple the Holy Ghost, without whose equipping power all our efforts are vain. Yours in the good work,

QUEENSLAND NOTES.

The sailor mission committee in Brisbane, inspired by Miss Oggs' enthusiasm, has opened a reading-room this month. They intend to continue the social meetings once a month besides providing other attractions and having Bible readings regularly. The sailors are remembered by the W. C. T. U. in other ports, Mackay and Townsville both supplying literature to the boats.

Much good work is being done by Charters union in the way of open-air meetings and Mackay is making very effective use of its literature, for, after being read by two sets of people in the town, it is sent in parcels to outlying stations and sugar plantations.

Mrs. Britten, our organizer, has returned from the district convention, having formed one women's and two Y unions, revived the one at Mount Morgan, besides visiting existing branches, giving instruction in all departments of our work, and interesting many women who had joined but had taken no active part.

Annual public meetings and social gatherings to report progress are now occupying the attention of the local unions, together with the always important election of officers.

A refreshment booth was again undertaken by the unions in the Brisbane district at the exhibition in August, and proved the most successful effort of the kind.

Miss Gurney, World's superintendent of policemen, paid a flying visit to Brisbane and held several meetings which were very enjoyable.

All our energies are now being directed to preparations for the colonial convention to be held in Maryborough in September.

In the notes which were published in THE UNION SIGNAL of May 31, it appeared that the Brisbane picnic for the poor was on Sunday. It should have been Saturday.

Two Demorest medal contests have recently been held, one at Ipswich and the other in South Brisbane. Both were successful and every one speaks with gratitude of the donor of the medals whose generosity has reached even to Australia.

Helpful and interesting conventions have been held in the three districts not mentioned in the last notes. That at Warwick had a two days' session, ending with a splendid public meeting.

Bundaberg brought out a number of women who had not spoken before and a great deal of useful work was accomplished during the two days, one result of the gathering being the formation of a Y union in the town. A picnic to the sea was arranged in honor of the visiting delegates.

Though only sitting for one day, the Ipswich convention was most successful. This convention was honored by a surprise visit from the colonial president and concluded with a temperance meeting at night, at which greetings were extended to other temperance bodies.

Three unions in Brisbane have united in engaging a lady evangelist who divides her time between them.

Brisbane Y's annual meeting took the form of a pink social, at which Mrs. Brentnall presided. All the decorations were pink and the Y's wore tiny caps and pretty aprons of pink crêpe paper. FLORA B. HARRIS,

BRAZIL.

A LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY.

We date the completion of our organization as a National union from the first of July last, the date on which the first elected officers commenced the discharge of their duties; but with our president resigned as soon as elected, and vice-president out of the country, the union has not been in a very suitable condition to push things. As a consequence no national superintendents of departments nor organizers have yet been appointed. In the meantime I have been keeping in correspondence with the two local unions on the topic of the World's Petition. I have done my best to cheer up our women at those two places by repeated letters of encouragement and recommendation. Our royal sisters at Piracicaba have visited the neighboring town of Capivary and organized a flourishing local union, which is affiliated with the National union. So at present we have but three local unions in Brazil,—Para, Piracicaba and Capivary. The presence of a live state or national organizer in a number of other places would insure local organizations, but as yet we have not the good fortune to possess so essential a helper.

For introducing and continuing the work we have to depend entirely on the missionaries of the evangelical churches. Some Baptists are interested and are recently taking hold of the World's Petition; so I have hopes that the same persons will soon be fully enlisted in aid of the cause of local organization. As yet, all white-ribboners in Brazil are Methodists; but we do not propose to be always confined to this church if good-nature, perseverance and the grace of God will break the ranks of the indifferent in other churches.

Please say for us to the National Convention at Cleveland in November, that the youngest of all the daughters of the World's white-ribbon family sends from Brazil to the eldest sister congratulations from her heart for her twenty-first birthday, and a wish and a promise to follow her noble example. A CRUSADE WEEK.

Acting on the suggestion made by the recent Triennial Convention, the first week in July was set apart by the different colonies for a "Crusade week for prayer, special effort and thankofferings." Owing to pressing needs of their own the Victorian W. C. T. U. was unable to participate, having had a week of special effort in May.

South Australia was thoroughly organized, special leaflets and appeals being sent to all the local unions from the head office. The week was very generally observed throughout the colony, much good being done by the meetings. Ministers helped and in some instances all the churches united with the unions, addresses being delivered to the united gathering instead of to the regular week-night congregations. A number of drawing room meetings were held at which new members joined, and a spirit of prayer and thanksgiving has been cultivated.

Tasmania has reaped the benefit of the special effort by the gain of new members and the renewed courage of others. A series of meetings, at which an earnest spirit of love and prayer prevailed, was held by the Launceston union, and a public meeting which was eminently successful, concluded the week. Hobart and the country unions also joined in the crusade.

Western Australia reports a most encouraging series of meetings at Fremantle, including a Sunday afternoon evangelistic service at the Sailors' Rest, preceded by a prayer-meeting of much spiritual power, and another service at the same place for praise and Bible study. During the week Bible readings were given in members' homes. The thankoffering reached £9.

Queensland, like other colonies, adopted successfully the use of the printed appeals and envelopes, initiated by wide-awake South Australia, sending them to people outside of the union. An all-day of prayer was held in Brisbane, each hour being presided over by a local president. In another town meetings were held each night in a different church and a real crusade took place. The members of a northern union canvassed the town for thankofferings with gratifying results.

New South Wales observed the week, most of the unions holding special meetings, but more would have been done had the notice been longer. An all-day prayer was held on election day—all the parliamentary elections throughout the colony being fixed for the same date.

Whether the financial result of this crusade week be small or great we feel that it has drawn us nearer to each other, for during the same week, white-ribboners in every colony have met at the mercy seat, asking for a divine blessing on our work, its leaders, and on the W. C. T. U. throughout the world.

Misses Vincent and Cummings, Australasian organizers, have forwarded an interesting report for their first quarter's work. They have traveled 1,548 miles in New South Wales, held fifty-four public and seven women's meetings, taken 285 pledges, enrolled seventy-five members, and have visited by invitation the Warangesda Aboriginal Mission Station, holding two meetings which were attended by about one hundred natives, thirty-five of whom signed the total abstinence pledge.

WORLD'S WAVE CRESTS.

THE Newfoundland W. C. T. U. opened a new coffee house last summer which is doing fairly well.

A LIST of signatures to the Great Petition has come from the Azore Islands where it was circulated by missionaries.

Two sets of signatures to the Great Petition have been received during the past few months from Cairo, Egypt, the latest containing thirty-two names in Arabic and seventy-one in English.

A LETTER just received from Africa says: "Miss Ackermann had a great temperance demonstration in Cape Town as she was leaving. The largest hall was packed and crowded, and there has never been such a temperance demonstration in South Africa."

DURING a visit at Hokitika, New Zealand, Mrs. Miller, president of the Dunedin Y, organized a W. C. T. union with fourteen charter members. Headquarters have been rented and boys' and girls' industrial classes have been started by the young union, which has also a refreshment house in anticipation.

A LETTER from Mr. Chas. E. Bowen, of Melbourne, Australia, secretary of the Victoria Band of Hope Union, calls attention to the return of Mr. E. Tennyson Smith to England, via America. Mr. Bowen writes in high terms, praising the work of Mr. Smith for prohibition in Australia, and especially during the equal suffrage movement in New Zealand. He has also been instrumental in establishing branches of the Victorian Women's Franchise League in the principal cities of the colony.

MISS HELEN L. HOOD recently organized a concert (in co-operation with Mrs. Hooper, one of the secretaries of the B. W. T. A.) at the City Temple, Rev. Dr. Joseph Parker's church in London. Two thousand five hundred people attended, and women only were the managers. Mrs. Dr. Parker gave one of her charming recitations, and the music was rendered by the Cardiff Blue Ribbon choir which has won eight gold and silver medals at the Crystal Palace. Mrs. Eva McLaren, vice-president of the B. W. T. A., presided.

MAINE.

A SPLENDID CONVENTION IN AUBURN.

It was in the summer of 1874 that Frances Willard came to Old Orchard to make her first temperance speech in Maine, and organized the Maine branch of the W. C. T. U. At that time in response to Miss Willard's appeal for helpers, Mrs. Stevens gave herself to the temperance work, aided in forming the state union, and was elected its treasurer and three years later its president. That was twenty years ago, and now "the little one has become a thousand" (literally several thousand), and we have just closed the largest and what is generally considered the best state convention in our history.

Your reporter is in rather an awkward position, as she belongs to the hostess union, the convention having been held in the Congregational church, Auburn, the city which our senator described as the most moral of its size in the United States. And really there was little danger that the badge of snow would be contaminated with alcohol, for though the city contains twelve thousand people, there is absolutely no violation of the prohibitory law within its borders.

And how the delegates came in! Every county and city and nearly every town was represented. There were gray-haired matrons who had been in the ranks for nearly two decades, and never before so many young women. The Lewiston union kindly entertained twenty-five delegates.

The decorating committee had made the church attractive with British and American flags, potted plants and cut flowers. The word "Welcome" was conspicuous on the organ front, and the state and county banners lent their color and significance. Fine pictures of Lady Somerset and Miss Willard were placed on easels. Many mottoes adorned the walls, such as "Whatever affects humanity is a part of our work," "The Lord giveth the word, the women that publish the tidings are a great host," "The W. C. T. U. stands for no sectarianism in religion, no sectionalism in politics, no sex in citizenship," "Not by might nor by power but by my spirit, saith the Lord of hosts," (the motto of the Maine W. C. T. U.) and everywhere the white ribbon.

The session opened Tuesday morning, September 25, and we were favored with an entire week of glorious September weather. After a devotional service conducted by Rev. Sarah Taylor, of Rockland, the business of the day commenced. Our gifted corresponding secretary, who has faithfully served us for twelve years, for the first time failed to be present, but sent a loving message and her apology in the form of a very cunning picture of her two-months-old son. Her annual report was read by our all-around woman, Mrs. Adelaide Johnson, the assistant recording secretary, a woman noted for her ability to fill vacancies.

The address of the state president was booked for the first morning, but by general request was deferred till afternoon, as some of the trains bringing large delegations had not arrived. It was, as usual, full of pith and point, and closed with some very practical suggestions, the first of which was "take THE UNION SIGNAL."

The treasurer's report was then given and showed the society in good financial condition. The report of the Y Branch had been given by Miss Patrick in the morning and the closing hour of the afternoon was occupied by Miss Anna Cummings, superintendent of Y work in South Africa. Miss Cummings is a charming speaker, and presented a most vivid picture of the wine farming country and the work of her Y's in that difficult field. She was supposed to be addressing the young women, but was just as interesting to the grandmothers.

Tuesday evening was welcome night. First his honor, the mayor, welcomed the delegates to the city, then Rev. C. S. Patten gave a cordial greeting in behalf of the churches, most of which had omitted their weekly prayer-meetings to attend the convention. Last, but not least, came the sisterly greeting from the Auburn union, extended through the president. Mrs. Keyn of Farmington responded for the state. Then came an innovation which proved one of the most exciting features of the whole session—three-minute speeches by the county presidents, and sixteen brighter or wittier speeches have rarely been heard at one time. They were not reports of W. C. T. U. work, but each county president set forth the advantages of her county in a way which would have done credit to a real estate dealer. Mrs. Odlin, president of Androscoggin, the county in which the convention was held, struck the keynote when in enumerating a woman's wants she concluded: "And then we want the ballot." By the time all the presidents had spoken the audience must have believed that she told the truth. It was surprising what merits were revealed. The glory of Piscataquis was that it was the birthplace of Mrs. Stevens, York was the county in which Miss Willard organized the Maine union, Hancock claimed beautiful Bar Harbor, and Sagadahoc the great ship built at Bath.

Wednesday was a day brimful of business. Aside from department reports Mrs. Flora Wright gave a very interesting report as state organizer.

The hour from 11 to 12 Wednesday a. m. was set apart as a memorial service for departed members. A beautiful solo was rendered, and appropriate Scripture read, after which the roll of promoted comrades was called—twenty-seven names. The memorial service was followed by the customary noontide prayer.

A considerable portion of the afternoon was required for the election of officers. The report of the credential committee showed that there were 250 voting members, a gain of about fifty over any preceding year. The old board of officers was elected. President, Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Sarah L. Cram; recording secretary, Miss Clara M. Farwell; assistant recording recretary, Mrs. Adelaide S. Johnston; treasurer, Mrs. E. M. Blanchard. Mrs. Stevens was greeted with the Chautauqua salute and the singing of the doxology.

The speaker of Wednesday evening was Mrs. Helen M. Barker. Mrs. Barker made a most happy impression by her dignity, logic and wit, and there was an arrow in her quiver for every sophistry of the dram-shop sympathizers.

Thursday, September 27, was the last and greatest day for the session. Reports were read on franchise, legislation, peace and arbitration, systematic giving, Sunday-school work and other departments.

Mrs. Stevens had generously encouraged Miss Willard to attend six other state conventions where her presence seemed a little more indispensable than at ours, but her unselfishness had its reward in the coming of our beloved sister from over the sea, Lady Henry Somerset. Just at noon a happy little group received her, as without any attendant she quietly stepped from the train at the Auburn station. She was present during nearly all of the afternoon session, and it is not necessary to tell with what joy her earnest and kindly words were heard. She seemed so entirely one of us! As her sweet voice filled our ears and our eyes rested upon her pleasant face, we forgot all about her wealth and social position and saw only the noble and beautiful woman, the earnest Christian, the great-hearted philanthropist, the friend of our own Frances Willard. Lady Henry made a brief speech on being presented to the convention, and later in the afternoon spoke again in response to a very general request. Mrs. Gertrude Stevens Leavitt, daughter of our state president, presented the report of the resolution committee, and it was adopted without alteration.

Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman had been secured as the speaker for the last evening before we were sure that Lady Henry could be with us. It was therefore arranged that they should divide the time between them. Lady Henry made just such a winning and womanly speech in favor of woman's ballot as our good but conservative women not in the W. C. T. U. need to hear.

And how describe Mrs. Hoffman's speech! Her logic cut like a knife, while her wit set even the fat politicians laughing until they were purple in the face. Several gentlemen have since condescended to say that they never heard a man make so smart a speech, and of course that is their climax of praise.

NOTES.

Miss Henrietta Rice, a magnificent contralto, was present during most of the session, and rendered many beautiful solos. The two finest organists in the community gave their services for the evening meetings, and a good piano accompanist was also on duty.

It is Mrs. Stevens' opinion that no previous convention has been so well reported by the local press. Special invitations were extended by the state press superintendent who also has charge of the press department for the Auburn union, to the editors of the two dailies to attend the entire session. Notes on the convention were also sent to all parts of the state by the various delegates, in some counties every paper being thus supplied.

The devotional meetings were largely attended and as usual were of the deepest interest. They preceded each business meeting and prepared the delegates for the work of the day.

Several states besides Maine, as well as Africa, India and Norway, were represented among the numerous visitors. Miss Yates, of New Jersey, Mrs. Allen, of Nebraska, Mrs. E. B. Cheney, formerly president of the Rhode Island union, Mrs. Monroe, of Lynn, Mass., Mrs Allen, the first president of the Maine W. C. T. U., Miss Millet, a returned missionary from Bombay, India.

Mr. F. L. Quigley, editor of the Lewiston Journal, enthusiastically indorsed the suffrage movement, as did also several clergymen of Auburn and neighboring towns.

On the last evening Mrs. Fessenden, president of the Massachusetts union, sat with our own state president upon the platform.

A telegram came from Miss Willard addressed to the convention and its president. To the former the Scripture references, Isaiah 9: 3, and Psalms 14: 17; to the latter, Proverbs 31: 25, 29, 31. The press superintendent was instructed to send Miss Willard a suitable reply for her birthday. The message sent was as follows:

AUBURN, MAINE, Sept. 28, 1894.

To Frances E. Willard, The Temple, Chicago, Ill.:

Congratulations. Thanks for your message enthusiastically received. "Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity, therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows."

MAINE W. C. T. U. CONVENTION.

Another birthday greeting was sent Miss Willard by the four World's and National officers, who were holding a conference on the work of the society:

AUBURN, Sept. 28, 1894.

Frances E. Willard, The Temple, Chicago, Ill.:

Affectionate greetings. Fifty-five years of service to the world. Still to lead us on to victory.

SOMERSET,
BARKER,
HOFFMAN,
STEVENS.

The members of the convention were invited to visit the county jail, the young woman's reading room and the Auburn Home for Aged Women. At the last-named place a tea was served to the fifty delegates who were able to accept.

The president of the Houlton union invited the next state convention to that place, so it is probable that our next gathering of the clans will be in Aroostook, the garden of Maine, the land of the big potato. As few of us have ever set foot in that great northern region, we are already beginning to talk of the trip, only how grand it would be if we could go as full-fledged citizens, for our state union will then have attained its majority, and our state legislature will be in session this winter.

VIRGINIA.

TWELFTH ANNUAL CONVENTION.

Our convention was held in Roanoke, September 25–28. The First Baptist church, the largest in the city, was used for the meetings. It was beautifully decorated with potted plants, banners, white ribbon, etc. On the gallery front, in large letters on canvass, were the mottoes, "That our daughters may be as corner-stones, fashioned after the similitude of a palace."

"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."

"We wage peaceful warfare for God and home and humanity."

As usual the homes of the city were thrown open to the delegates in true Virginia hospitality. The first meeting was the accustomed consecration and prayer service held on the evening of the 25th. The convention proper was called to order by the president, Mrs. Jones, on Wednesday at 10 o'clock.

The mayor of the city delivered an address of welcome in the name of all the "good and right thinking people of the city." He was followed by Rev. L. G. Broughton, who welcomed the convention on behalf of the ministry—saying he was glad to have the opportunity to express himself on the side of right, and that his voice shall ever be given to denounce and overthrow the curse of this nation. No city was ever blessed with a better set of ministers than Roanoke. Such staunch, true temperance men! We were told that of the twenty-seven ministers there, all but four worked hard during the local option campaign for temperance, and only one of those was outspoken against it. In that campaign the city was carried for local option, but the whiskyites entered protest on some legal point and it is still in the courts and the saloons open. God speed the day when our laws, and those to enforce the laws, may be on the side of right! Many of these ministers attended nearly all the sessions of the convention and rendered valuable assistance.

Mrs. A. S. Meachem, president of the Stuart W. C. T. U. of Roanoke, extended welcome for the W. C. T. U's in a few well-chosen words. These welcomes were responded to by Miss Alice Williams, of Bridgewater, and Mrs. A. C. Wiley, of Norfolk.

The president's annual address reviewed the work of the field, and recommended raising the dues in local unions; also that this year we take up the department of securing homes for homeless children. This last recommendation was indorsed, and Mrs. Jones requested to take charge of this work. The convention also recommended that the annual membership fee in all local unions be sixty cents instead of fifty, as a few now have it.

The report of the corresponding secretary showed the membership of the unions of the state to be over one thousand.

The report of the Y secretary showed our Y's to be very active, and to have enlisted a large number of honoraries.

Mrs. Wiley, business manager of the Virginia Call, our state paper, reported the paper to be out of debt. While the paper has been in existence three years this is the first year it has been reported free of debt; it is also the first year under the present management. The convention expressed its gratification by singing the Doxology, and then extended a vote of thanks to Miss Kern, editor, and Mrs. Wiley, business manager, for their efficient services. They were reëlected.

Wednesday evening Rev. W. F. Hammer preached the annual sermon, taking his text from three portions of Scripture which together read, "Go forward, weary not in well doing. For this purpose was the Son of God manifested that He might destroy the works of the devil." This discourse was an admirable setting forth of the principles and methods of the W. C. T. U. in the light of the cross of Christ, closing with these words: "I say, go forward. The bonfires of victory encourage you to press on. Two hundred thousand children of the Loyal Temperance Legion are behind you, and as I look on these children I feel a thrill of prophecy that they will kill the monster Alcohol."

Thursday and Friday most of the time was taken up in hearing the annual reports of the superintendents of the various departments followed in the state. In the report on medal contest work it was shown that ninety-three silver and eight gold medal contests had been held through the efforts of the different unions the past year, while the year before it was thirty-nine silver and two gold, and the year before that but five silver.

In the purity department came the report of the Florence Crittenton Home in Norfolk, which has done such effective work in lifting and helping Godward the poor unfortunate sisters. Report on the Temperance Hospital showed that of the seventy-five dollars necessary to furnish the Virginia room, $62.20 had been raised. A collection was then taken and more than the required amount contributed.

Thursday evening Miss Belle Kearney, of Mississippi, gave one of her most eloquent addresses, which the Roanoke Evening World said "made a deep impression on the audience." At the close of this address a pretty ebony gavel, bearing the words, "The Temple; offered by the superintendent of Temple work to union sending largest contribution to Temple during the year," was presented by Miss Elizabeth H. Hoge to Miss Kern for Winchester W. C. T. U.

The banners were presented as follows: Y banner for largest increase in active membership to Riverton Y. Y banner for largest increase in honorary membership to Newport News Y. W banner for largest increase in active membership to Brugh's Mill W. C. T. U. W banner for largest contribution to state work to Lincoln W. C. T. U.

Friday, Mrs. Newton, state organizer, gave an interesting account of her work during the year, and she was unanimously reëlected. Miss Kearney, who had been at work in the state since September 1, reported five Y's and three W. C. T. U's organized.

The election of officers resulted in the reëlection of Mrs. Jones, of Norfolk, president; Mrs. Fristol, of Riverton, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Hoge, of Lincoln, recording secretary, and the election of Mrs. McCoy, of Riverton, treasurer. Mrs. Newton, of Staunton; Mrs. Meachem, of Roanoke, and Mrs. Moorman, of Lynchburg, were elected delegates to the National Convention.

Friday evening the main feature was the gold medal contest. The contestants came from Fincastle, Winchester, Staunton, Riverton and Roanoke. The medal was awarded to Miss India Grim, of Winchester, who recited "The Two Fires." While the judges were in consultation, Miss Kearney entertained the audience with a talk on "Young Woman's Work."

So ended one of Virginia's most successful conventions, to reassemble next year in Charlottesville.

NEVADA.

NINTH ANNUAL CONVENTION.

We met in annual session at Reno, September 18-19. It was good to be at the first consecration service led by Mrs Henrietta Skelton, National organizer. Nevada is greatly indebted to Mrs. Skelton for her work in the state. The following resolution will express but in part the esteem and appreciation of the white-ribboners:

WHEREAS, By the providence of God, and the appointment of the National executive, our beloved National superintendent, Mrs. Henrietta Skelton, has visited our field.

Resolved, That we have been greatly encouraged and strengthened by her work among the unions and at the annual convention.

Her wise counsels, ever stirring remarks and sisterly conduct have endeared her to our hearts as one of our grand leaders in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. We will ever continue to hope and pray that health and life may be given her to serve the cause of humanity and God in the world, and we trust the time may soon come when she will again visit us in her official capacity as National superintendent.

God bless all of the dear workers that have remembered Nevada with their presence and labors, our National President, Miss Willard, Mrs. Leavitt, Miss Burnett, Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens, Major Hilton, Mrs. Wells, Mrs. Skelton and others.

The reports showed the work of the state not only alive, but in some parts aggressive. Considerable interest has been manifested in the Demorest medal contest work. Reno, under the leadership of Mrs. Boyd and Gillman, taking the lead.

Social purity work has had an earnest leader in Mrs. Westlake; a large amount of leaflets have been distributed, three girls sent to rescue homes, one woman found a place for self-support in a Christian family and much personal work has been done.

The property purchased by the Reno union for future headquarters has been improved and made remunerative under the business management of Mrs. Spencer. The matter of immodest lithographs on the bulletin boards has been brought before supervisors with favorable results.

Through the evangelistic department literature has been used, talks given and personal work done.

Mottsville union, always doing, has been alive to the welfare of the beautiful and fertile Carson Valley.

Miss Clara Taylor, a Nevada state normal graduate, has organized and sustained a union, with the aid of her helpers, in the school district wheres he has taught near Lovelocks.

Mrs. Clara S. Wood, Nevada's beloved president, gave a most tender and helpful address. At her own request she was not reelected, but she is still with the white-ribboners in every good work. The election resulted in—president, Mrs. Lucy M. Van Deventer; recording secretary, Mrs. Lena M. Westlake; corresponding secretary, Mrs. M. G. Nash; treasurer, Mrs. Frances J. Crawford.

Mrs. Nash favored the convention with a model mothers' meeting. The best preparation for motherhood, and home treatment for the child's appetite were some of the topics discussed.

Dr. Eliza Cook, a successful physician in the state, presented an able paper on her state department, health and heredity.

Helpful methods of saving restless boys were presented by Mrs. Baker, of Virginia City, in a happy and telling manner. Mrs. George, of Gold Hill, was not able to be present, but remembered the convention with a kindly letter.

The convention voted to appropriate fifty dollars from the state treasury to aid in placing a state tablet in the National Temperance Temple. A number of subscribers were secured for THE UNION SIGNAL.

This resolution, adopted by the convention, will explain itself:

WHEREAS, The last legislature of Nevada attempted to foist upon the people an infamous lottery swindle by submitting to the voters an amendment to the constitution which, if adopted, would convert the whole state into a legalized gambling den, inviting to our midst an unscrupulous and undesirable class of parasites, corrupting the children and young people by initiating them into the worst forms of gambling, under the pretense of something for nothing; be it therefore

Resolved, by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the state of Nevada, in convention assembled, representing the mothers, wives and daughters of our commonwealth,

1. That we will do all in our power by voice, pen and petition, to defeat this infamous outrage.

2. That we believe it to be the duty of every voter that cares for the future good of the state, without regard to party or partisan politics, to see to it that no person is elected to the next legislature that is not pledged to vote against the lottery.

3. That we cordially invite the ministers of every denomination to call the attention of the people to this monster evil, by preaching and using their personal influence against it.

4. We implore the newspapers to cry aloud against this wicked confederation of all that is degrading.

5. That the secretary of this convention be instructed to furnish a copy of these resolutions to every minister of the state, with the request that they be read from the pulpit, and also to the editors of the newspapers for publication.

The next annual convention will find a welcome at Virginia City.

LUCY M. VAN DEVENTER.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

MRS R. M. WALLACE, recently elected president of the Woman's Relief Corps, is a staunch white-ribboner and a thoroughly trusty and admirable woman. She has been long a laborer in many fields of beneficence. It is a cause for rejoicing that she has been elected to this position, and under her supervision the Woman's Relief Corps will doubtless make a fine progressive record in the coming year.

THE W. C. T. U. of Fairport, Monroe county, N. Y., observed its seventeenth anniversary, September 21. The president was in the chair, and there was quite a large attendance from Fairport and neighboring unions. The former officers were chosen. Several excellent addresses were given, notably a most touching and suggestive one by Mrs. T. J. Bissell, of Rochester. The Fairport union is one of the oldest and strongest in Monroe county.

A MICHIGAN correspondent, impressed with the courage and self-sacrifice of some of our W. C. T. U. workers, closes a letter of warm commendation with these appreciative words: "They carry persistently, patiently, and effectually home work for five, seven, nine, as the case may be, doing church work, mission work and Sunday-school work until one wonders where they get their strength. But they bask in 'the sun's rays of God's strength' and they are fresh every morning and renewed every evening, each a veritable oil cruse, continually used but not diminished. Honor, all honor to the tireless workers of the W. C. T. U. Verily, they shall have their reward."

THE importance of having the subject of scientific temperance instruction brought before teachers' institutes cannot be magnified by our workers. Apropos of this a correspondent writes: "Our county superintendent was my guest last night, and as I had written him in regard to the matter he said: 'I would like to have one of your ladies but my program is filled for this year but something may occur that one of my lecturers will fail me. Please find out whom you can get, the terms, etc., and if any fail I will know what to do, and further, I will attend to the matter next year.'" Very often a reminder is all that is needed to secure due attention for this most vital subject.

ASSIST NATURE a little now and then in removing offending matter from the stomach and bowels and you thereby avoid a multitude of distressing derangements and diseases, and will have less frequent need of your doctor's service.

Of all known agents for this purpose, Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets are the best. Once used, they are always in favor. Their secondary effect is to keep the bowels open and regular, not to further constipate, as is the case with other pills. Hence, their great popularity with sufferers from habitual constipation, piles and their attendant discomfort and manifold derangements. The "Pellets" are purely vegetable and perfectly harmless in any condition of the system. No care is required while using them; they do not interfere with the diet, habits or occupation, and produce no pain, griping or shock to the system. They act in a mild, easy and natural way and there is no reaction afterward. Their help lasts.

The Pellets cure biliousness, sick and bilious headache, dizziness, costiveness, or constipation, sour stomach, loss of appetite, coated tongue, indigestion, or dyspepsia, windy belchings, "heartburn," pain and distress after eating, and kindred derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels. In proof of their superior excellence, it can be truthfully said, that they are always adopted as a household remedy after the first trial. Put up in sealed, glass vials, therefore always fresh and reliable. One little "Pellet" is a laxative, two are mildy cathartic. As a "dinner pill," to promote digestion, or to relieve distress from overeating, take one after dinner. They are tiny, sugar-coated granules; any child will readily take them.

Accept no substitute that may be recommended to be "just as good." It may be better for the dealer, because of paying him a better profit, but he is not the one who needs help.

Treasurer's Corner.

The Self-Denial fund has already reached $234, with more coming in every mail.

Our "all-around" president, Miss Willard, writes: "I send self-denial money for Anna Gordon and me; shall do without gloves and hack fares until the amount is equaled. I wish we could start a glove pledge for the treasury; if each would do without one pair in 1894–95 we should be on the crest of the wave in white-ribbon work the world around."

Mrs. Carse denied herself butter a week that she might give her denial money.

Mary S. Druillard saved her money by going without butter and fruit; says she will repeat the denial again before Christmas and send the amount then.

Mrs. M. G. Reider writes: "I enclose my Self-Denial fund, not obtained by self-denial, for I belong to the self-denying old mothers whose pleasure or duty it is to deny themselves almost everything for the good of the children, but this was saved by the kindness of a broad-shouldered, pleasant-faced German stage driver, who refused to take pay for a ride, and the thought occurred to me this will do for my Self-Denial fund."

Mrs. Laura S. Cole says: "We have put a self-denial box in the post-office, and the postmaster, by calling attention to it, raised this sum." So Uncle Sam has been helping us too.

H. May Richards, sending her money, says: "He that gives quickly gives twice."

Eliza A. Parmelee writes: "The money I send is the cost of a pair of gloves that I was about to buy, but denied myself, for I could think of no other form of self-denial just then."

Another sister gave up going to the fair.

These are only a few extracts; will give more next week, but this is enough to show that the self-denial work is bearing fruit.

RAILROAD RATES TO THE NATIONAL CONVENTION.

After a great deal of planning and work we are able to make a partial announcement of rates to the National Convention. All roads belonging to the Central Traffic Association will give us one fare for the round trip. Roads in the Western and Southern Passenger Associations will give a one and one-third fare. Those leaving the west and south purchase their tickets to either St. Louis or Chicago, and take a certificate to that place. That will grant them a one-third fare returning from that place to their homes. Then they purchase a ticket from either St. Louis or Chicago to Cleveland, round trip ticket, one fare.

The other associations I haven't heard from yet, but hope to in a few days. In next week's paper I will try to publish a list of roads centering in different associations so that each one will know what roads give the one fare and what ones the one and one-third. I worked hard to get a one fare rate through all the associations, but as I could not promise three hundred people to go over the Western Passenger Association they would not grant a one fare. I hope by another year, however, that they will see that we are a large and old enough organization for all Passenger Associations to grant us a one fare. In next week's UNION SIGNAL and the week following I will have further announcement as to rates.

Yours for a large convention,
MARY G. HAY,
Secretary Railroad Rates.

WHAT SIX Y'S DID.

The Y's decided to have a new kind of a Suffrage Contest.

Their mothers of the W. C. T. U. learned the pieces and the Y's held the contest.

Several of the ladies had never "spoken a piece" in all their lives before, but for the sake of the Y's they learned their pieces and stood bravely before the audience and "said their little say" to the great credit of the Y's and themselves.

And what were the prizes offered? Why, the first prize, of course, was "A Great Mother," and the second prize was the "White Ribbon Cookbook," to help the winner to do her cooking quickly, so that she might have more time for W. C. T. U. work.

The remaining contestants received those beautiful "White Ribbon Portfolios," and all went home with the feeling in their hearts that six Y's could plan and carry out a successful program, and when they said their mothers should, those mothers found they could. "It's dogged as does it."

A LETTER FROM MRS. JOHN G. WOOLLEY.

DEAR MRS. GROW:—The latest book from your publishing house is your greatest, and if I were asked what could our societies do to help the cause of womankind I would answer, put into every young mother's hands "A Great Mother," and if they read it with the sense of uplift I did the coming generation will be the better, the stronger, the wiser for it. I thought of Henry Drummond's words: "A few score more of centuries, a few more million of (such) mothers, and the genius of patience, cheerfulness, tenderness, sympathy and self-sacrifice will have rooted themselves in humanity."

Yours sincerely,
MARY WOOLLEY.

In its general conference at Greenville, Ill., the Free Methodist church decided not to ordain women.

New York pastors last Sunday preached strong sermons against gambling and in support of the proposed constitutional amendment to prohibit gambling.

PROBABLY no religious leader now living could find a warmer welcome in the hearts of the American people than General Booth, the devoted commander-in-chief and founder of the Salvation Army, now on a tour of inspection in America. Since the date of his conversion, 1844, when he was fifteen years of age, he has consecrated himself to the service and salvation of the people. And the complete record of that half century of faithful labor can never be written. In that time he has seen the Salvation Army overcome the prejudices of conservative Christians and become a mighty force in the evangelization of the world. It is the outcome of his London mission, and the evolution of the plan so successfully conducted there. That plan, simple and effective in its open air meetings; its continuous work; its utilization of converts; its popular features; and its use of women as speakers and leaders, has been sustained by the simple faith and charity of the leader in the name of the Saviour of men. We salute General Booth as the greatest military hero of the century—the commander-in-chief of the greatest standing army in the world whose march has ever been against the enemies that kill men's souls.

THE registration of women in Chicago, October 16, numbered 10,455. As this proportion to the number of women eligible to a vote was only as one to twenty, it appears on the surface a small registration, but considering that the whole proceeding is so new to women, and that there is no really important question upon which they are entitled to vote, the wonder is that it was so large. Then, too, there is still one more day for Chicago women to register, October 23 (and October 30 for the women in other parts of the state). With very few exceptions no discourtesy was shown by the registering clerks, and contrary to all surmises on the part of the brothers, no hesitancy in telling their ages was exhibited by the women. "How long have you lived in Chicago?" asked a judge of a venerable lady. "Fifty years, sir," was her dignified answer, "and I am glad that I have lived long enough to cast a ballot, and to do a humble part in upholding good government in the country I love."

DIFFICULTIES, which show the entrenched power of the gamblers in the judicial as well as executive departments of Chicago's administration, have arisen to defeat the ends of justice. When the first day's trial of the lawbreakers arrested through the efforts of Chicago's Civic Federation began, last Thursday, a successful method of eluding punishment was instituted by the head gamblers. When cases were called, some minor offender would at once claim ownership, put in a plea of guilty, receive a fine of $500, and then give sworn testimony that the other defendants had "nothing to do with the case." Instead of summoning owners and agents into court, and demanding leases to show by whom the gamblers' rooms were rented, a simple and legal proceeding, the state's attorney and judge fixed their faith upon the evidence of these accomplices, and judgment was given accordingly. It was not until after the exposure through the daily press of the head gamblers' device in "pleading guilty by proxy," that the judge ordered the bringing into court of the necessary witnesses and rental papers. Missing defendants and missing witnesses are the order of the day in the prosecution, and it remains to be seen whether the united force and cunning of evil can defeat the combined powers of the righteous workers in Chicago's Civic Federation.

A CERTAIN great newspaper says there are many who, while admitting that woman suffrage will not destroy the home, "do not see how it is going to benefit the ballot-box." We would call attention to one way whereby municipal politics, at least, would be benefited. It is a well-known fact—and one much commented on by the newspapers themselves—that a serious obstacle to good government is the apathy of a large proportion of the better class of voters concerning the duties and responsibilities of citizenship. Of the city of Chicago it is said that less than fifty per cent of its population went to the polls at the last municipal election. Now, if the promptness with which Chicago women are availing themselves of the voting privilege (small though it be) be taken as an indication, it will not be denied that the energy and proverbial conscientiousness of women as a class must tend very forcefully to stir up the lagging enthusiasm and prod the slumbering consciences of husbands and sons and brothers; so that while it is true that the "slum vote" may be doubled, it is also true that the "moral vote" will be increased nearly fourfold. For not only will the fifty per cent actual voters be doubled, but without doubt a goodly proportion of the "delinquent" fifty per cent will be added, and, of course, likewise doubled. Taking it for granted—because those who claim to know have repeatedly said so—that the bum-and-boodle element never fails to muster all its forces on election day, and regarding Chicago as a representative city, it is readily seen which side will gain by woman suffrage and why it will "benefit the ballot-box."

Two New England states, Massachusetts and Maine, and several western states, notably Illinois, report an increased membership in the W. C. T. U., larger than they have ever before reported, notwithstanding the unequaled financial stress and distress of 1894. Live presidents make live societies. What woman has done woman can do. We expect a similar report from every state president, for any arrears existing now can be made up before the 16th of November, and that fact will be gladly reported by our corresponding secretary at the Cleveland Convention.

DR. PARKHURST, of New York city, is slowly but inevitably coming around to a favorable view of woman suffrage. When he first started on his righteous campaign against Tammany, he explicitly stated that he did not care for the assistance of women, remanding them to "their proper sphere—the home," without whose "sacred precincts they could do no good." But after a year's experience, the good Doctor finds he cannot fight the hydra-headed Tammany evil single-handed and is actually calling out the ladies, as witness this press dispatch:

NEW YORK, Oct. 19.—There were nearly two thousand women in Cooper Union this afternoon. It was the largest mass-meeting of women this city has known. It was an admirable illustration of the extent of the women's movement in politics and was held to protest against Tammany rule. Abbie Sage Richardson, Marie Huntley Elwell, Mrs. Clara Bell, Mrs. George Gunton, Alma Calder Johnston and Mrs. Margaret Ravenhill were among those on the platform. Mrs. Josephine Shaw Lowell, the president of the league, presided. She came upon the stage with Dr. Parkhurst on one side and Mr. Leavitt on the other. They all made speeches denouncing Tammany.

The political corruptors of New York may well tremble now that the women are aroused. As Breckinridge now is, so will Tammany soon be, a thing of the past. The novelist, William Dean Howells, put it well when he said: "There is not so much difference between home housecleaning and municipal housecleaning as some people think!"

THE opponents of woman suffrage in the state of Illinois having attempted to frighten women from their privilege of voting for trustees of the state university by declaring that neither ballots nor ballot-boxes would be prepared for their use, November 6, the state chairmen of the Republican and Democratic parties have issued a circular denying these assertions. The circular reads: "The law conferring the right to vote for trustees of the state university upon women was passed upon the 19th of June, 1891, and the Australian ballot law upon the 22d of June of the same year. It follows, then, that the first law could not have provided in detail the method of voting for women. The second law does provide in detail the general method of voting for electors. We would recommend, in view of this fact, that the county clerks throughout the state provide separate ballot-boxes and a sufficient number of ballots printed according to the form of the Australian ballot for women voters. If there is any question as to the right of women to vote the time to settle that question is not now by refusing the opportunity to vote, but in determining in proper legal contest for the office, should there be any such contest, whether the votes were legal or not. The refusal to provide the facilities, or to permit women to vote, should the courts finally hold they were entitled to do so, in separate boxes and by the form of Australian ballot, would render those liable who refused the facilities; whereas, if they were not legally entitled to vote no harm could be done by the voting, as it would be corrected by the final adjudication of the courts thereon. However, we must presume, by the action of both Democratic and Republican parties at their respective state conventions in nominating women for these positions that they have the right to vote, and the facilities therefor should be provided." The contract for the separate ballot-boxes for women has been let and the boxes will be ready for election day.

SONG OF THE WHITE RIBBON.

BY ELLA GILBERT IVES.

Air—"Sparkling and Bright."

The ribbon white is a badge of light,
And a symbol ever glorious;
For it speeds the day when the right shall sway,
And the truth be all victorious.

Our ribbon fair we will always wear,
Till the day-star rises, tender;
And the glowing sun of the Righteous One
Floods the earth with healing splendor.

The ribbon white is a bond of might,
Many hearts in one uniting
To the great white throne, in whose strength alone,
All the foes of home we're smiting.

Our emblem pure with its promise sure
We will heed, all sin forsaking;
For we all belong to a kingdom strong,
And the world for God we're taking.

The ribbon white is an omen bright,
A triumphal hour foretelling;
When shall roll along all our rills of song,
Into hallelujahs swelling.

Our symbol true we will bind anew
On our hearts and lives; and never
Till we reach the goal of the victor soul,
From this pledge of power dissever.

A TRUE STORY OF ONE UNION'S WORK.

BY ELLA ROCKWOOD.

It was in a western Iowa city of perhaps five or six thousand inhabitants that the following incident occurred, and I shall tell it as it was told to me by a little white-ribbon woman who has helped to bring the W. C. T. U. of that city in numbers from six charter members up to nearly two hundred at the present time.

It was my privilege to hear her tell while on a visit East of the methods employed in gaining members, both active and honorary, and I could but think that if all white-ribboners were as active in working for their union as these western sisters are how much more might be accomplished.

"Yes," said she, "we have had a hard work to do in our town. It is not far from the state line, and enforcing the law is a great deal harder to accomplish than farther inland. But we never got discouraged, and whenever we found out that a new dive or groggery had started we formed a committee and visited it. Of course we all wear the white ribbon, and wherever we go everybody knows what it means. When we arrive at our destination we ask to see the proprietor, and tell him that we have come to request him to close his saloon, also for permission to have prayer. This is usually given, although sometimes it has been denied.

"We have succeeded in closing up some of the worst places in the city. The trouble is to get officers that will enforce the law.

"Our meetings are well attended, and we always have a number of gentlemen present. We give help to any deserving person who is trying to lead a better life. Work, whether the applicant be male or female, is always provided somehow. Pecuniary aid has also been given when circumstances seem to require it.

"Sometimes a man who is in the habit of drinking but whom we have interested in the meetings, will absent himself from them, and whenever this occurs whoever has him in charge states what is known regarding the man, and unless he is at work we promptly hunt him up and bring him to the meeting. We always try to keep track of our men and let them know that we are interested in their welfare, rendering them any assistance which may be necessary. Usually they repay us by improved conduct.

"I remember one young man in particular who attended the meetings. He had come West for employment, leaving home and friends far behind. He fell in with rather a rough set, and although not at all a bad young man, he took to drinking. He was invited to our services and forsook his old associates after coming a few times.

"Our young people rallied around him and he became a staunch temperance man and a church-goer. After a few months he left us for another place where he expected to obtain employment.

"Reaching his destination he was disappointed in this, and after spending days in fruitless search for work, with money nearly gone and no friends, he was on the point of despair. One day, after a long tramp with the usual unsatisfactory result, no work to be had, a couple of ladies called at his boarding place, introducing themselves as members of the W. C. T. U. and invited him to their gathering.

"He went, and at the close arose and stated his case plainly to those present. He was alone in a strange city with little money and no work. As soon as he had finished they flocked around him with offers of assistance, and before he left the room he had the promise of all the work he could do for several weeks. Steady employment was soon found for him and from that time his welfare was assured.

"Upon inquiry he learned that the ladies of the W. C. T. U. he had left had written the union of the place where he was going, asking them to look him out and give him any assistance of which he might stand in need in his new home. What a grateful letter he wrote back to us thanking us for our kindly interest in him, an interest which his conduct has sustained."

Does not this true sketch remind many of us that we are somewhat remiss in our duty to "lift up the fallen, cheer the faint and lead the blind"? Are we not too much engrossed with the theoretical in our work thereby neglecting the more practical branches of the work, such as securing members and keeping a hand on our brothers?

Not many years ago in one of our most populous states, a young man, remorseful at past misdeeds, impoverished by drink yet willing to work, applied to the local W. C. T. U. for help. They were temperance women, and who, thought he, would be so willing to help a fallen brother as they? He applied to them for work, anything by which he might earn an honest living, and was told that that was out of their line. They were sorry for him but really could give him no aid. If they heard of any one who wished to employ such a man they would let him know, etc., but they did not see how they could help him.

That man to-day has a very bitter feeling toward the W. C. T. U. and will never forget his treatment by them. He is now a sober man, but no thanks to those women who might by a little well-timed assistance have earned his lasting gratitude.

MORE ABOUT THE GOTHENBURG SYSTEM.

II.

BY KATE LUNDEN.

Happily the forests did not last forever. They began to thin out, the pocketbooks of their owners grew slimmer and the liquor deluge began to abate. The scenes were shifted and a new actor appeared upon the boards—the evangelist or colporteur, as he was called in those days. I was at least twelve or thirteen years old before I had ever seen a Christian. It was said that there existed a few of them up in the back woods of the parish to which I belonged—strange, peculiar people who were in jest, though very appropriately called "holy," but we children had never seen any of the species and it was with the keenest curiosity we awaited the advent of the much maligned and persecuted men who spoke of salvation. A wind of the Holy Spirit had already swept over other parts of the country and now it reached the secluded mountains. Of the effects we hardly need to speak; it was one of the strongest factors in the diminution of the consumption of liquor—and after the colporteur came the temperance agitators.

When I left home in 1881 the forests were ruined, a good many of the farms were mortgaged and the people began to sober up. After an absence of six years I paid a visit to my native heath. The whole aspect was changed. Religion, temperance agitation, poverty and local option had done their work. Many of the farms were in new hands, but thrift had returned to the community and the plow had superseded the vandalizing axe. Revelry was at an end; some had been converted, others had joined temperance societies, and still others kept sober partly on account of the influence of the first two classes, partly because liquor was only to be had at an inconveniently long distance. But of the Gothenburg system I heard nothing.

THE GOTHENBURG SYSTEM A FAILURE.

This is the history of only a small part of the country, it is true, but it applies equally to other sections where the same conditions existed. Of the cities I let others speak. But it is simply astonishing that any one can claim that the decrease in the consumption of liquor is due to the Gothenburg system in the face of the fact that through local option almost seven-eighths of the population of Sweden is under prohibition. And as a further proof of the inefficiency of the famous system can be cited that in Gothenburg, its birthplace, the convictions for drunkenness have increased one hundred and twenty-five per cent since 1880, and in Stockholm we find an increase of nearly seventy-five per cent since the system was introduced there in 1876.

PROFIT TO THE SHAREHOLDERS UNDER THE GOTHENBURG PLAN.

It is argued that the liquor companies under the Gothenburg system have no other profit than the interest on the money invested. At present the Swedish banks only pay about three per cent interest, and the six per cent received under the Gothenburg plan can, therefore, be considered a good investment, even if the subscribed sum is actually paid in, which is by no means certain in many instances. If six per cent interest is paid on money still held by the individual subscriber of course his profit is so much larger.

THE SYSTEM NOT A PROMOTER OF TEMPERANCE AND MORALITY.

Any system that tends to make the liquor traffic respectable can never be regarded as a temperance measure. The Gothenburg plan has succeeded in transforming the low groggery, which a self-respecting man would not enter, into "a well-ordered eating-house," where, under the cover of taking a meal, even the posing "moralist" can indulge in a regulation drunk, and where the young men graduate from the lunch counter and soda fountain into the class of professional tipplers. In the name of temperance and morality, with the most prominent men of the communities as directors or shareholders in the companies, the system has entrenched itself behind a wall of respectability, which is in fact one of the most formidable bulwarks of the liquor traffic, and which will prove of greater resistance to the advancing temperance host than all the barricades placed in their way by the undisguised liquor men.

THE "RIGHT KIND" OF TEMPERANCE PEOPLE NOT IN FAVOR OF IT.

But is not the Gothenburg system recommended by avowed temperance men? Yes, and so is high license recommended in this country by Christians, brewers and saloon-keepers alike. But does it promote temperance because church members vote for it and deacons and elders sign the applications for license? One sentence in a private letter from a prominent temperance worker in Sweden may settle this point. Says he, speaking of the Gothenburg system: "The right kind of friends of temperance are not satisfied with it." Small wonder that they are not!

DECREASE IN CONSUMPTION OF LIQUOR DUE TO RELIGIOUS AND TEMPERANCE MOVEMENTS.

Among a population of sixty millions the influence exerted by a few hundred thousands of religious and temperance fanatics may not be noticeable, but in a country with less than five million inhabitants they are likely to cause some commotion. The Grand Lodge of the Good Templars of Sweden is now the largest in the world, including 59,150 members, not counting the five thousand members of the Junior Temples. The Blue Ribbon society has added 10,000 persons to its ranks since last year, and has at present a membership of 63,000.

The order of Templars rolls up a membership of 30,000, and the National order of Good Templars reports 17,286 members. Thus we find nearly 170,000 active temperance workers in Sweden to-day, exclusive of those who have not joined any society. As an example of the progress of temperance principles in Sweden may be mentioned that out of the 7,000 inhabitants of the city of Ystad not less than 700 are Good Templars.

When we tread on purely religious ground it is more difficult to give exact figures. When people get converted in Sweden they leave the church as a general rule; still there are exceptions and we cannot count them out, who, loyal to time-honored institutions refuse to shake off the yoke of the dead state church. I will not, therefore, venture to give an estimate of professing Christians in Sweden to-day, but the fact remains that through the influence of them and the temperance societies, both in the home and at the ballot box, the consumption of liquor has decreased in spite of the Gothenburg system. Regarding Vermland, the province where my observations were made, a writer, well conversant with present conditions, has recently said: "No parish is to be found at present where a free Christian congregation is not either organized or under organization, and every kommun (township or parish) has at least one temperance society." One parish recently dedicated its fourteenth "mission-house," as the free evangelical meeting houses are called, and from that community a small army of ministers, evangelists and missionaries has gone forth, not only to different parts of Sweden and this country, but also to heathen lands.

LOCAL VETO IN NORWAY.

In Norway both the religious and temperance movements have been somewhat slower, but a local veto bill was passed this summer with the significant and hopeful provision that all persons above twenty-five years of age, regardless of sex, have a vote on the question. What this means to Norwegian homes we white-ribboners can best estimate. It may be added that the Norwegian Total Abstinence Society counts at present 103,025 members, and the Blue Ribbon Society, 5,500.

Massachusetts postponed the introduction of the Gothenburg system. She did well. If the old Bay State will consign the much discussed bill to the fate which has so often befallen real temperance measures it will be still better; it does not deserve to live. If some experiment is to be tried in the direction of restriction and regulation it does not speak well for American ingenuity and common sense to import a system which, during almost thirty years' existence, has succeeded in keeping the land of its nativity in the front ranks of the liquor consuming countries of the world.

SOME OF OUR WOMEN.

Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson.—Editor of the "Silver Cross" and Secretary of the Order of the King's Daughters.

VII.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

Many years ago a dear friend of mine, Miss Nina Gray Lunt, of Chicago, wrote me while she was journeying in Palestine, that she had met a regal woman equally endowed with beauty, intellect and heart, and that she knew I should admire and love her. In 1868 this pleasure was vouchsafed me, and I shall never forget the delightful day we spent together at Rest Cottage with these two gifted and accomplished women who had recently returned from their long and varied journeyings. In that same year I went abroad, and later on when traveling in the Holy Land, one of the sweetest bits of verse that came to me and which I was wont to repeat while riding on horseback through the valleys and over the hills of that hallowed country, was a poem of my friend's friend that I had learned by heart from the Ladies' Repository:

"In the fields that heard the voice
Of Judea's Shepherd King,
Still the mourners may rejoice,
Still the shepherds shout and sing."

Returning home in 1870 our acquaintance was renewed, and all through the busy years in which her ready pen has wrought so well, Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson has been to me a figure "admired, beloved," and to the ever-widening world of women, who like herself, were helping to build up not only a new concept of womanhood in the minds of the people, not only to furnish the comforts of life to dear ones dependent on them, but themselves to develop womanly character by the grace of God and the help of all good people. Of New England parentage, birth and training, Mrs. Dickinson has invested most of her rich and beautiful years in New York city. There is hardly an enterprise rooted in Christianity and blossoming in the air of charity and culture, to which she has not lent her willing and ingenious hand. The white ribbon movement has had in her a steadfast friend, and her occasional presence in our National Conventions has been an inspiration. Those who heard the address at once witty and wise that she gave at our Detroit convention in 1876 will readily agree that she is as rarely endowed for the platform as for the press.

Mrs. Dickinson has made several journeys abroad, and lived for some time in Rome, where she lost her husband, one of New York's bankers and prominent men of business. In early life a teacher, she realized how inadequate had been the provision in times past for the education of girls and women, and she became a careful student of all the methods provided by our own schools and colleges, as well as by those in other countries, for the education of women. She realized, as few have done, that much that is offered to women in the way of education does not produce a really educated womanhood, and in a day when the facilities that are now provided were to a great extent denied she set herself to advance by every possible means a knowledge of the better systems of training for those who might come after her. A genuine student herself, and a genuine teacher, perhaps no woman in our country is better remembered and better beloved by those students who have at some time been under her care. Her latest work in this direction lay in Denver, Col., where in its university of eight hundred students, she held a full professorship in English literature. Such an estimate was placed upon the value of her services, not only as an instructor, but as a social and moral influence, that her chair was one of the first to be fully endowed, and when ill health obliged her to resign this position the chair was named for her, and she was made the Emeritus professor, and holds now the lectureship in English literature.

In philanthropic lines her interest has always lain in those fields that promised the greatest good to the greatest number. She was at one time the secretary of the woman's branch of the American Bible Society, and specially interested in its extensive work of visitation in the homes of the poor. She held for years the presidency of the Woman's National Indian Association, for six years the editorship of a magazine devoted especially to the interests of the "Shut-in" sisterhood, and an associate editorship with Edward Everett Hale in his Lend A Hand magazine. From the day of its organization she has been the general secretary of the Order of the King's Daughters, and the editor of its magazine—The Silver Cross.

Much literary work in various directions has filled the few leisure hours of a busy life, and Mrs. Dickinson's name is well known, not only as a contributor to many of our prominent journals, but a writer of fiction, poetry, editorials, and biographical and critical reviews. Her stories have, nearly all of them, found their motive in the condition of the needy classes. Her first novel, "Among the Thorns," deals largely with the problem of the poor. The second, "The Amber Star," (first printed in England) took up at a date when these things were still only talked about and dreamed about by philanthropists, fresh air plans and country homes and refuges for children. "The Fair Half Dozen," treats of methods of amelioration of the life of invalids, and "One Little Life" conveys her thought as to the true significance and meaning of the order of the King's Daughters.

Mrs. Dickinson edits what we are inclined to call the handsomest among the many papers conducted by women —The Silver Cross (New York city)—and is constantly occupied in speaking and working for that beautiful order, in the success of which she has been from the first a prime factor. During most of her life her home has been in New York city, and she is now delightfully established there with her friend, Miss Kate Bond, vice-president of the King's Daughters.

The latest enterprise with which Mrs. Dickinson's name has been associated is the Patriotic League of Young People—an organization than which no other is more needed in our heterogeneous population which must be fused into a sense of national loyalty and enthusiasm greater than has been possible in these years of unbounded and ill-considered immigration from every country under the heavens. It is neither for the good of those who come nor those who find here their native land that this union should be mechanical as it is now, and nothing can change it into a truly chemical union in which the original parts are completely merged in a new and better compound except Christianity, intelligence and a devoted and well-founded patriotism. No woman is at present doing more to produce this result than our queenly American patriot, Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson.

Long may the beneficent activities of this noble brain and heart continue, will be the loving prayer of tens of thousands who read these friendly lines.

SOME OLD TABLE-TALKERS.

II.

BY MARTHA YOUNG.

A contemporary of the great Johnson, Dr. Erasmus Darwin, was a teetotaler, intolerant of the use of wine. In spite of mistakes of effusiveness, rudeness and graver ones his philosophy led him into, we find recorded of him some success in literature and much success in his profession. He perfomed cures accorded marvelous at that date. These his advanced ideas on anti-alcoholism wrought for him. At Anna Seward's tea-table, surrounded by his adorers, his teetotalism seems not to have cut short at all the flow of his wit,—somewhat rough and boisterous though it was.

Farther back to the days of James and the fated Charles, John Selden appears giving good advice like Johnson's practice of abstemiousness, but whether the man learned and brilliant enough to win for himself his titles, "Monarch of Letters," "Le plus grand homme que l' Angleterre ait jamais en pour les belles lettres," and the like, followed the teachings of his own good maxims, we cannot declare.

Yet brightest of all in our list of table-talkers is Selden's contemporary, but junior, the poet, Edmund Waller. Not so fortunate as Johnson and Selden, he found no Boswell or Milward to chronicle his bon-mots and his flow of brilliant sentences. Lacking one familiar renconteur of his brilliant conversation he found many to jot down, in letters, journals, histories, stories and sketches, and bits of the wit of "water-drinking Waller." Bishop Burnet, of Waller in Parliament, declares: "He was the delight of the house and said the liveliest things of any among them."

Aubry sketches our temperate courtier in pleasant style: "His full eye, fair, thin skin, oval face, somewhat of an olivaster, sipping his glass of water and keeping the table of gay, wine-bibbing roisterers laughing at a play of fancy finer and sweeter and more flashing than any they could draw from all their 'cheering glasses.' "

Clarendon did not love him yet bore witness to his mighty fund of pleasantness, good cheer and humor. In all the records of his passages of wit we find but one rejoinder rankly bitter, that to Dorothy Sidney, the Sacharissa, to whom he had erst sung so sweetly, and all whose singing could not move her to love. That one bitter word we must forgive him, for doubtless the wound made in his heart by those large, dreamy eyes of the lady of Penshuest was deep and hard to heal.

We have record of his ready wit when in the closet King James showed him the portrait of the Princess of Orange. We have recorded memorial of his fetching, glittering speeches that all the house made ready to enjoy with eager expectancy. At table, where wits were wont to shine most bravely, we are informed by Johnson himself—(for when even Waller's tombstone was become dilapidated Johnson gathered up the fragments and became his biographer)—"he was enabled, by the fertility of his mind, to heighten the mirth of bacchanalian assemblies." Not to quaff with all the table in those old days was almost an insult, and Seville is recorded as declaring: "No man in England should keep him company without drinking but Ned Waller."

As a poet he gave the English tongue lines that are alive for us to-day; sweet as then reads now his song, "Go, lovely rose," and his lines to Amoret. Like an unsheathed sword on a bed of roses wet with honey-dew lies in the midst of the volume of "Waller's Sweetness," his strong panegyric on his cousin, Cromwell. At this distance it would be more pleasant to the sight to find him either wholly with the cavaliers or wholly with the Roundheads, but unquestionably in his own day he was glad of his connection with both. From eighteen to eighty odd he lived in the stir of the great world of politic's fashion: at eighteen he has his seat in Parliament, and again at four score.

In one of his speeches to that body we find him declaring: "Religion ought to be the first thing in our purpose and desires." As he "stands before kings" he declares his belief in no uncertain terms, for on one occasion the Duke of Buckingham having spoken profanely before King Charles, Waller addressed him thus: "My Lord, I am a great deal older than your grace, and have, I believe, heard more arguments for atheism than ever your grace did, but I have lived long enough to see there is nothing in them, and so, I hope, your grace will."

In the very old age that came to him, the gift of heaven, doubtless delivered to him by the white hands of temperance, to whom he was unfailingly true, he moulded into his "Divine Poems" his regrets for "all that is past," his hopes of that Best Beyond. In his own lines let him draw the picture of life's peaceful departure:

"The soul's dark cottage, battered and decayed,
Lets in new light through chinks that time has made
Stronger by weakness, wiser, men become,
As they draw nearer to their eternal home,
Leaving the old, both worlds at once they view,
That stand upon the threshold of the new."

A son of the poet, an eminent doctor of laws, was one of the commissioners for the Union, Stephen Waller by name. Of this family planted thus in America it would be interesting to know if any are to be found among the earnest workers of the great temperance movement of to-day.

RAILROAD TIES.

BY JOHN G. WOOLLEY.

I have just finished reading "A Great Mother."

It is the best of all the "mother" literature that I have read.

Two of its statements are tremendous if true,—neither one of them has even a faint odor of panegyric but each bears on its face the homely but conclusive verity of being commonplace in the narrative.

Miss Willard says: "I never heard her complain."

And Madam Willard, as the last hawser of human skill is thrown off and she pushes out into the narrow roadstead whitherward heaven is, says as calmly as one says good-night in perfect health, "You have praised me as if it were part of your regular work."

O mothers! O daughters!

I believe the first, for I knew her very well, this woman who never complained, and have a packet of letters of hers all about a sorrow she had, not one of those whelming calamities which one grand sun-burst of heroic faith can quell and guild and glorify. But an impudent, rasping, carking, treacherous, senseless heart-corroding thing, but in them and over and under them all is a kind of Zodiacal shimmer of an inexplicable but incorrigible confidence that persists after nightfall until the day dawns.

And I believe the other too, for I am told the gravest fault the author has is praising people as if it were part of her regular work.

If I could make the bride a present at every wedding in the world I would give her "A Great Mother."

A Personal Word.

To My Brothers Who Can Vote:—This is the way it looks to me: Those who have most helped the age into which they were born have always been protest-ants. Without their protest public evils would have been endured with that pathetic apathy which has always characterized the average-minded man and woman.

"It has been so, and it is so, and it will be so always"—this is the formula of mediocrity from the beginning. But there is always "a saving remnant," possessed of more iron in the blood, more granite in the backbone, more keenness of eye, more mellowness of heart, and this remnant always protests, saying: "It is so, but it shall not so remain, and we are the ones that propose to put a stop to it."

Then these protesters "get together" and turn air into syllables, ink into inspiration, and prayer into purpose, and when they have thus formed a rallying point the larger number of people gravitate toward that new and vital center, and by the united strength of protester and convert the evil is banished, at first from thought and affection and at last from custom and law.

But in a Republic each man is an integer in God's arithmetic by which the problem of progress is worked out, and he can in no way serve the age he lives in so potently as by protesting through his ballot, for that ballot is his proxy in the governing power.

The liquor traffic is an organized system for benumbing the brains of our people so that they do not perceive or are not aroused by the fact—universally admitted by judge and jury—that seventy-five per cent of all the crime and ninety per cent of all the pauperism comes of strong drink.

But the best and brightest-minded men do perceive, and have been aroused by these considerations, and they owe it to their brother-men and sister-women to express that perception and stirring of the heart in the most effective way open to them, and that is by the ballot.

Therefore, in the name of God and Home and Native Land, I, who have no vote but who fervently wish that I possessed that weapon of power, beseech you, on behalf of the women that I represent, to vote the ticket of the Prohibition protestant on the 6th of next November.

In this earnest hope believe me,

Your loyal friend and sister,

Frances E. Willard.

CONSISTENCIES.

Dear Union Signal:—In your issue of September 13, I find the following question: "What would you think of a member of a union recommending or advising another member to use whisky in her baby's milk? It has been done in our union. Please let a perplexed union hear your opinion of what should be done in the case," and I venture to ask one similar to it: "What do you think of an 'out and out' party Prohibitionist who is seen just after dusk drawing home in a little child's express wagon a case of bottled beer?" and another question, "What do you think of another good man, an officer in an Evangelical church, as a last resort in a serious sickness using whisky to brace him up?"

As for me I hold it the grossest inconsistency or else it may be Pharisaic ignorance. With me the home dealer who patronizes the saloon loses my trade.

Of course all of these questions, like "May a W. C. T. U. member pick hops?" can be passed to a nicety of conclusion and answer, and yet all of us should endeavor to be consistent in practice and criticism. "I will eat no flesh for evermore, that I make not my brother to stumble," is a safe principle to follow.

Miss Willard's testing at Chautauqua of "the pure juice of the grape" tendered to her by a teetotaler, did not injure Miss Willard, but some are stumbling over her apparent, though not real, inconsistency. We have this, however, to comfort us that the things which seem to be inconsistent to our finite minds will never debar us from the kingdom of Christ.

The woman who picks hops knows better than I whether she is violating her pledge, and that Prohibitionist with his little load of beer at nightfall will be judged by that Judge whose judgment is true. "I judge him not." But the question which I clip from The Union Signal is well answered. Great harm is done everywhere to the cause of temperance by just that silly, ignorant, unpardonable method of "doctoring the baby's milk."

An aged mother said to me not long since, "I never used wines or strong drink in any way myself, but I always gave it to my children," and to my mind that fact answered the question why she, a good Christian, should have four sons who are drunkards. And another mother who resorted to the same thing with her children, had two sons who dare not return from Canada on account of their crimes committed under the influence of liquor.

I am glad that Christian conscience is being stirred up on some of these delicate questions. May there be a complete settlement of every difficult problem, not by what Miss W. or Mrs. A., or Rev. So-and-So says, but by what the great Teacher has said. W. W. Cole.

AN INCIDENT BY THE WAY.

Dear Union Signal:—Self-denial week slipped away before the important and oft-recurring question, "How can I earn one dollar?" was satisfactorily answered. Then, being ashamed of my selfishness, I decided to eat no butter until the desired amount was saved. During this period the Rest Cottage family was invited to the birthday dinner of a charming little damsel, one year old, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Howard Hill, of Evanston. Her mother, Annie Green Hill, is "one of us," having been a prominent Y in Philadelphia before her marriage. As we were seated at the bountifully furnished table I noticed that I was not served with a golden butter ball as were the others, and a laugh went around the table when the attention of all was called to the shining piece of silver which was all my butter plate contained, for the hostess had been informed of the manner in which I intended to "deny" my mite into existence.

I am glad to connect the self-denial fund with this birthday celebration, for it gives me the opportunity to emphasize the importance and privilege of making all anniversaries and feast days for the little ones an object lesson in the life of total abstinence and purity. When the dessert was served little "Eleanor," radiant with joy, was placed in her high chair, and as the guests arose to drink her health in pure, cold water, they demanded a toast from the lips of Miss Willard, who was the honored guest. Looking at the birthday cake with its one burning taper, she said it reminded her of her mother's, with its eighty tapers, representing her well rounded life. And with a motherly look of love at "the child in the midst," she blessed it in the following words:

"'How far that little candle throws its beams!
So shines a good deed in a naughty world.'

"May this one bright taper grow into a group of eighty or more, and this brave little soul hold the light up higher, higher, for pure habits and a pure home, when all of us who bless the child to-day have passed on into the gleaming light of life eternal."

Yours for redeemed homes,

Elizabeth P. Gordon.

RIPPLES FROM ANTWERP.

Dear Union Signal:—Turning my steps from The Hague I naturally bent my course towards Antwerp, the Mecca for me! For in the providence of God I had there been enabled to have signed the Polyglot Petition by the sixth International Peace Congress, representing twelve different nations of the earth.

My first day here was Sunday, but there is no New England Sabbath here. In the morning the people attend mass; then disperse for the rest of the day to enjoy themselves. There is music on the grand plazas. There are bands of different societies parading the streets, excursions, wine drinking, music and games.

Stores are open, people are buying and all secular scenes are being enacted the same as on week-days. If King Leopold, who is doing so much for "Dark Africa" (as it is called), would only enforce a law in his kingdom that the Sabbath should, as far as in his power to command, be observed as the "Lord's Day," it would add, not only to his temporal, but I think to his eternal glory.

It is not thus desecrated in Holland. There is much more outward observance; more people abandon their pursuits of the week, and one can see in Leyden, Delft and their environments, the impress of that religion that afterwards took root in our own glorious Republic, forming the basic structure of Puritan orthodox faith, as firm and as enduring as the rock of Plymouth.

"The American Eagle" in Antwerp has every reason to screech, spread its wings and (flying back to our Capitol dome) demand national prohibition from the president and Congress at Washington. With a thrill of delight, seeing the "stars and stripes" floating in the breeze from the top of a building at the Fair, I entered, expecting, of course, to behold a grand array of the productions, both agricultural and mineral, as well as of manufactures from my native land. It was from the exhibition in this, the "American Building" at the exposition, that the European countries and their visitors here were to have presented to their view the vast mineral wealth, farm products, beautiful as well as practical manufactures; and mention there made of the almost unlimited capabilities of the United States.

Instead of my expectations being realized, what did I behold! The most prominent exhibit in the whole of the American building was a pyramid of wine and whisky bottles dignified with the sacred emblem of a canopy of carved wood, and, surmounting the whole, a beautiful American eagle with wings spread as if, symbolically, to fly through the continent and spread the news. "This is the American exhibit!" My whole soul rebelled within me at the sight. When women have the ballot such an exhibition and desecration of our national emblem will not be seen.

At the Exposition my experience as a journalist was most amusing. Through the kindness of Hon. Stanilaus Haine, our American Deputy Vice-Consul, I was given a "press ticket." Having this potent piece of paper that possesses the influence of opening doors that usually only money can swing ajar, I wended my way to the different exhibitions that demanded another fee besides that of the general admission to the grounds. One of the ticket sellers at these portals, a woman by the way, looked at me with astonishment. After taking a mental inventory of my appearance (for she evidently had never before heard of such a role for a woman as that of journalist), she hesitatingly asked me in very good French, "Madam, is this your husband's ticket?"

"No," I replied, "it is mine. I am a journalist." I think my accent revealed the fact that the French was not my native language, but she let me pass on, probably thinking that a "woman journalist" was another foreign exhibit! It was evident from her manner that it is a product not indigenous to the country of Belgium.

If I had any doubts on the matter of pen-women being a curiosity here they would be dispelled by a similar occurrence that happened soon after the above incident. Again I presented my press ticket instead of cash. The woman at this door assumed a more imperious manner. She also looked amazed to see a woman in the ranks of the press.

"Madam," she said, "that is only for men."

"Well," I replied, "this ticket was given to me by the American Consul, and as I am rightfully entitled to it, I will, although a woman, go in."

There is a potent influence in an allusion to the office of the American Consul, and to a statement that you are a citizen (?) of the United States. It was this, I think, that persuaded the woman to let me enter where none but "men" can hold press tickets.

I met in my meanderings among the various buildings and curiosities some three or four transplanted exhibits from our beautiful Dream City on Lake Michigan. Here in Antwerp is the Crystal Cave, reconstructed on Belgian soil, and on the top of its stalactites, mysterious chambers and musical subterranean fountains, is placed the historic mammoth California tree that was a depot for a wine exhibit in the Horticultural Building at the World's Fair. Here is also the Swiss Panorama of the Alps that took the prize at Chicago.

But of all these well remembered scenes that greeted me like old friends from the beautiful White City what is most worthy of recital is my experience at the United States Submarine Diving Exhibit, that was so extensively visited by thousands who flocked through the Midway Plaisance last year in Chicago.

With the same cordial greeting that is kindly extended to visitors in the Western states the man at the door said: "Won't you come in?"

"No, thank you," I replied; "I saw this exhibit last year in Chicago."

"Oh! but a woman is going to dive here."

My interest was immediately awakened. "I am a member of the press; can I go in with this ticket?" "Certainly," he replied. He knew what that meant! He was evidently from Chicago.

At once mounting the stairs I saw a genteel, bright spirituelle face preparing to be locked in that quaint helmet worn by submarine divers. "I'm all right," she said, as the man hermetically sealed the visor of the peculiar headgear of this young lady.

In she plunged. Down into the depths she went! Some coins went in after her. From the De profundis she was to first gather them all and then announce the date of one, the inscription on which a visitor had memorized before he threw it into the depths after her. As I saw her vanish from sight and then heard a few gurgling noises and, after some few minutes a whistle announced through a tube she had reached the bottom, I felt relieved. She still lived; but would she ever come out again alive! Would she not die from absolute fright when thus encased and submerged? Who could she be, I thought? I had never heard of any American woman doing such a thing. Had some one on the continent, while women in America were climbing to intellectual heights, made this submarine advancement?

Just as I was about to ask this question a gentleman who, like myself, was an anxious observer, said: "She is an American lady. She is from Chicago." That accounts for her bravery, I thought. Chicago once said, "I will" and did it. She crystallized in the White City a thought so beautiful that in looking at the scenes there created, one could almost fancy herself in Paradise. Chicago has climbed the heights of world wide fame and now for the first time, as I believe, in the history of the world, one of my sex has plunged to the depths below, and she is from Chicago. These were my reminiscences whilst my unknown American compatriot was picking up the money she was finding at the bottom of the water.

Soon through the tube came the announcement that she had not only discovered the coin whose date was noted, but she told to the party on terra firma that it was No. "48."

As she was again coming to the surface my heart almost stood still, for the rubber tube that conveyed air to her became twisted. Would that cut off her supply, I thought, and would she smother to death in that encasement? But no, she is on the surface; she sits again with the others on the side of the watery depths. She is unlocked; is dismantled of her shoulder and head-gearings.

I waited for her to recover herself and then spoke to her. She merely laughed and said, in a sweet, ladylike manner: "I thought I could do it, and I have."

I asked her to tell me about herself, I wanted to write it in an article that was going to Chicago. She modestly asked some one else to tell me the weight she carried, which is one hundred and eighty pounds; her helmet alone weighing thirty pounds and her boots forty pounds. Her name is Miss Evelean Kelly; born in Chicago, and always has lived there. She is proud of her city, and says she believes she is the first woman who has successfully tried submarine diving in the history of the world. Miss Kelly is only twenty-two years of age, and is not corpulent in figure, but rather slight and delicately built. Yesterday was the first day that this young lady has made a public appearance as a submarine diver. She is able to stay under the water four hours.

All hail to Chicago! Is there anything her women cannot do? A distinguished journalist, since I came abroad, said: "It is a manifest destiny that Chicago shall be a port city as well as an inland city and the center of literature and arts of the republic." I think I may add it is also noted for its good and brave women.

HOW SHALL WE VOTE?

EDITOR UNION SIGNAL:—I was asking myself and others the question, when I found it answered in one of your editorial columns of October 11, under the title "Woman's Suffrage in Illinois."

This article is masterful, timely, sweet and kind in all its conclusions, and covers significant points to which we women of Illinois must rise now and in the future.

It seems we shall be handed on November 6, nine or twelve names to choose from. There will be three in a column, and three or four columns, in some such arrangement as this:

.....	.....	.....	.....
.....	.....	.....	.....

There will be one woman's and two men's names in each of these columns, except the Prohibition, which will have two women's and one man's name.

Now the question arises in a woman's heart, not a Republican's heart, nor a Democrat's nor a Prohibitionist's—for a woman is not yet supposed to be a partisan—"How shall I vote? Who will best serve the mighty educational interests of our state in its greatest place—namely, the state university?"

One bright young man answered this question by saying, "If the women consider voting as a matter of conscience, which they probably do, they will show to the men they had at least brains enough to entitle them to enfranchisement if they vote for all the women (since three out of nine would be none too many to have on the board), or if they cumulate all three of their votes upon one good woman." This was a straight speech, wasn't it?

A good, wise preacher of the gospel answered me thusly: "Women, no doubt, are more interested in actual educational matters than men, and I shouldn't be surprised if a good many men would vote for three women, and if women do so it will not be surprising, neither will it be 'knifing the party,' nor be a 'startling coalition,' for women are supposed to also be more interested in the candidates and the matter in hand than in the partisanism of it all."

Another broad, true man, said: "My wife is perfectly indifferent to the matter, but if you women know what you are about you will go ahead and elect your woman or women, that is my opinion."

There are nine trustees to be elected. If the women and men are all whipped into party line as they are supposed to be when the day comes, there will be elected eight men and one woman on the board of trustees. But what if matters should get mixed a little?

According to Politics for Young Americans (all women, old or young, are young Americans at present) "there is a party in a free country always, composed of the citizens who think for themselves, who look at the strife little moved by partisan appeals, and on election day deposit their votes for the man or the policy which, on the whole, appears to them likely to best further the good of the state." Again: "This party is the terror of professional politicians, and often their confusion. . . This party punishes inefficiency, corruption, or maladministration of any kind, scratches tickets," etc., etc.

So we are to do our level Christian womanly best on voting day, going straight to the ballot box after having registered October 23 in Cook county and October 30 in the other counties of the state, inquiring of God and of mankind and of self, the best and noblest way, and casting the three highest votes possible, free from any party whips whatsoever.

WOMAN IN THE EARLY CHURCH.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Having read with great interest Dr. Bushnell's reply to the editor of the Outlook on the "final authority" in the family, I wish to add a few lines in further illustration of what Dr. Bushnell says concerning woman in the early church as apostle and presbyter.

In Alford's notes on Romans 16: 7, there is quoted from Chrysostom these words: "To be apostles at all is a great thing; but to be also of note among them, mark what an encomium it is."

That Junia, the woman, was an apostle, was the view of Tholuck also, and as to the other idea, that she was only held in high esteem by the apostles, Alford says: "Had this latter been the meaning, we should have expected some expression like 'in all the churches.' (II Cor. 8: 18.) For St. Paul to speak of any persons as celebrated among the apostles in this sense would imply that he had more frequent intercourse with the other apostles than we know that he had, and would besides be improbable on any supposition."

As to the title, presbyter, in I Tim., 5th chapter, Chrysostom, as quoted by Alford, says the word, as used in verse 1, does not refer to the office, but simply means aged men and women; but in his note on verse 9 he quotes Chrysostom as saying that the women here spoken of were enrolled as a special order aside from that of "deaconess," set apart for ecclesiastical duties and supported by the church.

Alford then goes on to say: "They are also mentioned as the band of widows, as presbytresses, as having precedence of rank; i. e., such as corresponded in office for their own sex in some measure to the presbyters; sat unveiled in the assemblies in a separate place, by the presbyters, and had a supervision over their own sex, especially over the widows and orphans, were clad in widows' vestments, and ordained by the laying on of hands."

This institution of the early church, which was abolished by the eleventh canon of the council of Laodicea, is sufficiently affirmed by many, four or five, if I remember rightly.

We are slowly returning to the status of the early church, and in the next generation, if not sooner, there will be "neither male nor female," and woman will fill, as of old, the office of presbyter and deacon, when qualified, the same as her brother and her equal man, and the "final authority" will be Christ.

A QUESTION FOR OUR CATHOLIC FRIENDS.

EDITOR UNION SIGNAL:—In the large stone church now being completed on Carpenter street, about a block east of the junction of Chicago and Milwaukee avenues, on the last two Sundays, a fair has been held during the afternoon and evening. Attracted by the presence of a crowd on both sides of the street, and, after reading the sign, by curiosity as to what is permissible at a fair on Sunday, I entered the building.

On either side of the entrance were two bars at which beer was being sold. Adjoining these were tables with lottery wheels, with boxes of cigars as prizes. On the platform, and to the right and left, were other lottery wheels, with crucifixes, statuettes, canary birds, etc., as prizes. A large crowd was in attendance, apparently all of one nationality, and that Polish, if I mistake not.

It would be interesting to know if Archbishop Feehan is disposed to sanction what Bishop Watterson has prohibited in his diocese!

Stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving for the faith of the gospel.—Phil. 1:27.

We have entered into a compact with the publisher of the "Columbia Education Series," which we trust will be alike profitable to the Temple and the unions which take part. The unions are asked to sell these most valuable articles: "The Temple Edition of the Ladies' Household Repository," which every housekeeper in the land ought to possess. (The price of single copy is 50 cents.) The "Educational Checker Game," price 75 cents. This is a most delightful and helpful game for children and adults as well. "The Game of Pixies," much the same as the well-known game of "Brownies," which gives unending pleasure to young people, price 75 cents. It will be seen from the above that these three articles, singly, foot up $2. The publisher, however, offers the three for $1 if sold to one person by our white-ribboners.

The Columbia publisher says in his circular to unions: "These games and the 'Temple Edition' of the 'Ladies' Household Repository' are secured by patents and copyrights and will be devoted exclusively in this offer of the publisher for the Temple Fund and the local unions. Each union shall reserve 20 per cent of the sales secured by the friends of the local union. Orders may be taken at once. It will be necessary that each union secure at least one hundred sales at $1 each to economize on the express charges. As orders are sent in, arrangements will be perfected by Miss Sara G. Johnson, financial secretary of the Board of Temple Trustees, The Temple, Chicago. Will you not start the ball rolling at once? Please arrange for ten or more ladies, or friends, to secure ten orders each. Secure the amounts promptly and then arrange to complete the sales."

One-half of the profits of the enterprise will go to the Temple Fund.

A two-cent stamp sent to Miss Johnson with request for explanatory documents of plan will receive immediate attention. All the articles above mentioned will make useful and beautiful Christmas gifts.

We are anxious that as many unions as possible which have money in hand for the Temple will send it to us before the last of this month, that it may be reported at our annual convention.

Otoe county, Neb., W. C. T. U., sends $52.79 to be credited on its $100 pledge. The following unions contributed to this amount: Hazel Dell, $17.25; Douglas, $10; Palmyra, $10; Delta, $10, and Zion church, $5.54; $2.20 of this last amount was from the L. T. L., Company A, First Division. Harmony union has also contributed $10, to be credited to Otoe county.

Amherst, Mass., W. C. T. U., has sent $13, completing its $100 pledge; South Boston, Mass., W. C. T. U. sends $25, on a pledge for $100. Another Massachusetts union, that of Bolton, Worcester county, sends $10, on a pledge of $100, to place the name of Mrs. Mial Davis on a tablet in Willard Hall; Danvers, Mass., W. C. T. U., sends $50, on its pledge of $100. Sarah C. Moore, superintendent of Temple work in Champaign county, Ohio, sends $25, on the $100 pledge. She writes that one union having six members gave her $4.50. In another small union in this county a lady raised $2 by selling yeast. The union at Geneva, Ohio, sends $15, and Mrs. Estelle J. Purdum sends $15, from Mrs. M. A. Davis, of Delaware, Ohio, which is to be credited on the memorial afghan. The members of the Ashtabula, Ohio, union, held a mite-box social a few weeks ago, and the result was a contribution of $42.60 to the Temple. The program was made very interesting, and we would commend a mite-box social to all our unions.

The Hygiene W. C. T. U. of Boulder county, Colorado, sends $10 on its pledge of $100. Mrs. Antoinette Burt, of Plainville, Ct., sends $15 from her union for "our beloved Temple." She writes: "I cannot tell you how I have wished our union's name could be engraved on the marble panels in Willard Hall and now that our union has taken up the work I shall do all I can to bring about this result. I feel it is God's work and that the Temple will be paid for." I wish we might have such an enthusiastic worker in every union that has not already pledged itself to do something for the Temple. Mrs. Sue E. Hoyt, treasurer of the union at McMinnville, Tenn., writes as follows: "I take a great deal of pleasure in inclosing to you a post-office order for $35, to apply on the $100 pledge of our W. C. T. U. We are so glad it is half paid. We had an experience social, with an interesting literary and musical program, which was enjoyed by all. Cream and cake were also served, on which we netted a nice amount." She also writes that their union would like to raise the entire indebtedness on the Temple, and while they cannot do that, they are enthusiastically planning to complete paying their $100.

It is understood, of course, that only a very small part of the Temple contributions are acknowledged in the Temple Items column. We often have letters asking that contributions be acknowledged here, but it is impossible to recognize every gift in our limited space. The Temple Receipts found on the last pages of THE UNION SIGNAL contain an account of every donation, great or small.

All persons sending $1 to the Temple will receive the beautiful Columbian souvenir. Any individual who fills a mite-box during 1894 will receive a solid silver Temple souvenir tea-spoon. This, however, does not apply to persons filling boxes for unions; they receive the Columbian souvenir. All money orders and checks should be made out in the name of William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, the Temple, Chicago, Ill.

OPEN THOU MINE EYES.

BY MRS. H. F. THOMAS.

Open my eyes, O Lord, that I may see,
My vision is so blinded by earth's glare.
More faith I need, more confidence in Thee,
A constant sense of Thy protecting care.

The mountains, Father, look so rough and steep,
And crags o'erhang the path where I must tread,
The shadows are so dark, and pitfalls deep,
I cannot walk unless my feet are led.

Oh, take away the dimness from my soul;
Let in, O Lord, a ray of heavenly light,
That backward from my vision clouds may roll,
And my weak faith be changed to sudden sight.

Some wondrous thing, O Lord, from out Thy law
Some truth, that hidden deep I fail to know;
Some vision like Elisha's servant saw,
To cheer me in the way that I must go.

With opened eyes, O Lord, I shall behold,
Some truth I fail to-day to understand,
Some mystery—the clearer light unfold.
Perchance earth's shadow changed to angel band.

And yet, dear Lord, if it is best for me,
To wait for clearer vision till the end,
Give me such faith that I need not to see,
And o'er my path let unseen angels bend.

AT THE MERRY-GO-ROUND.

BY MINNIE E. BIRD.

Its little engine was puffing furiously at the foot of the hill, near to the entrance of the cattle exhibit and on the way to the grand stand. It was the little girl in the pink sunbonnet who first attracted my attention to it. She was not a particularly attractive child, someway little girls in pink sunbonnets seldom are. They always look to me as if they had eaten fried potatoes for breakfast, and as if all their expansive power had turned to bigness. This one was simply frantic to get to the merry-go-round, and she was pulling her grandmother along by the hand, as she stopped for an instant to speak to a neighbor. The contrast between the two women was notable. The grandmother was thin, wrinkled, stooped. Her rusty black dress was skimpy and short, and her bonnet defied classification, but it was her hands, hard, knotted, discolored, that made your heart ache. The neighbor was plump to stoutness, and you knew instinctively that her fortune was plump of its kind, also. Her comfortableness was convincing.

"Marthy's girl, I reckon," she said to her companion, looking after the eager child.

"Yes. Pity Mis' Dixon's got her now. She'd ought to had trouble enough with her own family. Oh! well, I don't care if it is."

The last remark was delivered in the pitch of extreme emphasis and extreme exasperation to the tow-haired youngster who had been for some time announcing at her elbow that "that horse over there was exactly like Ben's." Don't you know that the man who gets the scoldings is next to never the man who merits them? Men (including women) are not ill-natured per se as a rule, even the most snappish of them; it is the sum total of innumerable small "whips and stings" that finally bursts forth in a lightning flash of temper and a torrent of angry words. If we could analyze an anger to units, we should wonder that the storm did not sweep us off the face of the earth, and add daily to our morning supplications: "Let me not be the bearer of the last straw."

So, though I appreciated the injustice of the rejoinder to the boy, I saw he was, unfortunately for him, only "the last straw." The woman's hat was half way round from its moorings, imparting a most rakish and unseemly air to the owner; her hair was coming down and flying wildly about a dusty, tired face which had received its ablution not later than four a. m., when she had risen and packed the lunch and gotten in readiness those five boys who had been tumbling tumultuously about her heels all day long, (every individual of them tow-headed, which was in itself a continuous exasperation!) and driven twenty miles in the market wagon in order to reach the fair by seven o'clock. Then, too, she had been going about half the day holding up the overskirt of her dress, while the dress itself had trailed along the ground until it was stiff with dust and mud for several inches. That always makes a woman furious; even when she hasn't learned the hateful fact, she feels there is something bad a-brewing.

As I said, the one who receives the outpouring is scarcely ever the one who deserves it, and is often, oddly enough, the most innocent and the least able to "fight back." That is an odd trait of human nature. A four-footed animal will attack another of its own size or even a larger and fiercer, as readily as a little one he knows he can whip, but men are always respectful toward a possible superior, and spend themselves upon what they are sure they can master.

Pink sunbonnet had found a seat on one of the prancing horses, by the side of a great gawky youth with the kindest heart and the truest eyes, and a touch as gentle as a woman's. The old woman stood watching with a smile, for her heart was glad with the child's gladness. She rode fast once, faster than this, but she seemed to creep. It was when she hurried to the city in answer to a tear-blotted scrawl from the child's mother, who had found the country lanes leading to the village store and post office, and the village church, too narrow a round, and fled from it to the city; and then after the long silence which brought more wrinkles to the mother's face than all her years of toil, she found the great city itself too narrow to hide and hold her, and she sought the greatness of eternity, trusting most of all that her soul might flow out into its great tide as her pretty, pale face flowed out in the dark waters of the river and be "no more, forever." And there was no one to tell her that greater and vaster than eternity itself, was "the love of God and the grace of our Lord, Jesus Christ."

But do you suppose the old woman heeded the giggling of the two sprightly girls behind her who had "an eye for the ludicrous"? She knew vaguely they were merry at her expense. It stung, but it was a very little sting. The babe she found where she was directed to go. Her babe lay in the Potter's Field.

The tow-haired troop had come up and were waiting for the merry-go-round to stop.

"That's Jasper Dean's got little Marthy Dixon," said the mother of the troop. "It's odd what a store he sets by that child."

"Not so very odd," returned her comfortable companion, "Jasper thought a heap of her mother."

The merry-go-round ceased and the riders dismounted, save Jasper, who took little Martha round a second time. A new company scrambled into the seats, the engine puffed, the band played and they went whirling off. Ah! round and round they go, faster and faster. Hair is flying, ribbons stream out, childish fingers clutch the seat.

Faster, faster! Ahead of the days and nights for once, faster than the seasons and the return of the tax collector. Who has not stood beside the swift stream of the days and felt himself borne down with it? You can't keep up with the books you meant to read, the subjects you wanted to investigate, the walks and talks and visits you had planned. Your winter scheme bore date October, 18—, perhaps. The snows came and the cold crept through all the woolens you could wear, and you were stiff and chill, and an hour slipped away here and an evening there, or a long, damp, dark afternoon upon your pillows. Perhaps the door bell rings less often now, and certainly the announcements in the evening paper of lecture or theater or concert have less interest, sometimes are hardly read and you smile at the thought of amateur performances, and the days go on and on faster, faster, faster!

The church bell tolls and you watch them carry down the aisle the old friend whom you used to visit and who they said, missed your coming. (The days fly by!) Houses that you used to haunt are filled with strangers and there are strange faces on the streets, at church, wherever you go. They seem nice but you do not care for them or seek to know them. Thanksgiving is scarcely past until it is Thanksgiving again.

What quantities of mail Christmas used to bring you! and what long lists of names you wrote, and how carefully you prepared your shopping lists and balanced the estimated cost with the actual sum in your purse! And what a weariness it all is now! (Listen! How loud the stream roars and how frightfully swift it is.)

The very old names that formerly set your heart a flutter—pray Heaven you have not forgotten! sound like names that you have seen somewhere in a book.

The robins come, and you look out to the green hill where you were going to walk so many times and never did. There is no one to walk with you now, and you feel if you could but creep back into the pleasant peace in the circle of the fireshine among the dear home faces you would ask no more of life. You wonder, wonder now, what is the outlet of the rushing stream, and oh! you wish they would not ask your photograph.

The stream is moving more slowly; a snatch of song floats to you,

"When peace, like a river—"

You heard it once in your own parlor when the shutters were closed and the air was heavy with tube roses.

Slower, slower yet, as if—Ah! the merry-go-round is slowing up; it stands still. The occupants descend with chaff and chatter, and hurry in different directions

Somebody twitches your sleeve.

"Missus, buy a bunch o' matches?"

Zanesville, O.

A COSMETIC.

When people are looking out for appliances to create and preserve beauty—for this powder, that stain, this effacer of wrinkles, that maker of dimples—they miss a great factor in the business they have on hand by not looking within, and learning that our emotions are, after all, either our best beautifiers or exactly the reverse.

There are no lives without trouble. Man is born to it, we have been told. But the trouble can be made twice what it is by constant worrying and brooding over it. In every nature, too, are depths into whose pool many of these troubles can be dropped. In fact, this brooding arouses a nervous action which the old domestic nurse tells you stirs the bile, and the natural result of it is that the whole countenance will often look, after such experience, sallow and yellow and bilious; there will be no lustre in the eye the circulation has been interfered with; there will be an unpleasant hectic flush on the cheek, and even red and angry patches on forehead and throat; while it is well known now that chemical researches have found that the perspiration in anger is of a virulently poisonous quality.

Whatever form the disturbance takes, there is serious interference with the kindly and healthy processes of life and the complexion suffers from it. For it is absolutely sure that bad temper breeds bad humors, and that we can as readily poison our blood with them as with external application or internal absorption. And even if one does not cherish a state of feeling to interfere with the functions so seriously, dwelling on the perpetual pin-pricks instead of covering them out of sight will make fine lines in the smoothness of the forehead, lift the eyebrows querulously, drop the corners of the mouth downheartedly, and not only spoil present beauty, but hasten future ugliness. And it does not require vexation, dark brooding, or worry alone to injure the good looks. The person who allows herself to be bored where she is not interested in what goes on about her gains a lacklustre of eye and skin and feature that is akin to disfigurement, for the eye grows dull and heavy, the features fixed and immobile, the whole air and aspect without alertness or grace.

To cultivate interest is to cultivate vivacity, expression, intelligence—things that are beautifying, that quicken the blood, and send it freely to the surface. And if one cannot cultivate an interest, but must needs be bored, then to cultivate the power of abstraction so that one may be busy with pleasant thoughts while stupidity drones on, is to cultivate cheerful lines upon the face, and so keep the blood as well as the intellect from stagnation that it is no extravagance to say that sweet temper and good humor are among the best cosmetics known.—Harper's Bazaar.

CHRIST AND THE ÆSTHETIC.

Some one asks how is it with those other harmonies in which we are always finding delight, the fitnesses which the æsthetic nature recognizes and loves—was there anything of those in Jesus? Had He anything of what we call the sense of artistic beauty? It is not an easy question to answer in a word. We may say that He who was walking on to Calvary had no time in the intenseness of His moral life for art and its luxuriousness; . . . that the æsthetic nature . . . only waited in Him for some circumstances to develop it. We may say that though Jesus made nothing of artistic beauty, yet His religion has made much of it, and out of Christianity the highest artistic life has come. . . . But still the great impression of the life of Jesus must always be of the subordinate importance of those things in which only the æsthetic nature finds its pleasures. There is no condemnation of them in that wise, deep life. But the fact always must remain that the wisest, deepest life that was ever lived left them on one side, was satisfied without them. And His religion, while it has developed and delighted in their culture, has always kept too strong habits with reference to art which showed that in it was still the spirit of its Master. It has always been restless under the sway of any art that did not breathe with spiritual and moral purpose. Never has Christian art reached the pure æstheticism of the classics. And in its more earnest moods, in its reformations, in its puritanisms it has always stood ready to sacrifice the choicest works of artistic beauty for the restoration or preservation of the simple majesty of righteousness, the purity of truth, or the glory of God.—Phillips Brooks in "Influence of Jesus."

WHEN will men learn that a harvest gathered before God's hour is come, is not a harvest but a devastation; that the man stunted in growth is no longer a child, but a dwarf; that, by refusing to bury the dead we render them not immortal but a source of death to the living.—Mrs. Charles.

AN OCTOBER SONG.

Who has no sunshine in his soul
  May call the autumn sober;
But boys and girls with pulses wild
  Will love the brown October.

Along the glade and on the hill
  The ruddy oaks are glowing;
And merry winds are out all night,
  Through all the forests blowing.

The yellow moon is clear and bright,
  The silent upland lighting;
The meadow-grass is crisp and white,
  The frosts are keen and biting.

A shining moon, a frosty sky,
  A gusty morn to follow,
To drive the withered leaves about
  And heap them in the hollow.

Hurrah! the nuts are dropping ripe,
  In all the wildwood bowers;
We'll climb as high as squirrels go,
  And shake them down in showers.

When heads are gray and eyes are dim,
  We'll call the autumn sober,
But now, with life in every limb
  We love the brown October.

AUTUMN FASHIONS.

The maple owned that she was tired
  Of always wearing green;
She knew that she had grown, of late,
  Too shabby to be seen!

The oak and beech and chestnut then
  Deplore their shabbiness,
And all, except the hemlock sad,
  Were wild to change their dress.

"For fashion-plates we'll take the flowers,
  The rustling maple said,
"And like the tulip I'll be clothed
  In splendid gold and red!"

"The cheerful sunflower suits me best,"
  The lithesome beech replied;
"The marigold my choice shall be,"
  The chestnut spoke with pride.

The sturdy oak took time to think—
  "I hate such glaring hues.
The gillyflower, so dark and rich,
  I for my model choose."

So every tree in all the grove,
  Except the hemlock sad,
According to its wish ere long
  In brilliant dress was clad.

And here they stand through all the soft
  And bright October days;
They wished to be like flowers—indeed,
  They look like huge bouquets!

GRANDMA'S LETTERS ABOUT SYRIA.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Raheel was a little black-eyed girl about eight years old, and she lived in a very poor, one-roomed house in Bhawdun, Mt. Lebanon. She came to our mission school and was very earnest to learn to read. Her father was sick a long time, and he, too, wished to learn to read. We visited him every day and taught him to read the third chapter of John. It was very slow work, but as the spring came he got better.

When the harvest time came in June he went over into the Bakaa, that is the wide plain between the mountain of Lebanon and the eastern mountain of anti Lebanon.

This wide plain is called Celo Syria and is a very great wheat field. Halleel (Raheel's father) was now able to go over there to reap in the wheat fields. His wife and Raheel and her brother and sister went also, to glean after the reapers, just as in the days of Boaz and Ruth.

After some weeks the harvest was over and one evening Raheel stood again before our door. Poor little girl, she did look so sad, and you would hardly have thought by her looks that her hair had been combed, or her face washed since she left, and her blue cotton dress hung in rags.

"Well, Raheel, have you all got back and how did you make out in the gleaning?" I asked.

"The harvest was poor and we did not get much. We are poorer than we were before," she answered sadly.

Right here something seemed to say to me, I think it must have been the good spirit of Jesus, "Take this child and train her up for Me."

I gave Raheel some markook bread and some rice and a little semin to carry home, for her mother to make a good supper for them all, saying, "Raheel, take these things to your mother and come in the morning and see me again."

I spoke to my husband about the matter and we concluded to offer to take Raheel—her father had learned to read a little in the Testament and we hoped he had become a real Christian, but her mother was still rough and uncouth; we feared she might make trouble if we undertook to educate Raheel.

Shall I tell you about the markook bread? It is flat, thin bread; looks like a leather apron, and is baked in a tunhour in a hole dug in the ground about the size of a barrel and a jar without a bottom sunk in it.

The dough is kneaded up with warm water and leaven, and when the whole is leavened, is made over into balls the size of an orange and all put into a big pottery pan with lots of flour between. Then the tunhour is heated with dry weeds and sticks and coarse grass, till the jar is very hot.

It takes two women to bake; they both sit on the ground at the top of the tunhour. One takes a ball of dough and pulls it and spats it till it is about as big as a dinner plate, then the baker woman takes it on a big cushion and pulls it and spats till it is as large as the cushion, then she lowers it into the hot jar and gives it a hard spat till it sticks to the hot jar. The jar will hold three of these thin cakes.

She pulls off the first one and lays it on a clean straw tray—and if you and I come along they will urge us to eat a cake. "Oh, do take a loaf for the blessing!"

The poor, dear people of Mt. Lebanon! We went over there to carry them the bread of life. Many of them have taken the bread of life which Jesus gives. Next time I will tell you more of Raheel. I must tell you that I go every Sabbath afternoon now, and meet a colony of Syrian Arabs from Mt. Lebanon, in this city, and they are so glad to have me come and teach them and talk to them in Arabic—their own language. Your loving

A CHINESE school is not a bit like the school you go to. Each boy has a whole desk to himself. His seat is a stool without any back. The boys sit and shout out their lessons, and when a room full are all studying together the noise is dreadful. The teacher sits and looks on. He calls a boy up to recite a lesson. The boy lays his book on the teacher's desk, turns his back, and shouts off what he has learned. Then the teacher gives him another part to learn, and he returns to his place and joins again in the hubbub.—Selected.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Had you taken a birdseye view of Chicago's lake front on the afternoon of October 10 you would have seen a lively sight. This day was celebrated as the anniversary of good Father Theobald Mathew, who led many thousands to sign the pledge and lead better lives a half century ago, and some of whom are still living to testify to the unselfish work of this good man.

But he had a better testimonial on the day I speak of in the marching lines of children, big and little, boys and girls, who have adopted the badge of abstinence and will carry out the precepts of purity and sobriety throughout their lives.

It was a never-to-be-forgotten sight, nothing like which has been seen in the World's Fair city since that bright day in November, 1890, when the temperance children marched on the city streets and sang, "Rise, Temple, Rise," and when the corner-stone of the Temple was laid.

This celebration of Father Mathew's birthday called out the temperance young people from many churches, schools and homes. All joined in holding up the banner of temperance, no matter what their difference in belief and nationality.

Four thousand children were in the parade, and surely such a varied procession is rarely seen in any city. After the advance guard of police, mounted soldiers and the university students, came a thousand members of the Catholic temperance societies. Among these were temperance cadets; parish children with red, white and blue caps and tiny flags on their breasts; little ones from a deaf and dumb home, who could see and show the temperance colors if they could not speak nor hear the music; lads dressed as sailors behind a banner inscribed, "Sailor lads from the Santa Maria," and beautiful floats representing "Intemperance must go" and "Temperance, Peace and Progress."

Three regiments of the Baptist Boys' Brigade in their fine uniforms and large numbers of the Epworth Guards were in line. The girls marched too, and were represented by three well drilled companies from the Armour Mission and the "Young Disciples" who wore crimson neckties and crimson bows on their hats.

To the gay tune, "The Campbells are Comin'" the boys and girls of the Scottish Assembly cadets marched proudly along dressed in the picturesque costumes of Scotland. Children from the public schools, who had learned the evils of alcohol, and Sunday-school scholars, sunny-faced and bright, formed a large part of the procession.

And what do you think their banners said? "Saloons must Go." Yes, indeed. "Tremble, King Alcohol." Right again. Other good mottoes, less familiar to Cozy Cornerers, perhaps, were "Teach Temperance to Children," "Close the Saloons," "Will you join us?"

No wonder that Dr. Barrows, during the evening's program at the big Auditorium, pronounced it a "magnificent procession," and I have tried to give you a "bird'seye view" that you may gain some idea of the breadth of the great cause to which you have nobly pledged yourselves. in this stirring event in the great electric city.

NEPHEWS AND NIECES.

I send you two Bible questions for your Cozy Corner. Hope Aunt Jane will be pleased to accept them.

Where is the oldest record extant of surveying of lands and making maps?

Where is the first woman's rights movement mentioned in the Bible? ONE OF AUNT JANE'S READERS.

Worcester, Mass.

Thank you, kind friend; I have kept the answers and will print in our column the names of those who guess them.

I am one of the members of the L. T. L. and I think it is very interesting. I am ten years old. I live with my aunt and uncle. IVY M. DANA.

Duke Centre, Pa.

One out of — how many? Can you tell the number of members in the great Loyal Temperance Legion, Ivy?

I would like to have my letter in the Cozy Corner. too, if you think it will do. I am a little girl of seven years of age. I go to Sabbath-school almost all the time. There are two churches in our town, one M. E., one Presbyterian. My papa is my pastor. I belong to the Cold Water Band. MARY ALEXANDRA.

Florence, Pa.

This letter set me to wondering how many ministers' boys and girls are in our Cozy Corner. Just raise your hands so that I can see. Any number I should judge! Happy boys and girls in the best of homes, aren't you?

But ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things.—I. John 2: 20.

MR. WOOLLEY'S ADDRESS.

As was to have been expected, Mr. Woolley's address before the Cincinnati conference, published in THE UNION SIGNAL of September 3, has excited some adverse criticism. Christ said that He came "not to bring peace but a sword," and until the disciple is greater than his Master, the real reformer will of necessity do the same. Resolutions against existing evils will receive the plaudits—the sincere plaudits—of the multitude; but he who undertakes to reduce these resolutions to actual practice is likely to hear the same voices which uttered the huzzas shouting "Crucify him!" Nor is this because the multitude is insincere or even fickle. The end to be reached is plain enough to all, but when it comes to taking any active measures for reaching that end somebody's interests or prejudices are sure to be in the way.

In the present instance, many of Mr. Woolley's critics honestly believe that the only issue between themselves and Mr. Woolley is one of method, and resent, as scolding, his attempt to show them that their own course amounts practically to supporting the liquor traffic. But Mr. Woolley does not "scold." His address from beginning to end assails no one's motives, nor is it harsh toward the opinions of those whom he believes to be terribly mistaken. He simply states strongly, as one must on such a subject, what seems to him the inevitable result of a certain policy. And his very statement, in our judgment, proves conclusively his point. It is small wonder that Methodists do not enjoy being told that "the great practical, influential, respectable, masterful, voting church is the unswerving, intolerant, unreasoning, incorrigible patron of license in moral, legal, political, civil and criminal effect," but all recrimination against the man who makes the severe charge should be postponed until the question is decisively settled whether or not the accusation is true.

It should be carefully remembered that the question is not one of motive; it is simply and entirely one of fact. It is not what Methodist voters think of the saloon, it is not what they really wish to have done with the saloon, it is not even what they believe their own influence is in regard to the saloon; but what is the actual effect of the Methodist vote upon the life and power of the saloon. The northern Methodist vote is overwhelmingly Republican. The question therefore resolves itself into this, "What can prohibition reasonably expect from the Republican party?" There can hardly be two opinions on this matter. The platform of the party for 1892 thus voices Republican temperance sentiment: "We sympathize with all wise and legitimate efforts to lessen and prevent the evils of intemperance and promote morality." This is all very well as far as it goes, but the National Liquor Dealers' Protective Association in 1886 resolved, that "We most earnestly favor temperance and most strongly condemn intemperance;" also that "we are in favor of both public and private morality and good order and public education, and that we feel the duty resting on us as individuals and as a trade to work with the great body of our people in the advancement of these interests." The same association has repeatedly passed similar resolutions but it has failed to command the confidence of the people as a temperance organization.

In Maine we believe every Prohibitionist should have cast his vote with the Republican party in the recent state election, but in national politics the attitude of the party is hostile to Prohibition. Its utterances have been guarded, for it has a constituency which will not tolerate open repudiation of the temperance cause. To that constituency it has thrown the poor little sop of "sympathy" with "wise and legitimate efforts" to stem the tide of intemperance. Its words have been equivocal, not so its actions. It has uniformly treated with contempt those who petitioned it to stand squarely for prohibition; saloon keepers constantly hold positions of influence and trust in its committees and elsewhere, and it has never offended its liquor dealing constituency by legislation inimical to the liquor business. Nor is the slightest promise given that it will ever favor such legislation.

Politicians and leading men of the rank and file of the party have openly and repeatedly declared that the party cannot take up Prohibition, nor indeed any new moral issue, for it would be "suicide." The unstated major premise of this argument is not hard to find. It is simply: The party must live. The moral sentiment of mankind has decreed that the man who "must live," even if he has to steal to do it, has no right to live—outside of the penitentiary. It is time that the voters of this nation awoke to the fact that the party which "must live" at the sacrifice of righteousness and truth has outlived its usefulness. This party, then, which "must live" even though the liquor traffic continue unmolested in its ravages, receives the great majority of ballots of the Methodist voters, according to Mr. Woolley.

How does the Methodist vote affect the liquor problem? So long as Methodist voters support the Republican party regardless of its attitude towards the liquor traffic, while liquor dealers yearly announce in their conventions that they will support no party or man who is actively hostile to their business, which will rule in the councils of the Republican party and dictate its policy, Methodists or saloon-keepers? Is it "scolding," or is it the solemn, fearful truth to say "the great, practical, influential, respectable, masterful, voting church is the unswerving, intolerant, unreasoning, incorrigible patron of license in moral, legal, political, civil and criminal effect." It is useless to argue that the only choice of the voter is between two parties, one of which is as hostile to the liquor traffic as it dares to be, the other the open friend of the saloon.

It is true Prohibitionists have nothing to hope for from the Democratic party. Neither have they from the Republican party so long as they give it their unwavering support even when its "temperance" policy is dictated by its saloon constituency. Prohibition Republicans can influence their party only by leaving their party. They do not need to join the Prohibition party. Let them do as liquor Republicans do; assemble in conventions with Prohibitionists of every political creed and say to all the parties, we will support no man or party not distinctly and unequivocally pledged to the annihilation of the liquor traffic, then go home and prove by their actions that they mean what they have said. The political parties will be forced to choose definitely between a saloon constituency and a church member constituency. The issue will be clearly drawn and every party forced to state its position. It requires no prophet to foretell the result.

But there is another consideration. There are many issues before the people. It is too much to expect that any voter should find all of them satisfactorily treated by any one political party. He is therefore forced to sacrifice some questions to others. We admit the truth of this and also that it is possible there might be issues paramount, for the time, to Prohibition. The question is, are there actually such issues? If there are it will be found they are not actual issues between the two great parties. Practically, these two parties are no farther apart on any question than they are on the one of temperance reform. Their platforms are so nearly alike that with the exception of the two on the subjects of tariff and federal control of elections, the planks in the platforms of 1892 might be exchanged and no man, outside of the committees that framed them, would be likely to discover the change. Even on these subjects the actual legislation of the two parties has differed very little.

We know that some politicians find it very convenient to attribute the financial crash of last summer to Democratic legislation. But intelligent people of whatever party know that while the uncertainty concerning tariff legislation may have hastened that catastrophe and possibly aggravated it slightly, that the crash itself would have come even had the Republican party remained in power. The labor question and the money question are upon us, but they are not issues between the two old parties. Neither one dares touch these questions with the little finger, it would be "suicide" for them to do it. The voter who wishes to make himself felt on any of the real, live questions of the day must cast his vote with some other party than either the Democratic or Republican. For what then are Republican Methodists sacrificing Prohibition? Is it for an uncertain and variable difference in tariff legislation? It ought to be a weighty matter, indeed, that should induce them to stand as "unswerving, intolerant, unreasoning, incorrigible patrons of license in moral, legal, political, civil and criminal effect."

POLITICS GOOD AND BAD.

It is noticeable that whenever a question of grave importance confronts the nation, a question which involves the honor and welfare of the people at large and which therefore calls for the exercise of true patriotism and wise statesmanship in its adjustment, the cry is, "take it out of politics." Witness the tariff question, the labor problem, the municipal reform movement, and, above all, the prohibition struggle.

Now it is clear that the advisability of dealing with these vital issues of the hour outside of the sphere political depends entirely upon our definition of "politics." If we use the term in its primitive and true sense, meaning the science of government, we see no reason why any question which concerns the "safety, peace and prosperity" of the people should be "taken out." But if, on the other hand, we hold to the popular idea of politics: if we define the word according to what Webster call its "bad sense," viz., "artful or dishonest management to secure the success of political measures or party schemes"—in short, if by politics we mean partisanism, then the sooner all questions pertaining to the commonweal be taken out of it the better.

And in saying this we manifest no disloyalty to the "partisan policy" of the W. C. T. U. White-ribboners declare allegiance to whatever party best embodies home protection principles, and as there exists to-day but one party which is pledged to the two measures which they regard as fundamental—prohibition of the liquor traffic and woman's ballot—they, of necessity, lend their influence to that party.

Upon the character of its homes depends the stability of a nation, and that government whose chief end is not to provide for the happiness and prosperity of its homes is conducted upon an unscientific basis; it is violating the law of its own being, and must sooner or later disintegrate. In the opinion of the W. C. T. U. the Prohibition party represents in a greater degree than any other as yet in existence true governmental science—true politics—and is therefore the safest to "tie to." A W. C. T. U. woman can no more consistently belong to a party which countenances or to one which compromises with the liquor evil than a radical high protection voter can belong to the party of free trade, and vice versa.

One of the most hopeful features of our times is the growing disinclination among the people to allow any great reform question to become the football of parties, and the increasing demand for a non-partisan settlement of the tariff and other difficulties, is a sure indication of progress.

As for the W. C. T. U., if each and every political party would pledge itself to national prohibition of the liquor traffic and to woman's enfranchisement, the necessity for its present partisan attitude would vanish, in fact, the Prohibition party would find its "occupation gone," at which we venture to assert, every individual member of our organization and every loyal Prohibitionist would truly rejoice. As has often been said in these columns, we care not what the name provided the party be true to God and home and native land.

The significant demonstration in Chicago on "Temperance Day," which was notably non-partisan, non-sectarian and non-sex-tarian, was fresh evidence of the better time coming. We believe that a good majority of old party voters would gladly "pulverize the rum power" did they not fear it involved the pulverizing of their party also.

As long as the prohibition question remains within the realm of partisan politics so long must the W. C. T. U. remain there also, but we hope the day is not far distant when this and all other questions of good government shall be taken out of partisanism and put where they truly belong, into the domain of pure politics.

SERVING OUR OWN GENERATION.

Among the multitudinous causes which have been put forward in explanation of present undesirable conditions in this republic, it seems there are those who would trace them to the daughters of Mother Eve; who would shift all blame for the mistakes and inconsistencies and sins of the present government to the shoulders of the woman.

In view of such misrule as is revealed by the Lexow committee of New York and the Civic Federation of Chicago; in view of the legalized liquor traffic and the state complicity with vice, it is time that the rulers of this country, whoever they are, be deposed. If it is the hand that rocks the cradle which has brought about such a muddled state of affairs as this country is endeavoring to struggle out of to-day, let that hand be no longer regarded as too "pure" and "sanctified" to dip into the pool of politics. If Cardinal Gibbons' assertion be true—that the wives of voters rule this country—the fact contributes not to the "glory of womanhood," but to its everlasting shame and disgrace, and the less that practical and pretty-sounding little fallacy about rocking and ruling is heard the better for woman's glory and man's logic.

We recognize and honor Cardinal Gibbons as a co-laborer in the great harvest field of the world; we love and revere him as a lover and helper of humanity, and we appreciate the peculiarities of an environment which naturally tends to conservatism concerning the duties of women. We recognize, too, the fact that Protestant churches may learn much from the Church of Rome regarding the mother element in divine worship. As the Cardinal truly says, "All historians concede that it is to Mary that women are indebted for the lofty position they to-day occupy in social and domestic life"—to Mary we would add, because she gave to the world woman's most powerful emancipator, The Christ.

But when the Virgin Mary is referred to as the "model for all women, whether maidens, wives or mothers," we must remember that not unto all women is it permitted to become the mothers of incarnate sons of God. If all sons were Christlike, if all men had attained the moral and spiritual stature of the Son of Mary, then indeed might they be safely entrusted with the interests of home and state, and there would be no need for women to exercise that which the Cardinal so much depreciates—"the right to vote."

This high authority in the Romish church admits that "woman is man's equal," and, further, that St. Paul thus teaches (!), but—"her sphere is the home circle." Nothing more true, yet who shall measure the circumference of that circle? The magnitude of the home sphere—and therefore of woman's—is not generally realized. There is absolutely no "outside" to it. Civic government—politics? Ah, that is not only a part of this sphere; it penetrates to its very center. Upon the government of the state, the aggregation of homes, depend the welfare and happiness, nay, the very life of the individual home, for each and every home, no matter how stately or how humble, stands face to face with the saloon, the gambling den, the brothel and the long list of dangers which follow.

And every woman who in any way—on the rostrum, through the press, or by the secluded fireside—is striving for the better protection of the home; every woman, who, by rocking the cradle or by leading the hosts of a great reform, is trying to make it as easy as possible for men and women to do right, and as hard as possible for them to do wrong, is living and working within her "proper sphere."

"Every one of you," says the Cardinal to women, "has a mission to perform in your day and generation." We say amen to that with all our hearts; and in the fulfilling of this mission the true Christian woman of to-day, like Mary of old, becomes a willing instrument in the hands of the Most High for carrying out the great plan of the world's redemption. The movement for the political enfranchisement of our sex is not of woman; it is of God. It is by the impulse of the Divine Spirit that she goes down into the "mud and dirt of political strife." It does not follow, however, that this proverbial mud and dirt will continue to adhere to her. The great Worker himself will take care of that concerning which many good people express so much concern. We may rest assured that His most effective instruments (as even Cardinal Gibbons declares them to be) will not be rendered unfit for future service by reason of impurity.

THE GREAT WAR.

A very interesting interview with Hon. John A. Bingham, who for twelve years was United States minister at Tokio, Japan, has recently been given to the public through the daily press. Mr. Bingham's long residence in the Flowery Kingdom fits him better, perhaps, than any other American to speak with authority upon the present war with China, and it is especially gratifying to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which counts its department of peace and arbitration as representing so vital a principle, that he is unqualified in his condemnation of the war in itself, and confident that it could easily have been averted.

Mr. Bingham gives two causes, each one of which may have led to this war. The first is the existence of a gold mine of fabulous value in Korea, from which the Japanese government has long drawn its wealth and the monopoly of which it is extremely desirous to retain. No one knows anything definite concerning this gold mine; the province where it is said to exist being wholly under Japanese control and no foreigner being allowed to explore it. Mr. Bingham says:

While I was envoy a young British consul, hearing of this hidden Eldorado, organized a company to explore the region. He proceeded only a short distance in Korea when he was captured by Japanese soldiers and with the shortest kind of drum-head court-martial was put to death. There was no explanation, no apology, no authentic account of his execution. He was killed and a message was sent to his bereaved parents in England. A demand was made upon Japan for explanation. It made none. A further demand was made for another and Japan asked how much would satisfy the young consul's relatives. The reply came back that one hundred thousand dollars should be paid by Japan or the guns of Britain would belch forth flames in the harbor of Yokohama. The Japanese government told England to make no fuss about it and paid the money promptly. If Japan will run the risk of war or great damages to prevent the exploration of its great gold mines, what, indeed, must be their fabulous richness? I have often thought that the desire to possess these gold mines has much to do with the present conflict.

The second probable cause assigned by Mr. Bingham is as follows:

I can see only one underlying design—that is the infamous design of the European powers to finally seize and parcel out among themselves the whole of China and eventually Japan. To me there seems no excuse for it. I really believe, without vanity, that had I been in Tokio when the trouble began the war would have been averted. This is saying a good deal, but, knowing the Mikado and his advisers, I believe they would have listened to reason and have resorted to diplomacy rather than to arms. Once before, in 1874, China and Japan came near having a conflict, but by my official intervention it was avoided.

Whether or not Mr. Bingham may be correct in his estimate of the underlying causes of this war, it is significant that the two causes assigned by him are in each case superinduced by greed of gain. On the gold mine theory, the Japanese government is willing to risk the lives of thousands and tens of thousands of its subjects to say nothing of the Chinese who must meet death for the sake of possessing material wealth. On the other hand, European powers are willing to deliberately foment war, with all its horrors, for the sake of ultimately acquiring new territory and new glory.

What some of the horrors of this war may be, can be learned from another extract:

There is a monument in Japan called "The monument of forty thousand ears." The Japanese love to recall the story that in one of the wars over Korea they vanquished the Chinese and, as trophies, brought home forty thousand ears they had cut from the heads of Celestials. The ears were buried and the monument marks their sepulcher. This might be a reminder of the ancient fierceness which distinguished the Japanese in war. Nor have they lost it, save that in their civilization they are more humane and are content to kill without mutilation.

Is it not almost beyond the mind's powers of comprehension that any people, having emerged by however small a degree from barbarism, should willingly resort to war as a means of settling disputes, when war entails a series of such horrors, such corruptions, even such material loss as is beyond the ability of man to estimate?

It is interesting to note that Mr. Bingham asserts that at one time during his ministry, he prevented a war between China and Japan simply by bringing to bear the weight of his personal influence upon the Mikado and his ministers. For this act he received a long letter of thanks from Prince Kung, then China's Secretary of State for foreign affairs, who stood next to the throne. If one man was thus enabled to prevent a cruel war, with all its disastrous consequences, what might not the allied powers representing western civilization, have accomplished if they had but interfered to prevent instead of to promote strife?

We need to emphasize more and more forcibly the doctrines of Peace and International Arbitration which form a fundamental part of our platform of principles; but we also need to aid, as never before, in bringing about the day when the nations of the earth shall value principles above power and shall count their greatest wealth in the prosperity and righteousness of their citizens.

An item in a Chicago liquor paper, headed "Weiss beer going out of style," is as follows: "A beer in some respects peculiar to Berlin is the Weiss beer. Of this the Berliners used to be very fond, and they yet call their city the 'City of the White Beer.' Much less of it is drunk than formerly, however, and it is to be had principally at only a few halls and gardens. It is served in a great glass fruit dish with a long stem. When tilted up the apparatus covers the whole face. This Weiss beer looks like soapsuds and tastes like vinegar." The last sentence expresses exactly the way all beer looks and probably tastes. No wonder a drinking glass is employed which affords kindly concealment to the facial contortions of the consumer of such a noxious beverage. "Weiss beer going out of style!" More and more of our liquor fashion notes read in that way, showing that sobriety will be the leading style and abstinence the highest fashion of the better times.

On Duty has been forced to realize anew that, though the world unquestionably "do move," its motion is still capable of immense acceleration, especially in the direction of woman's recognition as man's peer. In an official address, the Japanese minister to the Korean court urged that government to keep its women strictly to the lines of domestic life, allowing them no participation whatever in affairs of state, and closed with the grave assurance that such a course is necessary if Korea is to enter the ranks of progress, since "no civilized nations grant to their women any voice in governmental matters."

There is an amusing as well as a pathetic side to this statement; the former consisting of the fact that the representative of a nation so recently elevated from semi-civilization, and elevated so largely through the influence of women as teachers and missionaries, should advise a nation as yet almost on the plane of barbarism to beware of giving power to its women. The pathetic side lies in the fact that, in giving this advice, the Japanese minister only followed the resistless law of logic. When he sees that the women of England and America, who, in every other respect are so manifestly the equals of their brothers, are denied all participation in government, all voice in the election of the officers by whom they are governed, what can he conclude but that such a line of demarcation between man and woman is the sine qua non of civilization? Doubtless he will find Korea more than willing to follow this advice. It has not been a distinguishing characteristic of human nature throughout the past that it has been over-generous in the conceding of rights and privileges. Masculine human nature, in particular, seems to find the words of the old game, "Hold fast all I give you," an exceedingly easy rule to follow. Korea will not be apt to take strides in justice beyond those taken by Christian America. Will Christian America ever become willing to set before Korea and the other weak nations of the earth, a living example of justice as concerns the womanhood of the nation?

Did you ever hear just how Kansas got prohibition? "It was a woman who did it," said ex-Governor St. John. "The vote for the submission of the constitutional amendment in the House was a tie. A brave little woman, inspired by God, unconscious of the great suspense, walked down the aisle and labored with her husband until he changed his vote to 'Yes.'" This woman's name is Mrs. G. W. Greever, who thus describes the scene: "I had been married but a short time at that session of the legislature, and sat daily by my husband at his desk. The prohibition amendment was voted on at an evening session. Many of the members of the House tried to evade the question by absenting themselves that evening. It was found necessary to have a 'Call of the House,' and the sergeant-at-arms was sent out to hunt up and bring in absent members. There was a good deal of merriment as they were brought in by ones and twos, and made to record their vote for or against. My husband, being one of the Democrats in the House at the time, naturally voted against the bill. I began immediately to labor with him to get him to change his vote, and was totally unconscious of all else that went on in the House at that time, until he finally rose to his feet and said: 'I wish my vote changed from no to yes.' I remember there was great applause at this announcement, and pretty soon people who were entire strangers to me came up and shook me by the hand, and acted as though they were glad to see me; but I did not comprehend what it meant until afterwards, when it came out in the papers."

IOWA.

FIFTH INGATHERING.

The fifth annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of the state of Iowa was held in Marion, October 3–5.

There were in attendance more than one hundred delegates, and a large number of visitors. Truly a feast of good things was provided for us by our president, who knew we had need of such refreshment after our year of trial and toil. The president's excellent address was listened to with close attention, and her wise recommendations were received with obedient intent.

The reports of our secretary and treasurer showed increase of membership and advancement of our cause all over the state. Fine reports of work accomplished were given by state superintendents of departments. Owing to great pressure of more important business at the last session, reports of the eleven district presidents could not be given to the convention, but will be published in the minutes.

On the first morning our Mrs. Carhart held aloft a telegraph dispatch, saying joyfully, "Sisters, I've good news for you Miss Willard will be here to-night." This announcement was received with clapping of hands and an animated display of "white lilies," for we had not expected our National leader until the last day of the convention, and she had graciously accorded us two days.

The Bible exposition of Mrs. Anna M. Palmer, state and National evangelist, was blessed by a manifestation of God's Holy Spirit, in comforting our hearts, increasing our faith, and strengthening our purpose to stand firmly for the right as He has given us to see it.

The first evening was filled with address of welcome by Mrs. D. E. Voris, in behalf of the Marion union and Marionites, and by Rev. J. G. Van Ness, in behalf of churches. Response by Mrs. Carrie K. Godfrey, was followed by an original dialect poem entitled "The Florida Cracker," by Mrs. Irene G. Adams.

A grand gold medal contest was held on Thursday evening, but owing to the absence of one of the eight who were to speak, a beautiful Cooper medal was given in place of the Demorest grand gold medal. The prize was awarded to Miss Ruby Wilson, of Lisbon. The music was of the highest order, Mrs. J. G. Van Ness receiving an enthusiastic encore to which she gave a charming response.

Our Miss Willard gave one of her inimitable addresses on Friday evening which was the crowning delight of our feast. She encouraged us in many ways. She spoke of the power of women as manifested in the Breckinridge contest, and said that if woman had the ballot this man would not have dared to make a canvass. She spoke strongly against any form of regulation of the liquor traffic. She called our attention to the strange inconsistencies of church-members who having an abundance of prohibition sentiment always "vote the other way." She said, "Iowa has gone back into the wilderness," and we all knew she spoke the truth. We know, too, that a "better day is coming, when right over wrong shall prevail."

A NEW ORDER.

The old system of district and county organizations was abolished, and in place of eleven district unions we now have twenty-three small ones. The district dues under this new arrangement are now twenty cents per capita. The offices of district and county superintendents were done away with; local superintendents are instructed to report work accomplished directly to state superintendents.

Resolutions were adopted against the mulct law and resubmission of the prohibitory amendment to a vote of the people, the latter plan being considered a move of political strategy, certain to be defeated at the polls and designed for the purpose of shifting the responsibility of a return to license laws from the shoulders of a political party wearing "the brewers' hoop of gold" to those of a hoodwinked people.

The old officers were reëlected as follows: President, Mrs. Marion H. Dunham; corresponding secretary, Miss Belle H. Mix; recording secretary, Miss Addie Estey; treasurer, Mrs. L. D. Carhart.

Many telegrams of greeting were received and sent out. One was sent to our beloved English Greatheart, Lady Henry Somerset, for her tender care of our Chieftain in her sore affliction.

The church was beautifully decorated with cut flowers, blooming potted plants, bunting and banners, some of the latter having done duty on June 27, 1882, the day on which the people of Iowa added the prohibitory amendment to the organic law of Iowa, by a majority of nearly thirty thousand. Attention was called to the fact that Miss Willard having labored in the state during the amendment campaign spent that day in Marion.

Of course Anna Gordon was with us in the interest of the children. She and Anna Brown, our state superintendent of L. T. L. work, held a meeting full of inspiration and promise with the little people.

An admission fee of twenty-five cents was charged on the night that our Chieftain spoke, for the benefit of the state work, in consequence of which one hundred and thirty-one dollars was added to our treasury.

The Marshall county delegates reported a great uplift in W. C. T. U. interests as a result of the labor of Mrs. S. E. Howe, of Missouri.

The convention voted to have Mrs. Howe employed as state organizer and lecturer for a season. Mrs. Howe comes to us highly recommended by her state president, Mrs. Hoffman.

State Reporter, Volga.

QUEBEC W. C. T. U. held its eleventh annual convention at Point St. Charles, Montreal, October 2–5, in the Centenary M. E. church. Mrs. Clara Hoffman gave the address on the closing night, and the program was brimful of interest from beginning to end.

VERMONT.

ANNUAL STATE MEETING.

Our twentieth annual convention was one of the most profitable and interesting ever held in our state. The September days were full of quiet beauty. The mountains and hills were covered with their autumnal hues of vivid scarlet, interspersed with shadings of brown and gold.

As the delegates and visitors arrived in the beautiful village of West Randolph, September 12, they received a royal welcome, the preparations made by the ladies for their entertainment and comfort being complete. There were forty-eight delegates present, ten counties represented, the counties of Lumville and Grand Isle not sending delegates. Eleven years ago the W. C. T. U., then but a few years old, met with this union; now, each grown strong and mature, they meet again to compare notes and congratulate each other.

Mrs. Ida H. Read, our state president, presided with quiet dignity. The first day was occupied in sessions of officers and executive meetings. The evening was given to the Y's; Miss Flora M. Corwin, the new state secretary of the Y's, presided very gracefully. The singing, "God bless my boy," by four gentlemen, was touchingly pathetic. The reading of "Skimpsey," by Galen Fish, of West Randolph, was highly appreciated. The lovers of music were gratified with the banjo solo by Gertrude Trevise. The fine organ voluntary by Abbie F. Clark, and the beautiful music of the united church choirs, were a foretaste of the music furnished each evening by these willing helpers. Miss Lucy Hitchcock read a paper on "Physical Culture a Part of Y Work."

Miss Kathie Dillingham, of Waterbury Center, gave very good reasons in a finely read paper for being a Y. She said every young woman should be a Y for her own sake and for her brother's sake; as a teacher, for her influence over her pupils.

Miss Corwin in a pleasant manner presented the Y banner to the Bristol union as the one the most deserving in the state. Mrs. Bosworth, of Bristol, received it in behalf of the daughters at home, and responded in an able manner.

The address of the evening was by Miss Anna M. Cummings, Colonial secretary of Y work in South Africa. She is a Vermont girl, and is having a vacation, with Y work for relaxation and enjoyment. She gave a clear and earnest description of life in Africa, and of the temperance work there with its many discouragements. Last year the banner society increased from twenty to forty-five. Miss Cummings has been their National secretary for four years. They have twenty-two unions, with seven hundred members.

Miss Cummings left Africa about a year ago for a vacation at home. She went up the coast to Jerusalem, and found only one temperance man in the place; from there to Greece, and but one woman there that wore the white ribbon. From there she went to England, and attended the great convention held in London.

Thursday morning the president delivered her annual address. It was full of inspiration, trusting faith and courageous zeal. The watchword which she gave for the coming year was "Never be discouraged." The evening's program was very fine. The change in the order of exercises was a decided improvement. The addresses of welcome by the pastors of the several churches of West Randolph were full of heartfelt welcome. The golden thread that bound welcomes and responses together, was in the first response by Mrs. L. D. Dyer, of Addison county. She was followed by the presidents of the other counties, each bringing out good ideas and a knowledge of the work in their respective localities.

Friday morning Mrs. Helen G. Rice, National superintendent of L. T. L. work, spoke in an impressive manner. She said, "Unions cannot die if they have an L. T. L. and take the state paper and THE UNION SIGNAL." "Pray the Lord of the harvest that he send forth laborers." This was a helpful talk, and all present felt the truth of her words, and that each union have an L. T. L. under its care. Necessary helps were recommended and L. T. L. conferences for the training of teachers.

In the afternoon of Friday occurred memorial hour. The tribute to the memory of Mrs. Roberts, wife of the Methodist pastor, was responded to by Mrs. Robson. Arbor Day impressive services were held in memory of Mrs. Roberts by the W. C. T. U. of West Randolph, and a tree planted, thus showing their love for their local president, and a poem was read at the time. After the memoriams, all rose and repeated in unison, "In my Father's house are many mansions, if it were not so I would have told you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also."

Miss Corwin made a plea for the Y's. Mrs. Read responded to the effect that the Y's were our daughters, and that according to the mother heart we could not have aught but the tenderest love and sympathy for them.

Then followed kindergarten class, by Miss Amy B. Fisk, and a children's meeting and chalk-talk by Mrs. E. A. Kenyon. The address of the evening, by Mrs. Drew, on the progress made in the last few years in all departments, as well as the change effected in the lives of women. Instead of being confined in the four walls of home, they are filling important positions. With music and a sweet song service closed the twentieth convention of Vermont's white ribbon women.

NOTES.

This was our president's second convention. She is fast strengthening the bonds of trust and affection that bind her to her co-workers.

Many thanks are due to the good people of West Randolph, to the ministers and musicians, who did so much to make the convention a success.

The superintendents that did not send reports and were not present were released from office and their places filled by those who possibly may give more time to the work.

The state officers were all reëlected. Mrs. Ida H. Read, of Shelburne, president; Mrs. G. E. Davidson, of Newfane, secretary; Mrs. A. A. Wyman, of Cambridgeport, assistant secretary; Mrs. E. M. Denny, of Montpelier, treasurer; Miss Bertha E. Chamberlin, of Plainfield, auditor.

The president requested that each union have W. C. T. U. headquarters, hang out a sign to that effect, and report next year.

It was voted to recommend local unions to pay enough to supply each member with the minutes of convention.

Mrs. Drew reported organizing a union at East Burke, when she thought it impossible, with six members; now they number thirty-one, with ten honoraries.

During the convention two Demorest medal contestants spoke, both of them young ladies.

Mrs. E. A. Kenyon reported thirty graduates of the L. T. L.

Delegates to National W. C. T. U. Convention at Cleveland are: Mrs. L. F. Wilbur, Jericho; Mrs. L. D. Dyer, Salisbury; Mrs. H. B. Cowles, Derby Line; Mrs. S. S. Gay, West Randolph.

Derby Line reported giving two fountains to the town.

Our honorary president, Mrs. E. T. Housh, of Boston, is to re-name our state paper. At the earnest request of the present editor, a new one was elected, Mrs. Mary Spencer Morgan, of Wilmington.

NORTH DAKOTA'S CONVENTION.

Our fifth annual convention, just closed at Wahpeton, was the largest convention yet held in our state, there being over one hundred delegates beside a large number of visiting delegates. The church had been beautifully and tastefully decorated with blooming plants and festoons of climbing vines; sheaves of wheat placed here and there were tied with white and yellow ribbon; banners of local unions, suitable emblems and mottoes were suspended over the stage, while the president's desk and the pot of white asters upon it were also adorned with white and yellow ribbon.

The first hour of convention was fittingly observed by a consecration service led by Mrs. Emma F. Vail, president of Sargent county. The convention proper opened on time with all of the officers present and in their places. The first day was mostly occupied in reports from the different officers and superintendents of departments, and everything was carried on with harmonious rapidity. The reports show an advance in our work that is most encouraging and cheering.

Mrs. M. B. Goodrich, who ever since the formation of our state union has given excellent satisfaction as superintendent of franchise, on account of severe illness, has found it necessary for a time, at least, to give up the work, much to the regret of all. Miss Emma F. Bates, our superintendent and lecturer on purity, gave a short but most beautiful and touching address on "Motherhood," which was followed by a discussion.

Friday evening came the addresses of welcome by Mayor Carter, in behalf of the city, Rev. E. C. Hall, in behalf of the churches, and Mrs. Jeannette H. Knox, in behalf of the local W. C. T. U. Mrs. May Wells Love, president of Walsh county, gave the response in a few well-chosen and beautiful sentences. Then followed the annual address of our president, which was full of good points, and pronounced a most scholarly effort.

Saturday morning's session opened with a half-hour prayer-meeting, led by Mrs. L. M. Wylie, president of Pembina county. Reports of superintendents were continued, and Mrs. Mears and Mrs. Benedict, of Fargo, presented the annual report of our Florence Crittenton Home, which was both interesting and encouraging. Thirty-five women and thirty-two children—eight of the children having been born there—have been sheltered and cared for since January, 1894. The sum of $168 was raised in a short space of time toward the completion of the Home, and for making it more comfortable for the winter, besides there were promised donations of table linen, bedding, etc., to a considerable amount. The "long roll" was called, and the number of new members were reported. The names secured within a month represent seventy-five regular members and five honorary.

In the afternoon Mrs. Brown, president of Ransom county, presented her report of the department for securing homes for homeless children. Some work had been accomplished in this department. She urged upon the sisters the necessity of more work among the locals in this particular department, and incidentally mentioned the wealth of love which is so often squandered upon dumb animals by women while so many little, homeless ones are starving for mother-love. Hon. C. A. Pollock spent a most profitable hour in showing by the aid of the question, "What the Prohibitory Law can do."

The Y hour followed, which was a most interesting one, consisting of a fine report from Mrs. H. K. Pierson, general secretary of young woman's work; solo, by Mrs. Davidson; singing by the Y double quartette and two excellent papers—"What the Y's have Done and What They are Doing to Help the Temperance Cause," by Miss Dugen, president of the Wahpeton Y's, and "Shall the Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union Work for Franchise?" Miss Lulu Palmetier, of Lisbon.

Saturday was the "honoraries' evening," and a most interesting occasion it proved. The music rendered was of the finest character. The Mandolin Club opened the meeting, followed by devotional exercises and a vocal trio. Addresses on the subject of equal suffrage were made by Dr. Knox upon the historical part of the question, C. A. Pollock, the legal, and I. M. Adams, the Scriptural. Hon. Walter Muir not being able to fill his engagement, was most ably represented by his wife. Again does North Dakota take the lead by a woman representing her husband.

Sunday morning the pulpits were occupied by ladies. Miss Bates delivered an address at the Congregational church on the subject of the temptation of Christ as applied to the relation between capital and labor. Miss Louise Crummy, our state evangelist, who at a great personal sacrifice has lately taken up this work, a young woman of more than ordinary talent and consecration, spoke in the Baptist church; while at the M. E. church Mrs. Jeannette H. Knox, our vice-president-at-large, delivered the annual sermon, taking as her text, "The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage." It was a most beautiful and pleasing address, proving that our Mrs. Knox, as a spiritual leader, is quite equal to any of our brother ministers.

In the afternoon a children's mass-meeting was held, conducted by Mrs. Meacham, president of Cass county, Miss Crummy and others.

Sunday evening the church was filled to its utmost capacity to hear Mrs. Cranmer, of South Dakota, while an overflow meeting was held in the Congregational church. Mrs. Cranmer is now lecturing in different parts of the state and everywhere is greeted with large and appreciative audiences, and we believe her work in the state will result in much good.

Monday morning the half hour prayer-meeting was led by Miss Crummy. The election of officers resulted in retaining the same corps.

Mrs. Eisenhuth, state superintendent of public instruction, gave a most acceptable address in the afternoon upon "The child in the home and the school." Mrs. May H. Tousley, of New Buffalo, who has lately entered the list of young journalists and is editing a small paper called Western Womanhood, having made the executive committee an offer to make this paper our state organ, upon what seemed to be most acceptable terms, and the executive committee having favored the acceptance of the same, the matter came before the convention and was unanimously approved.

Monday evening came the presentation of the prize banners. Wheatland union, of Cass county, received the banner for the greatest gain in membership during the year; and the Y prize banner was captured by the Wahpeton Y's. After the final adjournment came the social hour and one long to be remembered by all present.

Throughout the entire convention our program was interspersed with music both vocal and instrumental. Mrs. Hattie K. Pierson, our secretary for young woman's work, is a music teacher by profession. She has a wonderfully clear sweet voice, singing with so much expression that she delighted her audiences wherever she sang. Mrs. Carrie Chaffee, Mrs. Jennie Smith and Mrs. Mears, of Cass county, also favored us with sweet music. We feel that the Y's of Wahpeton deserve special mention—for we shall not soon forget their music, both vocal and instrumental. May they keep on singing and may their young lives ever be as pure and sweet as their songs.

KANSAS.

ANNUAL STATE CONVENTION.

Wednesday morning opened up bright and beautiful, an ideal day for the gathering of the white-ribbon clan, and Baldwin—the place chosen for the meeting—an ideal town, was seen in holiday attire. Capacious carriages were in waiting at the depot, a half mile distant, the gentlemanly drivers wearing both the white and yellow ribbon in honor of the occasion, proving at a glance they were our brothers-in-law and making us all feel "at home" the moment we stepped from the train. Even the whips, which were not needed to urge the prancing steeds, were wound with ribbon white.

Baldwin is the seat of Baker University, a Methodist school, named in honor of Bishop Baker; it now has an enrollment of 400. Each home was full of students, but like the old-fashioned omnibus, there was found to be "room for one more," until all the delegates were accommodated.

The banners and flags waving in the streets had a "fourth of July" appearance, while in the windows of the business houses might be seen decorations of white and yellow intertwined. The entire front of one building bore a banner inscribed, "Welcome W. C. T. U. and Woman's Suffrage," half the banner being white and half yellow. Huge bows of yellow and white bore evidence that the W. C. T. U. is linked with the cause of equal suffrage, and is so recognized by all.

The handsome church was tastefully decorated in the same colors, flowers and potted plants, making it a scene of beauty, while the good old flag of the G. A. R. post had a place of honor assigned it and almost made us believe we were "citizens" of the United States.

The morning session was opened by Mrs. S. M. Hartough, of Leavenworth, in a praise and consecration service, which was a spiritual uplift to all present. After organization, a few of the district presidents reported very encouragingly for these "trying times." At 11:30 Miss May Jaquith, our state evangelist, gave a Bible exposition, and her sister, Miss Madge Jaquith, a solo. This sweet singer accompanies her sister in her evangelistic tours, and she seems to have a mission from God to "sing souls into the kingdom"; then followed the noon-tide prayer.

Mrs. Chandler, of Baldwin, opened the afternoon session presenting a Bible reading on "systematic giving" and urging the tithing of our incomes, saying that if no income was received, the spirit of giving or the desire in the heart to give, would be acceptable unto the Lord. Mrs. J. C. Reed, of Garnett, and Mrs. Carson, of Wakeeney, then asked the Father for His blessing upon the deliberations of the convention, and Mrs. Katie North, of Baldwin, sang a beautiful solo with Mrs. Dora Evans, of Clay Center, at the organ. Mrs. Evans is our "musical director," and proves an efficient helper all through our state conventions.

Mrs. R. I. Hand, of Baldwin, voiced the welcome of the local union, giving the members of the convention a loving greeting. Rev. Griffith, of Baldwin, was then introduced, also Rev. Paden, pastor of the Presbyterian church, whose edifice we were privileged to occupy.

Mrs. Ella W. Brown, of Holton, our W. C. T. U. lawyer (also city attorney of Holton), gave an hour's drill in parliamentary usages, proving very profitable and entertaining, as well as mirth-provoking. Such drills will mean much for woman when she takes her rightful place in the law-making bodies of our land.

The report of colored work was followed by discussion, bringing out the thought of the great need of more earnest work in this department, and, in order to accomplish any great good, we must have in our hearts more of the spirit of Jesus, the Christian spirit which knows no "color line."

The state W. C. T. U. paper, Our Messenger, has had a very precarious existence for some time past, and our editor, Miss O. P. Bray, of Topeka, had made an appeal in its behalf. No paper had been issued for September on account of the burden of debt. She now reported that enough responses had been received to pay all indebtedness, and leave a balance on hand of $20.26. The report of superintendent of health and heredity was given by Rev. Edith Hill, pastor Baptist church, Pittsburg, Kan. Rev. Hill is a young lady of much promise, thoroughly consecrated; would that we had many more like her. She was formerly a member of our "Evangelistic Band" until called, and ordained to this pastorate. Many of the superintendents reported through the secretary, not being able to be personally present.

On Thursday morning, Article 1, Section 2, in the by-laws was read and amendment recommended, causing much discussion, but it was adopted, and now reports are to be sent to corresponding secretary annually instead of semi-annually, as heretofore.

President Smith being humorously introduced by Miss Bray, delivered her annual message, first dwelling tenderly upon the memory of our late deceased state treasurer, Mrs. M. L. Berry. It would be impossible, unless one were a stenographer, to give any adequate report of this grand address, which occupied thirty minutes. It will doubtless be printed in full in our state paper.

The election of officers resulted as follows: Mrs. L. B. Smith, Ottawa, president; Mrs. Jessie Maxey, of Ottawa, corresponding secretary; Mrs. S. N. Hartough, Leavenworth, recording secretary, and Mrs. Ella W. Brown, Holton, treasurer.

Mr. and Mrs. Beverly, of Burlingame, were introduced to the convention as the father and mother of our state president. They received the "Chautauqua salute," and briefly responded.

Then came the "jubilee hour" for Our Messenger, conducted by its editor. Special penny collections had been called for from all unions to be presented during the convention, each contribution to be accompanied by an apt Scripture quotation or an appropriate sentiment. The result, when counted, amounted to $21.27. Five dollars of this amount was generously given by Rev. E. F. St. John, always a friend of Our Messenger. The remainder came in small sums from many of our local unions. Our paper is now enabled to commence a new year with $41.53 in its treasury.

Mrs. S. A. Thurston, of Topeka, reported for "organization." Four new unions have been organized in first district, four in second, two in third, two in fourth, two in fifth, two in sixth, and one in seventh; total increase, seventeen.

Rev. Edith Hill delighted the entire audience by her Bible recitation, "What the Bible has to say on woman's equality with man," and proved to our entire satisfaction that the Good Book is not opposed to "equal rights," St. Paul misquoted to the contrary notwithstanding. This recitation is one of a number on different topics which Miss Hill has compiled and published in a neat little volume which all W. C. T. unions ought to have.

On Friday morning after devotions, the treasurer reported dues received for the year, $1,885.76. Kansas W. C. T. U.'s pay $1 per year membership dues, 25 cents is retained in treasury of local union, 75 cents sent to state to be subdivided as follows: 10 cents National dues, 10 cents for district work, 10 cents for county work, 10 cents for department work, and 35 cents for general state work, salaries of officers, etc.

Ringing resolutions were passed, among them one denouncing lynching, one of commendation of various societies and organizations for advanced steps taken on the temperance question. The question-box, conducted by Mrs. Thurston, brought out many pertinent inquiries and intelligent replies. It was advised that at every voting precinct in the state some person should keep a record of all votes cast for the amendment by each party, thus settling the vexed question relative to party indorsement. The general officers were instructed to appoint a day of prayer for the success of the amendment.

The Rescue Mission reported the "home" full, now having twenty destitute children under its care. Officers of Baldwin union were presented and received the Chautauqua salute, which closed the sixteenth annual meeting of the Kansas W. C. T. U.

THE EVENING MEETINGS

were held in the chapel of Baker University. On Wednesday evening the program consisted of a welcome address by Dr. Murlin, president of Baker, who in a genial manner told us how welcome we were at the college halls, and generously gave us "the freedom of the city with the whole earth thrown in." Mrs. Jennie M. Kemp, a former graduate of Baker, responded in behalf of the convention, after which the several district presidents made short addresses. We were proud of our women speakers, who seemed to be so perfectly "at home" upon the platform.

The second evening was occupied by young ladies and gentlemen from the college in telling "what young people can do and are doing in the temperance reform," and was certainly cheering to the hearts of all white-ribboners present, giving a forecast of the men and women who shall soon take our places on the world's "stage of action."

Friday evening Mrs. Chapman-Patt entertained a crowded hall with an address on the now most important question of the hour, the suffrage amendment. That she had the sympathy of her audience was evident from the close attention given, and the frequent and hearty applause; hands were clapped until the building resounded, while the loud Amen! reminded us we were in a Methodist audience. A selected choir enlivened the exercises each evening, singing as Baldwin choirs know how to sing, and "making melody in our hearts." The different ministers of the town participated in the devotional exercises, and by their presence showed their sympathy with us.

CONVENTION NOTES.

Seventy-nine new names reported gained at "parlor meetings."

Corresponding secretary reported 2,554 members "as square on the treasurer's books," a good showing this year of financial depression.

One thousand five hundred and eighty-five pages of peace literature and 6,720 of foreign distributed.

Mrs. Smith makes a splendid presiding officer, and reflects credit upon the W. C. T. U.

Greetings were sent the convention from the local union of Sterling, also from the National, through its secretary, Mrs. Woodbridge.

Baldwin union presented each delegate with a beautiful celluloid souvenir of the convention, which was highly appreciated b all the white-ribboners in attendance.

Delegates to National Convention: Mrs. J. P. Burtis, Mrs. E. D. Carson, Mrs. Fannie Holsinger, Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Edith Hill, Miss Helen Kimber. Alternates, Mrs. S. S. Weatherby, Mrs. J. M. Kemp, Mrs. Dora Evans, Mrs. Ida Eperson, Mrs. Cowan, Mrs. Stotts.

Baker University has a "military attachment," and we who believe in "peace" were gratified that Mrs. Holsinger, president of second district, in her address, had the moral courage to stand before the faculty and students and condemn it as unChristlike in its teachings and contrary to the doctrine of "peace on earth, good will toward men." Our hearts are saddened that a military officer is furnished by the government to drill the students in a Christian college.

All that was necesssry at any time to "bring down the house" was simply to make mention of equal suffrage,—straws show which way the wind blows.

Even the staid, old church clock ticked off the minutes of the convention hours draped in white and yellow, emblematic of the good time coming.

NEBRASKA.

TWENTIETH ANNUAL CONVENTION.

On the 19th of last July, the prairies of our beautiful state lay smiling under the summer sun. The fields were clothed with verdure, and the thousands of acres of corn were an emerald sea over which glistening waves ran merrily. Grateful hearts rejoiced in the prospect of a bountiful harvest. But on the morning of the 20th, a hot breath came up from the south like the blast from a furnace, and when the blazing sun sank to rest twelve hours later all living things were faint and weak. The corn leaves hung limp and curled. People said the crops were ruined. A month of hot, dry weather, with no drop of rain, fulfilled the prophecy, and Nebraska, instead of rejoicing in full cribs and plentiful store, is wondering how she shall care for the needy ones within her borders.

Knowing this, the faithful women who gathered at Lincoln the last week in September for their twentieth convention, came with small expectations of a large attendance. Happily were they disappointed when the complete roll showed 128 members. Many of the districts, however, were unrepresented, for in the western and northwestern portions of the state the destruction of crops has been very complete, and unions, as well as individuals, feel it a necessity to keep all the resources they can command for relief work in their own midst.

St. Paul M. E. church was the place of meeting, and there on the evening of September 25, the gathered white-ribboners were most cordially welcomed by Mr. Woods, acting mayor in the absence of Mayor Weir, by Rev. Dr. Lasby, pastor of the church, Chancellor Canfield, of the State University, and Mrs. S. C. O. Upton, president of Lincoln union. These addresses were all of a high order, full of earnest, thoughtful words, while the occasional gleams of humor in Dr. Lasby's remarks kept every one bright and smiling.

Chancellor Canfield elaborated the idea that the class of individuals he represented—the teachers—believed firmly in women, in Christianity, in temperance and in union, so, of course, they believe in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. The words of Mrs. Upton were deeply spiritual, full of strength and encouragement. Responses were made by Mrs. E. L. Woods, of Omaha, whose address, because of her severe cold and hoarseness, was read by Miss McCall and Mrs. Dora D. Nickell, of Beatrice. Both of these ladies are new workers, this being their first convention with us, but if their addresses are to be taken as evidence of their ability and helpfulness they will certainly prove to be valuable acquisitions to our state work.

The absence of several we were accustomed to see, and especially of our dear Mother Putnam, was noticed with regret. A communication was read from her stating that though "absent in body" she was present in spirit. It was her first absence in seven years.

The president's address was full of good thought and helpful suggestions, and was listened to with deep interest, the fact being generally known that Mrs. Wakelin declined to serve longer. Six years she has given her time and strength to this office, and now with the new relations she has assumed, she felt she must be relieved. It was with regret we accepted her decision, but she is not lost to the state nor to the work.

The treasurer's report was a great relief to many, for it showed much less of a falling off in membership than was feared. This is a cause of thankfulness, and though we realize that the coming year is to be the hard year, yet we hope by earnest endeavor to at least hold our own. Many of the western and northwestern districts must be helped, but if they will cling to their name and their ribbon, they shall yet rejoice in strength and prosperity.

Topical subjects were substituted upon the program for reports of district presidents and superintendents which will be printed in the minutes. These were limited to five minutes, and the change was both novel and pleasing. Various phases of the work were thus presented and the women brought out more fully than they could possibly be in the reading of a report. Many bright and unique five-minute speeches were given and not a little new talent discovered, which will be of use in forwarding the work in future. Miss Ellen Morris, corresponding secretary of Missouri, was with us a part of the time, attracted, as she stated, by reading our program in the Union Worker.

Just here I might state the new plan adopted to further the interests of our state paper and the work in general in the state. As many copies as we have members will be printed and the paper sent to each member. The unions are to send to the treasury twenty-five cents for each member, to be paid out of their dues or raised in any other way they may choose. This will pay for the paper and insure our women each having their state paper as they should have. Now, if they will read it, we may hope that a greater interest will follow and an impetus be given the work.

The evening meetings were very satisfactory. On Wednesday evening the Lincoln Y's presented an object lesson in song. A paper on "The Y Organization" was written by Mrs. Lee Arnett, their president, but as she was too ill to be present it was read by one of the young ladies. A band of children, white and colored, from the Home for the Friendless, sang two songs. They had sweet voices, well trained, and it seemed as if hearts must be opened to take them in and give them a mother's love.

Two addresses were given on this evening, each delightful in its own way. One was by Mrs. Chancellor Crook of the Wesleyan University, bringing an uplift to all hearts. The sweet dignity of her face was an inspiration as great as the gracious words she spoke.

The other was upon "Women and Journalism," by Miss Mary Fairbrother, of Omaha, editor of the Woman's Weekly, and abounded in spicy thoughts and bits of humor. A recitation, "The Volunteer Organist," was beautifully rendered by Miss Howe. Little Ruby Rollins made the collection speech.

Thursday evening was filled,--yes, filled to overflowing, with an address by Mrs. Helen M. Gougar—"And what can I say more?" At the close of the lecture a reception was tendered Mrs. Gougar at the Nebraska Conservatory of Music by Professor and Mrs. O. B. Howell.

The music each evening was something to be remembered. The first evening it was entirely instrumental and furnished by the Nebraska University Conservatory of Music. A pipe organ solo and the Mandolin Club were special features. Lincoln Normal College furnished music for the second evening and the Nebraska Conservatory the third evening. The beautiful singing of the Sicilian choir was greatly enjoyed. Mrs. Howell, of the Conservatory, had charge of the music in the day sessions and was very faithful. Many beautiful solos were rendered at the various sessions.

An invitation was presented from Dr. Emery of the Sanitarium, for the delegates to make free use of his baths—either the sulpho-saline or Turkish—at any time during their stay. What other convention can record so unique an invitation? Was it accepted? Follow the crowd of women who gathered at eight o'clock each morning in the sulpho-saline bathing hall, a bit of old ocean transported to Nebraska. Here in the beautiful green water see the nymphs (some of them weigh two hundred pounds) disport themselves—or attempt to do so. It was healthful exercise no doubt for the few and ever so much fun for the many who stood safely on terra firma and looked on, while all went to their day's work invigorated.

Election of officers brought some changes. Both the president, Mrs. Wakelin, and the treasurer, Mrs. Lantry, declined a reëlection. The former has served us six years, the latter seven, most faithfully, and it was with reluctance we accepted their decision. Mrs. S. M. Walker, of Surprise, was elected president and Mrs. E. M. Cobb, of York, treasurer. Miss Ella Watson was reëlected recording secretary and your reporter, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Lantry was made vice-president. Delegates to the National Convention are Mrs. Nellie Richardson, Mrs. L. M. Ferguson, Mrs. Dora D. Nickell, Mrs. Belle G. Bigelow, Mrs. L. S. Blackburn, Mrs. Coleman, with Mrs. D. G. NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

DR. MINNIE G. LEAVITT began organizing work in Vermont in early summer. The result of her labor are several new unions. She has given thirty-one lectures, nineteen talks, held four children's meetings and organized six unions.

ON Tuesday evening, September 11, "before the opening of the East Washington state convention, Mrs. Delle C. H. Cox delivered a lecture to a crowded house, keeping her audience highly interested for nearly two hours. Her logic was unanswerable and irresistible," writes the former state president, Mrs. Julia B. Cole.

MRS. J. K. BARNEY was with the Barre union, Vt., one evening and entertained a large audience with a talk on "Fact and Fancy," giving her experience in prison work. A short time since Mrs. Ransom, who has been very active in temperance work, invited the union to spend the evening at her home. The W. C. T. U. presented her with a copy of "A Great Mother."

THE mid-yearly meeting of Florida W. C. T. U. executive committee at Sanford, October 1, was attended by three general officers and five superintendents of departments. Besides the transaction of much other important business, arrangements were made for the state convention to be held in February, where it is hoped that John G. Woolley will lecture one evening.

ANOTHER Evanston reception was accorded Miss Willard on her return there in September. This time it was a general reception by her friends among the leading citizens and educators, and was given in her home church—the First Methodist. The ladies received and furnished refreshments, and Dr. F. M. Bristol, pastor, spoke words of cheer and welcome, seconded by Dr. N. P. Hillis, of the First Presbyterian church. It was a delightful affair, participated in by about five hundred people.

TO PUT ON needed flesh, no matter how you've lost it, take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It works wonders. By restoring the normal action of the deranged organs and functions, it builds the flesh up to a safe and healthy standard—promptly, pleasantly and naturally. The weak, emaciated, thin, pale and puny are made strong, plump, round and rosy. Nothing so effective as a strength restorer and flesh maker is known to medical science; this puts on healthy flesh not the fat of cod liver oil and its filthy compounds. It rouses every organ of the body to activity, purifies, enriches and vitalizes the blood so that the body feels refreshed and strengthened. If you are too thin, too weak, too nervous, it may be that the food assimilation is at fault. A certain amount of bile is necessary for the reception of the fat foods in the blood. Too often the liver holds back this element which would help digestion. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery stimulates, tones up and invigorates the liver, nourishes the blood, and the muscles, stomach and nerves get the rich blood they require.

Spent Hundreds of Dollars with no Benefit.

M. J. COLEMAN, ESQ.

M. J. COLEMAN of 33 Sargent St., Roxbury, Mass., writes: "After suffering from dyspepsia and constipation with untold agony for at least 18 months, I am more than pleased to say that after using Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and 'Pleasant Pellets' for one month, I was entirely cured, and from that day to this I do not know, thank God, what even a slight headache is. I paid a doctor on Tremont St., Boston, in one day (for his advice only,) the sum of $10.00 with $3.50 for medicine, and derived no benefit. I got more relief in one hour from your medicines, as far as my stomach was concerned, than from all the other medicine I used.

If any person who reads this is suffering from dyspepsia or constipation and will use your medicine as I have done, he will never regret it."

"BEST WOMAN'S PAPER."

"If you want my opinion of THE UNION SIGNAL," writes the state president of Texas, "here it is:

"I could not 'keep house' without it, and the efficiency of any W. C. T. U. woman is generally measured by whether she reads this best woman's paper or not. My experience is that if a woman does not keep pace with THE UNION SIGNAL thought, no matter how earnest her heart may be, her work for humanity will be spasmodic. The every day and all day worker reads our papers, our leaflets and publications. No one can read these regularly and not grow in spiritual life and power, and love and work for all humanity. May we all realize this and support the W. T. P. A. with whole hearted service."

NEW LEAFLETS.

Our new department leaflet by Miss Anna Downey upon "Hints for Gospel Temperance Meetings" in the first paragraph reveals its value to every department of W. C. T. U. work. A leaflet which answers the question, "How can we reach the people?" if carefully studied, must create fresh zeal in every union in the land. Read it and catch the inspiration of the closing sentence: "Faith, hope, love, earnestness, inspired by the presence of God can not do otherwise than produce fruitful service."

Cor. Secy's Notes.

A WORD FROM STATE CONVENTIONS.

Mrs. E. B. Murdock, secretary of the Maryland W. C. T. U., in extending thanks for greeting from National officers, adds: "The convention has now adjourned. Manifestly the Spirit of our Lord was with us, inspiring, guiding and controlling our plans so that harmony and love and self-sacrifice dominated all action taken. To Him be all the glory."

Letters from New York are songs of thanksgiving. Mrs. Frances Graham, corresponding secretary, and Mrs. Ella A. Boole, first vice-president, call it "one of the best ever held" and describe the spirit manifest as "not of earth, but from above."

Rhode Island convention is called by the corresponding secretary, Miss E. P. Nichols, "truly blessed." The former officers were reëlected with hardly a dissenting vote, and a debt of nearly one thousand dollars, which has been carried for some time, was wiped out, the amount having been raised in a very short time at a morning meeting.

"Every one was pleased, and all seemed to feel the blessedness of our annual meeting. Wakefield union had doubled its membership, so carried away the prize banner. We were very glad for them to do so, because they worked so hard to make the convention a success in every way. Delegates and visitors were all freely entertained and bountifully fed."

Who, or what union, can exceed the following item sent us by Mrs. Ella B. Gittings, corresponding secretary Colorado W. C. T. U.: "The union at Crested Butte, Col., reports a membership of ten, and eighteen UNION SIGNALS taken. Mrs. McAlister, the treasurer of this union, has secured yearly subscriptions for temperance papers in forty families."

Everything preparatory to Convention is progressing finely at Cleveland. The committees are earnest, diligent and self-sacrificing. The Convention will open November 16 at 9:30 A. M., and close at noon of the 21st.

Greetings from friends of our cause at home and abroad are being received.

MARY A. WOODBRIDGE.

DEAR CONVENTION COMRADES:—Will you, each and all, take with you to the Convention, and there use, at every session, your copy of the White Ribbon Hymnal? And will you each do your individual part toward making the music of the Convention a grand, uplifting, inspiring, successful part of it? Relying upon you for cordial coöperation, I am,

Yours for hearty, universal singing,

SEATS FOR VISITORS.

The committee on sale of seats during the coming National Convention announces that the price of seats is one dollar for the entire Convention, November 16-21. All who wish for a reserved seat should send their money in some safe way, with name and address plainly written. Wherever there is free delivery please do not forget to add the street and number of your residence. On receipt of the price a seat ticket will be sent you, such ticket to be also a receipt for the money. In about one week from the issue containing this notice the same will be printed in the local papers of Cleveland, thus giving all equal chance at first choice of seats. This is, of course, for spectators only, delegates' seats being free and compact in center of hall. Please send money for seats to MRS. GRACE P. OVIATT, 419 Sibley St., Cleveland, O.

RAILROAD RATES TO THE NATIONAL CONVENTION.

After a great deal of planning and work we are able to make a partial announcement of rates to the National Convention. All roads belonging to the Central Traffic Association will give us one fare for the round trip. Roads in the Western and Southern Passenger Associations will give a one and one-third fare. Those leaving the west and south purchase their tickets to either St. Louis or Chicago, and take a certificate to that place. That will grant them a one-third fare returning from that place to their homes. Then they purchase a ticket from either St. Louis or Chicago to Cleveland, round trip ticket, one fare.

The other associations I haven't heard from yet, but hope to in a few days. In next week's paper I will try to publish a list of roads centering in different associations so that each one will know what roads give the one fare and what ones the one and one-third. I worked hard to get a one fare rate through all the associations, but as I could not promise three hundred people to go over the Western Passenger Association they would not grant a one fare. I hope by another year, however, that they will see that we are a large and old enough organization for all Passenger Associations to grant us a one fare. In next week's UNION SIGNAL and the week following I will have further announcement as to rates.

Yours for a large convention,
MARY G. HAY,
Secretary Railroad Rates.

Our Library Table.

Every child who has watched month by month for Mr. Postman to deliver their beloved ST. NICHOLAS, will be glad to know that the editor of the delightful magazine, Mrs. Mary Mapes Dodge, is the author of two books for young folks, books that are bright and good from cover to cover, and decorated with such perfect illustrations as only the Century Company of New York can find for picture loving Young America.

The first of these books is THE LAND OF PLUCK. Who could ever guess where that land lies? This is what Mary Mapes Dodge says about it: "Far over the sea is a famous little country generally known as Holland; but that name, even if it should mean Hollow land or How land? does not describe it half so well as this—The Little Land of Pluck." Then she goes on to tell why it is given this queer name, and no boy or girl could resist reading every line of the true story, with the result that at the end the reader will know a great deal about "Brave Little Holland," as another author calls it. This book, which is quite sizeable, also contains a number of short stories—and Mrs. Dodge's stories are pure fiction whose foundation is truth, not a cheap adulteration that will hurt the sensitive, impressionable mind.

The second book is WHEN LIFE IS YOUNG, two hundred and fifty pages of rhymes, jingles, catches for the wee lads and lassies, with now and then a poem beautiful enough for storing in adult memories, yet withal, so simple that baby lips can catch the rhythm and baby hearts retain the truth. This book of child poetry is a fitting frame for the poem in memoriam of Hans Christian Andersen, forever dear to child-readers. Beneath the picture of the genial story-writer is Mrs. Dodge's tender tribute beginning,

"There is silence in the Northland, for one hath passed away Honored of all, a poet soul. . ."

closing with the lines,

"O children! ye for whom he wrought his lore of magic sway,
In grateful thought still honor him the Lord hath called this day!"

A book of especial interest to Pennsylvanians, as well as to all readers, because of its attractive style of authorship and compilation, is the HISTORY OF ERIE COUNTY, Pennsylvania, by Miss Laura G. Sanford. There are almost five hundred pages of material, historical, biographical, statistical, with portraits of eminent men connected with the history of Erie county and reference maps, making the work complete and valuable.

Published by the author. Sold by W. J. Sell, State St., Erie, Pa. Price $2.

Winter evenings will soon be upon us, and being shut out from the book of nature, books from the brain and hand of man will be in demand. Perhaps there is no more charming complement to the cheer of gaslight, fire-light and easy chairs than a well-written book of travel, and who has written better than Maturin M. Ballou? His latest work bears the title, THE PEARL OF INDIA. A few words from the author's preface may be acceptable as an explanation regarding the contents of the book: "The undersigned has often been asked both personally and by letter, 'Of all the places you have seen and written about, which do you consider of the most interest, and which do you recommend me to visit?'" Mr. Ballou answers thus: "It is safe to say no point presents more varied attractions to the observant traveler, more thoroughly and picturesquely exhibits equatorial life, or addresses itself more directly to the delicate appreciation of the artist, botanist, antiquarian, general scientist and sportsman, than does Ceylon, gem of the Orient." The author's descriptive powers are most rare and this book may be called a brilliant setting for the exquisite "pearl."

There is a vast difference between merely "papering" a room and "decorating" it. Any paper will cover the walls, but to "decorate" it requires well made, reliable wall paper in harmonious colorings and latest designs. There is also a vast difference in cost. The old style, inferior papers carried by local dealers cost twice as much as the new style decorative wall papers, when secured from Alfred Peats, the largest wall paper dealer in the United States. New designs can be bought from 3 cents a roll upward. His "Guide How to Paper and Economy in Home Decoration" will tell you all about it—how to get a $50 effect for $5. Send 10c. for postage on samples of wall paper, and the "Guide" will be sent free. Address Alfred Peats, 136 West Madison St., Chicago, or 30 and 32 West 13th St., New York City.

A POPULAR BOOK FOR AGENTS.

Rev. Francis E. Clark's new book, "Our Journey Around the World," is having a great sale, and is unquestionably the most popular subscription book of the day. The volume has decided merit, is splendidly illustrated, just the book for the family, and no better gift can be made by father, mother, brother, sister or friend. As President of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, Dr. Clark is beloved by more than two million members of that order. The publishers want more agents for this book—both men and women—and they offer great inducements to them. Their advertisement appears in another column. Our friends who are in need of profitable employment this fall will find this good book just the thing to work for, a book they need not hesitate to offer to their friends, and they will be pretty sure to do well with it between now and the approaching holidays. We can commend the book as being especially attractive and exceedingly desirable for agents.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

The French legislature has reconvened.

Japanese forces have been again victorious at the Yulu river.

Chancellor Caprivi, German Prime Minister, has resigned.

General Booth has been holding successful revival meetings in Cooper Union, New York.

St. Paul, Minn., entertained the annual convention of the German Epworth League last week.

The Pennsylvania Sabbath Association celebrated the centennial of the state Sabbath law at Williamsport, October 30 and 31.

The strike investigating commission, of which Hon. Carroll D. Wright is chairman, met again last week at Washington to complete the report to be presented to the President.

The widow of Otto Peterson who was murdered in a drunken row at Keokuk, Ia., has sued the brewing company and saloonkeeper for $40,000 for selling her husband liquor in large quantities.

Delegates from many parts of the country convened at Lowell, Mass., in the forty-eighth annual meeting of the American Missionary Association. President Merrill Gates, of Amherst College, responded to the mayor's address of welcome.

A NOTORIOUS music hall in London has been compelled to close its doors by the action of the London county council, which refused a license for selling drinks in the auditorium. The united influence of Christian temperance workers brought about the result. The British Women's Temperance Association held a prolonged prayer-meeting, lasting four hours, during the session of the council, and many prayers were offered in London chapels and churches in support of the action of the licensing committee.

MISS FRANCES ENSIGN, organizer of Y's for Ohio, telegraphs the pleasant announcement that a "Somerset Y" of a hundred and fifteen members has been formed in the Ohio Wesleyan University, that staid and dignified institution than which no other stands higher in the Buckeye state. So far so good; what college shall we next report as having thus added to its appliances for practical Christian endeavor? Miss Clara Parrish addressed an enthusiastic audience of two thousand, largely college students, the same evening. Our young women are at work.

A RECENT South Carolina letter says that the result of the dispensary law is the establishment of "blind tigers" in towns and villages. These low places are run by negroes backed by white men. A colored man was asked if he would be willing to testify against them, but he said that it was as much as his life was worth, and that if a suspicion got out that he reported them he would be shot in the night by some of the "gang" or whipped horribly. The whole trend of the act this year seems to have been to increase drinking in the state, and put respectable people in the attitude of upholding the traffic by defending the dispensary.

DURING the absence of Mrs. Zimmerman for a month, the noontide prayer-meetings in Willard Hall are being conducted by the well-known W. C. T. U. evangelist of Indiana, Mrs. Ellen K. Denny. Among those who have recently spoken from the platform are Mrs. Marion Baxter, formerly of Michigan and now a Chicago resident, and our second round-the-world missionary, Miss Jessie Ackermann. Daily incense ascends from this sequestered hall in the heart of the bustling city to the Giver of all good, the Helper of the oppressed. The ever varying testimonies show the needs of those who seek aid and consolation in this midday hush.

THE National Council of Women of the United States has recently had its ranks reinforced by the accession to it of the National Council of Jewish Women. This is a significant move, and while the National Council of Women is to be congratulated upon the addition of this latest branch, there is yet deeper signification in the fact that women of such staunch conservatism as the Jewish race have united their strength with a movement so broad and non-sectarian. The Jews have ever stood for purity, obedience to law and a strict code of righteousness.

THE great labor federation which meets in Denver, Colorado, in December next, promises to be the most notable ever held. John Burns, the British leader of working people, is coming over as a delegate, and other lesser lights along with him. Women will be represented on an equality with men, and a good, steady step forward is likely to be taken for those methods of labor reform that commend themselves to all sensible people, namely, the eight hour day, the board of conciliation and arbitration, and above all, the "living wage." THE UNION SIGNAL is warmly in favor of these methods, and will do all it can to increase their hold upon the thinking men and women who read these columns.

GREAT enthusiasm prevails among Cleveland workers regarding the coming Convention. Friday, October 19, was a red-letter day for old Crusaders in the Forest City, who responded in such numbers to the call for a Crusade meeting that to quote our correspondent, "One would have thought Crusade women had a special claim on life." Hearts were united as never before and the gathering was a renewal of consecration and a baptism by grace for the participants. This preliminary meeting of old Crusaders was preparatory to the special Crusade conference planned for the National Convention at which we hope for a Pentecostal revival and a breaking down of all barriers between heart and heart. May the Crusade communion of the Majority Convention be a memorable one to the work and the worker.

BY an inadvertence we neglected to mention in last week's paper the adjournment of the annual stockholders' meeting, October 17. Because of an insufficient number of proxies represented, there could be no legal meeting, but a profitable informal meeting was held, in which the report of the business manager, Mrs. Grow, was heard, and a clear understanding of the business obtained. Very soon all stockholders will receive another call for the annual meeting, and every one thus notified should not fail to fill out the blank proxy, especially those who neglected this important matter before. It is impossible to have a meeting and elect the board of directors unless two-thirds of the stock is represented in person or by proxy. This call would have been issued ere this had not the death angel removed our beloved secretary, Mrs. Woodbridge, from us.

THE twelfth annual convention of Missouri W. C. T. U. closed last Friday night at Brookfield, Mo. It was pronounced by all the best ever held in the state. Ten delegates and two National superintendents will represent the state at Cleveland. Mrs. Barker was to speak Thursday evening, but could not go because of Mrs. Woodbridge's death. An address, strong, fine and masterly was given by Mrs. S. F. Grubb. Inquiries were made at once by many delegates, "When can we secure Mrs. Grubb?" Friday afternoon a little flower and ribbon-trimmed basket containing two hundred silver dollars was presented Mrs. Hoffman as the basis of a "rest fund." Mrs. Woods, in presenting the basket, said it "held a little heart's ease," that "never were two hundred heart's ease so easily gathered." Many expressions of love and confidence were given, and for once Missouri's president was speechless.

OUR readers will notice in this number the omission o the name of our well-known editor, Mrs. Harriet B. Kells, who for three years has conducted the Contributed and Household departments of THE UNION SIGNAL. In the variety and piquancy which she introduced upon these pages as well as in her own contributions, her special gifts have been displayed. Her winsome personality, devotion and enthusiasm in the white ribbon cause have endeared her to her co-workers in Chicago who bid her Godspeed in her future undertakings. Mrs. Kells regretfully resigned her position on THE UNION SIGNAL in order to engage in business in the South where the climate is more conducive to her health. She is located for a brief time at Ft. Worth, Texas. When her permanent residence has been decided upon THE UNION SIGNAL will make known the fact for the benefit of her many friends throughout the Union. An interesting letter from her racy pen will be found on page 4 of this issue.

"WHISKY did it—reliable parties say the men were drunk when they came in," writes Mr. S. A. Kean, who was a visitor with the Rev. Ross Taylor at Nyack, N. Y., during the recent terrible catastrophe which burned to death four happy young children and left a home desolate. These were beloved grandchildren of the well-known African missionary, Bishop Taylor, whose son, Rev. Ross Taylor, is his father's representative in this country. The fire was started by the carelessness of workmen who board at the house and came in late from a fishing trip. The flames spread with such rapidity that the sleeping children were beyond reach of human help before the alarm was given. "Whisky did it." Again and again the sad record is repeated, innocent ones are destroyed and homes are laid bare by the subtile enemy with whom there is as yet no reckoning. Those who read these pitiable records, who, because they are in the battle, catch more readily than others these sounds of woe, wonder why the world continues so quiescent under the demon's rule. The tenderest sympathy of the white ribbon sisterhood goes out to this fourfold stricken household.

MISS WILLARD is at present in Boston, preparing her annual address and attending to the multitudinous duties of her many responsible positions. She is recovering from a recent attack of bronchitis, and is not yet strong enough to attend the funeral services of Mrs. Woodbridge at Ravenna, O. Deeply affected by her death, she greatly regrets her enforced absence, saying: "In the old days I should have started to you by the next train that followed your first telegram, but that old springy feeling is gon and my physician forbids my daring the trip and t strain of the closing scenes at Ravenna. If Lady He Somerset were not to sail for England next Wednes and if I were not below par physically, we should both for it would be a tender pleasure to us to pay the l tribute of respect and affection to our comrade of many pleasant years." Concerning the great berea ment, which nations are sharing to-day, Miss Willa writes: "It would be idle for me to attempt to give y any idea of the bewildering astonishment and sorrow w which we heard of the great shock that came to you all i the sudden departure of Mary Woodbridge from thi world. I had been receiving letters from her daily, fu of particulars concerning the coming Convention. seems to me that of all the persons who could have b named she was farthest from my thoughts as one w would be called away from us so suddenly and in su conjuncture as the present. Mary Lathrap's line re to my mind again and again:

"'We follow that way.'

"May we gather closer together as the group dimi and may evening bring us all home."

"MY SON!"

BY FREDERICK F. HALL.

Yes, sir, I know; and your words are kind an' I tell you, sir, I've tried
To think we can find the things we've lost, when we get to the other side.
I'd give all I've got, sir, to know 'twas true; but I can't, I just can't see
How some of those lost—those dear lost things—'ll ever come back to me.
I shall see her there; I know she stands right close to the pearly gate,
Waitin'; and soon I, too, 'll be there; she won't have long to wait.
But when she asks for the boy—our boy—'at she left when she went away,—
Asks all those questions a mother will—oh, what am I going to say?
Well as I know that he's been dead this many and many a year,
Do you think I'd dare to ask up there, "What! haven't you seen him here?"

God gives men power for good or ill that ain't for this world alone;
They can lift a soul to the gates up there in the light of the great white throne,—
Or sink it low as they sunk my boy—such beautiful eyes he had,—
Brown like his mother's—you'd never have thought such eyes could have turned out bad.
An' he weren't bad either, but true an' good but—perhaps you know the rest—
There was only me for to bring him up,—an' I tried to do my best;
But the world, an' the flesh, an' the drink are strong an' some men's hearts are stone.
An' I tell you it seemed sometimes as if I was fightin' 'em all alone.
For them as 'll lift their fellowmen there's waitin' a starry crown,
But honor and power and wealth is got by them as 'll pull 'em down.
Most men they hope for the crown sometime, but they want it the shortest way,
An' they do their best an' their hardest work for a different sort o' pay.
So, the world spins on at its rattlin' gait as hard as ever she can,
An' it don't much matter that boys are lost if they b'long to some other man.

One night—dead drunk—they brought him home,—my boy—an' I laid him there,
The blood of a street fight on his face, an' the gutter mud in his hair.
He never knew me nor spoke again, drunk an' asleep he died,
An' I prayed 'at his mother'd never know how we laid him by her side.
Yes, the golden streets an' the jasper walls—I've read of 'em all—but then
Do you believe, sir, that over there I shall find my boy again?

WAS IT HARMLESS?

BY ELLA J. STEWARD.

"Three, six, nine, twelve cans of as nice blackberries as one ever saw, and enough more in the kettle to fill another and make an even baker's dozen; I call that a pretty good morning's work," said Mrs. Henderson, as she wiped the perspiration from her face and looked with pardonable pride upon the goodly array of fruit jars ranged upon the table of her neat kitchen. "I'll be through and have everything cleared up in less than half an hour more, and then I'll have time to rest and read that article on the evils of the social wine-glass before I get dinner. Oh, dear," as a peal from the doorbell reached her ears, "who is that, I wonder? Hope it isn't any one that will hinder me very long," and quickly removing her berry-stained apron she hurried to the front door, to find on the porch Mrs. Norris, a lady she had long known by sight, but whom she had never before met.

"Mrs. Henderson, I believe?" said Mrs. Norris.

"Yes, ma'am; come in, Mrs. Norris."

When seated in the parlor Mrs. Norris said: "Pardon the liberty I take in calling upon a stranger for a favor, but I should very much like to get your recipe for making blackberry wine."

"Blackberry wine!" echoed Mrs. Henderson in astonishment. "Why, I never made any in my life; I do not believe in wine drinking, and would not have any of it in my house."

"Oh," replied Mrs. Norris, smiling, "of course I do not believe in the drinking of strong liquors, but I never was fanatical enough to condemn anything as harmless as pure blackberry wine; indeed, I consider it very beneficial, and used always to make and keep it in the house; my wine was highly praised by good judges. But I have not made any now for several years, and have forgotten just the proportion of brandy I always put with a given quantity of berry juice, so I wanted to get a well tested recipe from some one."

"But why did you suppose I could give you one?" inquired Mrs. Henderson, with a puzzled air.

"Because I heard that you were buying quite a quantity of blackberries; pray, what use do you make of them?"

"I can them for winter use; a much better way, I think, than to convert them into intoxicating liquor, to help ruin some poor soul, perhaps."

"Oh, I am not in the least afraid that home-made wine will help ruin anybody. But as you hold the singular views you do, I am sorry I troubled you," said Mrs. Norris coldly, and with a stately bow she bade Mrs. Henderson good-day, leaving that good woman to return to her kitchen in a state of indignation, as may be seen from the remarks she addressed to no one in particular, for she had fallen into the habit of thinking aloud, especially when deeply moved.

"Going to make wine, is she? Well, I should think she had had evidence enough in her own home of what drink will do for a man; and I should think she would be the last woman in this town to allow even a drop of anything containing alcohol to be in her house. Became offended because I expressed my opinions, did she? Well, I can't help it, I could not keep still; of course I hope no evil results will follow, but if she does make that wine she may see the day when she will remember what I said; for if—" and she shook her head and sighed as though her thoughts were too dreadful to utter even to the kitchen walls.

The above scene took place in a rapidly growing frontier town, in the early summer of 188-. That the reader may understand Mrs. Henderson's soliloquy, we must go back some three years, when this town was but a scattering village, and Mr. and Mrs. Norris moved there from a distant state.

Mr. Norris was a man of fine appearance, and unexcelled business qualifications, being a highly skilled accountant. But some time previous to this he had acquired an appetite for liquor, or, perhaps we should say had roused a dormant hereditary appetite, and had become so addicted to its use that he lost his situation at their old home, and poverty stared them in the face.

Having resolved to break, if possible, the chains of habit and appetite that held him, and thinking a severing of old associations would make this easier to do, he, with his wife, sought a new home among strangers. There being a demand for accountants, he at once secured a position at a good salary, and for a time all went well. But alas, temptation offered and he fell. His employers listening to his penitent plea and promises of reformation, reinstated him.

Again and again he fell; until a prolonged debauch of some weeks left him and his wife in abject poverty, he having even pawned the only coat from his back for the accursed stuff. When the saloons had taken from him the last cent possible, he was kicked out, and all one night he lay in the gutter, with scarcely clothing enough to cover his person. When reason resumed her sway, his shame almost crazed him, and he came near ending his miserable existence by his own hand.

But better thoughts soon formed themselves in his naturally fine mind, and once more he went to his former employers and pleaded for another trial, pledging himself that if he did not that time remain faithful to his duty, he would ask no more of them. The man who had been filling his place not having proved satisfactory, he was given another trial. This time the memory of his degradation, which on the occasion of his last downfall had been greater than ever before, seemed to have some influence over him, so that his will-power gained strength, and at the opening of our story, about two years had passed in which Mr. Norris had led a sober, industrious life. He and his wife being of an economical nature, they had saved money and invested it in real estate, by the advance of which they had come to be in well-to-do circumstances.

Having known all these facts of their previous history, no wonder Mrs. Henderson was both surprised and shocked at the thought of Mrs. Norris making wine and keeping it in the house.

Quickly fled the months, and chilly November brought Thanksgiving Day, on which occasion Mrs. Norris sent out invitations to a number of friends for a dinner party; Mrs. Henderson, of course, was not among the chosen number.

Ten days passed away, and on Sunday morning Mr. and Mrs. Henderson were walking to church, when a neighbor overtook them and asked, "Have you heard about Mr. Norris?"

"No, what?"

"He dropped from his chair, dead, an hour ago."

"Dead!" echoed both Mr. and Mrs. Henderson. "What was the cause?"

"Well," slowly replied Mr. Jarvis, "the doctor who was called in after it was all over, pronounced it apoplexy; but I call it blackberry wine poisoning. It seems that on Thanksgiving his wife gave a dinner party, and one item on the bill of fare was blackberry wine of her own making. Mr. Norris had not tasted any kind of liquor in over two years, but of course to be considered courteous he could not refuse the wine that was offered to their guests at their own table, so he drank of it. He has not since that day been to his office, nor has he drawn a sober breath; he died drunk!"

Mrs. Henderson with tear dimmed eyes and trembling lips said:

"I wonder whether Mrs. Norris would now call pure blackberry wine harmless?"

PEACE AND ARBITRATION.

BY HENRIETTA L. MONROE.

There is in our country an alarming growth of sentiment in favor of militarism, and in our public schools, universities and the church military companies are being organized, officered, uniformed and drilled after the army manual.

The churches have asked for an increase of chaplains, chapels and libraries in the United States army, and the united Christian commission, representing six of our largest denominations, has said to the War Department that it will regard it as a duty to discourage the enlistment of young men, unless these changes asked for in the interest of morality and religion are made. The Presbyterian General Assembly last year gave the same utterances upon this subject. The Epworth Herald, the organ of the Epworth League of the Methodist Episcopal Church, has in one of its late issues an editorial upon this subject, which has produced a profound impression, and should be widely published. It says: "Avoid the army, boys, it is no place for a Christian young man. We make this statement without qualification, and in support, give reasons which are incontrovertible facts." It adds: "Will the Woman's Christian Temperance Union sound the alarm, 'Avoid the army, boys'? We wait for an answer from its department of war."

We have no department of war but one of peace and arbitration, which ever holds up the standard of peace, and waves the white flag of truce, using every effort to keep the peace, and thus help to establish the reign of the Prince of Peace.

In an extremely interesting article, "War Memories," published in one of our religious papers, and called out by the late national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, there are recalled thrilling events of the late war; the calling out of the troops, the ready enlistment of men, their privations, sufferings and heroism, and the conclusion was: "Who can recount the horrors of the battle field, let them remain untold; would to God they might never be repeated. If there were ever a time when there were prayers offered that nations should learn war no more, it was in the days of Shiloh, Gettysburg and the Wilderness. Brought fresh to memory all this suffering and death seems to-day like the barbarism of remote centuries. We recall the advent of peace and return of the victorious army. Christians sought their closets, altars and churches, and gave thanks to God. But in ten thousand homes the return of the armies was an occasion of sorrow; friends turned aside to hide their tears, for their loved ones were numbered with the dead, and these tears will not be dried until the last Caleb and Joshua of that generation have passed away."

The cry from Europe is for peace. The Contemporary Review of London says this downward movement of militarism must be arrested, the interest of self-preservation demands it. Spain spends one hundred millions of dollars to maintain her army, and one million five hundred thousand to educate her children.

The Pope, the Czar of Russia, the Emperor Francis Joseph, the King of Denmark and Prince Bismarck have declared for peace. The nations are discussing the necessity of peace and arbitration, and peace societies are being organized in all governments, while an eminent French statesman has said that England and America are the two powers which should be looked to to take the initiative measures for peace. If this be so, then this movement must begin in the homes and schools of these countries. How is it with England? Boys' Brigades have been formed in the churches, ostensibly at first, and expressly stated to be for the advancement of Christ's kingdom among the boys; but the real tendency of this organization has been lately declared by its chairman to be the promotion of military feeling and a longing to fight the enemies of England.

In our own country the universities, colleges and public schools are organizing military companies, and at last summer's commencement of one of our colleges there was a competitive drill between two companies. An army officer was sent to witness it and he declared that their drill was equal to that of the regular army. In our own state these companies are being organized in our public schools, claiming it is done in the interest of physical education. In defense of this doctrine we have taken the following from one of the leading daily papers of the largest city in Ohio: "There is no better way to promote health, to develop vigorous manhood and a symmetrical body than careful military training. There is no place on earth where a better type of physical perfection can be found than among the straight laced boys of West Point and Annapolis."

It is now well understood that the development of bodily powers is essential to the full development of the intellectual, and that physical and mental training must be combined if you would have a well equipped individual. This physical training should be given in the public schools, but does this military training given there, copied as nearly as possible after the training of the government army and naval schools, accomplish the desired end? If so, why is it that in Europe measures are taken to give recruits from three to twelve months training in gymnastics to develop them as men before they are expected to conform to the requirements of the soldier? Why is it that in Upton's Manual of United States Army Infantry Tactics there is so much stress laid upon the importance of these exercises to the physical well being of the soldier?

The statement is also made that the boys will be drilled by a United States army officer free of cost. Why does our government send an officer free of cost to drill our boys in the tactics of war if it be not for the hope that military training will develop in them a military spirit? It has been truly said, "What you put in the schools of a nation will appear in the life of that nation." This law is as fixed and unalterable as the laws of nature; it is folly to say that the boy will see differently when he is older after having had years of military training in the schools. Grant this, and you cut the ground away from the whole system of education.

The saddest feature about militarism is the military spirit that is being developed in and fostered by the church. Under the very shadow of the cross our boys are being drilled in military tactics, for the purpose, it is claimed, of winning them to Him, at whose birth the Judean hills were resonant with the melody of the song of the angels, "Peace on earth, good will unto men," and who said in His mature years while upon earth, "My kingdom is not of this world, else would my servants fight." "They that take the sword shall perish by the sword." "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

The prophecies foretell the time when "the sword shall be beaten into ploughshares and the spears into pruning hooks"; when "nations shall learn war no more," "for every battle of the warrior is with confused noise and garments rolled in blood." David was not permitted to build a house of rest for the Ark of the Covenant, because he had made great wars and shed blood abundantly upon the earth. But Solomon, a man of rest, who had peace and quietness all his days, built the house of the Lord. Christ is the Prince of Peace. We pray, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done, on earth as it is in Heaven," and then we train our children in all the arts of war, and thus delay the coming of that kingdom and prevent the will of God being done.

DR. BUCKLEY ON EQUAL SUFFRAGE.

VII.

BY ALICE STONE BLACKWELL.

In reply to the argument that woman suffrage has worked well wherever tried, Dr. Buckley mentions New Jersey, Utah and Wyoming. There was a large Quaker element in the population of early New Jersey, and in 1776 suffrage was given to taxpaying women and taxpaying negroes. According to Dr. Buckley's own account, there was no complaint made of the way the women exercised the right for more than thirty years after it was granted. In 1807, at a county election involving the location of a court-house, there was much fraudulent voting. It was done partly by women, partly by men dressed up in women's clothes. Dr. Buckley omits to mention the men's part in the cheating, but the historical fact is well known. The next legislature took away the ballot from the taxpaying women and taxpaying negroes, and abolished the property qualification for suffrage, interpolating the words "white male" into the election laws. Dr. Buckley says this was because "the whole state was so disgusted" by the fraudulent voting of women at this local election. The more generally accepted, and certainly more probable, historical tradition is that the taxpaying women and taxpaying negroes had most of them voted the Federalist ticket, and that when a reactionary Democratic legislature got into power, it revenged itself by disfranchising both, and by abolishing the property qualification. At any rate, if the New Jersey experience is any argument against suffrage for women, it is an equally strong argument against suffrage for taxpaying negroes.

Dr. Buckley quotes Utah. There, he says, "the women supported not only polygamy, but anything else suggested by the Mormon hierarchy." The Mormon women, it is true, voted the church ticket solid. But all the Mormon men did the same. Therefore, if the Utah experience is an argument against suffrage for women, it must be equally an argument against suffrage for men. In the matter of polygamy, the main responsibility certainly did not rest with the women. It was not they who invented the doctrine, nor was it for their pleasure that the system was maintained. All the Gentile testimony is agreed that polygamy went exceedingly against the grain with the women, and that they accepted it as a heavy cross, which they were only driven to bear by reiterated assurances that it was a divine revelation. This stands to reason. There are some men who like very well to have half a dozen wives; but there is no woman who likes to share her husband's affections with half a dozen other women. As Samantha Allen says, Mormonism, so far as its polygamous system is concerned, was a monument to "the wickedness and smartness of men." If women had not been accustomed for ages to submit their own judgment to that of men, they would not have let themselves be persuaded by a male priesthood that anything so contrary to their own holiest instincts as polygamy was the will of God.

The disfranchisement by Congress of all polygamists, both men and women, was in the line of a common practice, i. e., the disfranchisement of law-breakers as a punishment. But the subsequent disfranchisement of all the Gentile women and non-polygamous Mormon women of Utah was a gross injustice. It was taking away the suffrage from voters who had been guilty of no crime, simply because the central government did not like the ticket the majority of them voted. There could hardly be a worse precedent. But the conditions in Utah were so peculiar that the experiment there has little value. The only complaint made against the women was that they voted the Mormon ticket. Now, whatever criticisms may be passed upon the women of this country in general, no one will claim that American women, outside of Utah, would be likely to vote for Mormonism.

Dr. Buckley claims that in Wyoming the population is too small for the experiment to have any value. In the early years of woman suffrage in Wyoming the testimony in regard to it was conflicting, and every unfavorable rumor was eagerly seized upon by the opponents of equal rights, and was claimed as proving a great deal, although the population was much smaller then than now. Dr. Buckley quotes as highly significant the fact that there was some cheating done by women eighty-seven years ago in a little New Jersey town containing "about three hundred voters." But when equal suffrage works well to-day in a community of sixty thousand people he asserts that the number of persons concerned is too small to have any significance.

A unanimous vote of the last Wyoming House of Representatives testified to the good effects of equal suffrage. Dr. Buckley intimates that the legislators would not dare to vote otherwise, for fear of their constituents. But this is only throwing the difficulty one step farther back. How do their constituents come to be in favor of woman suffrage unless it works well? Moreover, testimony to its good effects has been given by all the territorial governors of Wyoming for twenty years. Governors of territories are appointed by the President, not elected by the people; hence their testimony is impartial. It is reinforced by similar testimony from judges, judges' wives, clergymen of many denominations, presiding elders and dignitaries of all sorts. On the other hand, the suffragists have for years had a standing challenge out, inviting their opponents to find two persons in all Wyoming who will assert over their own names and addresses that equal suffrage has had any bad results. The opponents have thus far failed to respond.

Dr. Buckley ignores the experience of England altogether. In Great Britain two hundred thousand women enjoy municipal suffrage upon the same terms as men. They have had it for many years. Mr. Gladstone acknowledges that they have exercised it "without detriment, and with great advantage." Lady Randolph Churchill and the band of highly conservative English women who a few years ago published a remonstrance against the granting of Parliamentary suffrage to women, were careful to explain that they had no objection to municipal suffrage, and even thought its responsibilities had exerted a beneficial effect on the characters of women. In short, wherever woman suffrage has been tried the disastrous predictions of its opponents have thus far failed to be realized

THE COMING OF CRISES.

BY MINNIE E. BIRD.

Among the Ohio hills there flows for sixty miles or more, with many sharp curves, one of the most beautiful of western rivers. At one point in its course, a little Saint's Rest of a city has thrown half a dozen bridges across it, bridges from which the most charming views present themselves continually. I leaned over one of these bridges in a yellow sunset not long since, to watch a tiny boat in the water below. At the foot of the pier beneath me a quantity of drift had collected, and, held between the shore and the pier, it had acquired firmness and considerable mass.

While I stood, an empty, broken bird's nest, making its way quietly along in the water, touched the end of a log, stopped, turned about and joined itself to the driftwood.

I had seen great trunks of trees and shocks of grain go whirling and driving by at other times, when the river bottoms were deep under water, and the force of the current swept everything before it like some mighty zeitgeist, in which the thoughts of the common people and the quiet people are started from unknown corners to be scattered and flung broadcast.

It is when great currents are sweeping in human affairs that "the gods let loose a great thinker" here and there; but great currents are a long time forming, and the things which add terror to their mighty flow are the drift of long periods, wherein each day's reckoning is added, as individual units sweep silently and certainly toward kindred units.

An individual unit is a preposterously small matter when it stands alone and against the existing order; and a bird's nest afloat in a river is a wondrously small thing as well, and yet it changed, infinitesimally, the outline of the drift, and added an atom to the mass of it.

It is one of Drummond's suggestive thoughts, that when we meet our friends at dinner, we are not a simple unit, but a composite of all the events and personalities that have touched us the whole day long. In the light of that thought, we are indebted to the last human atom whether we will or not, whether we like it or not, and so humble a thing as one man's opinion adds its own weight, however much or little, to the slowly-forming vox populi.

The current of social conditions is growing ominously swift and strong in these closing years of 1800. Whether it will presently be strong enough to sweep and scatter the gathering people's voice, as the winds scatter seeds afar to bear fruit, or whether it shall remain for God's dynamite to break up the accumulation of long days, as it has done before, is not yet made manifest, but this much is clear to see, that

> "Times like these demand
> Strong minds, great hearts and ready hands;
> Men whom the lust of office does not kill,
> Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy,
> Tall men who live above the fog
> In public duty and in private thinking."

One of the striking miners in an Ohio town, entered a large milling establishment recently and asked for flour, saying payment would be made for him at a certain date, and that his children were hungry.

"And my children," came the stern answer, "through these weeks of cold rain are cold. I'll give you any price for coal, but you need not ask me for flour while my children are shivering."

The "brotherhood of man" is still some distance from realization, and Christian men are still praying, many of them, what I heard from a pulpit not long since: "Let us forget the world and the things of the world, and meditate only upon thee," as if a father were to say, "I shall forget all about these children of mine with their needs and their desires and their little hurts and heartaches, and give myself to-day to pious reflection upon the paternal relation."

Almost every interest, certainly every moneyed interest, has stood as a factor in the politics of our Christian government; everything is represented except organized goodness. If goodness is too good to present a solid front as becomes a solid fact in the actual six-day life of men, it does not seem an altogether substantial or essential thing; and truly there is a vast body of men in our Christian land, outside our churches, but inside our politics, who do not so regard it.

The Christian citizenship of the country, as such, places itself voluntarily on the back seat, occupied (involuntarily in some cases) by "criminals and imbeciles and lunatics and women." The order to which we are accustomed comes in time to commend itself; and we are so long accustomed to meeting the good man, lay and clerical, in religious conventions, that we bend very grave regards upon him when he appears in a political convention. Still we regret that such an editorial as the following from the Journal and Messenger of June 7, should close where it does.

Every little while some good man pops up and tells us that the way to reform city government is for good men to go to the primaries. Let the minister go to the primaries in Cincinnati. When he gets within one hundred feet of the voting place he will meet a man who will hand him a printed ticket containing the names of the men whom the central committee, the party bosses, or men who hold office or live by politics, have prepared for him. He can carry it to the voting place and go home. We hope he will feel better. Precisely the same men will be nominated as if he had not gone, but the result will not be precisely the same. The party bosses will be enabled to point to the unusually large vote polled, and will use the minister's presence there as an argument for supporting the ticket the minister helped to nominate by carrying the piece of paper they gave him to the polling place. Of all humbugs this notion that good men can reform city government by going to the primaries is the most laughable.

This is as if a physician should say, "Sir, you have pleurisy," and immediately get into his carriage and drive home. We want a physician to cure us as well as tell us our ailment. Of the two, we would rather he should cure us and not tell us than tell us and not cure us!

If the good man's ballot does not signify at the primary what is behind the primary? Is the nominating convention the starting point? There must be a starting point somewhere. If the good man can not get his vote to count for his own conviction anywhere he might almost as well be a woman!

Since "the good man at the primaries to reform city government is a laughable humbug," what is the procedure which will reform city government in a common sense and direct way? How can good men make themselves felt in their community?

In Dr. Parkhurst "the gods let loose a great thinker," and he found a way; but there are myriads among "the plain people," who, with all their hearts, desire the dawn of better days, and have only their votes to speak for them. If these cannot avail their weight can only flow to the forming of people's voice, while Rum and Rule, the two hands of the American plutocracy, go on placing the political pieces. And one day God will speak, as history has heard Him speak, out of the people's voice.

A NEW PROHIBITION REGION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—"Go West, young man, go West," has always created in me a shivering sense of banishment, and revived a verdict I once heard—"A region hard on horses and women." But the inexorable propensity in human nature "to experience our own experiences" recently set in motion a long intention to accept an invitation to see what sort of a corner of the earth New Mexico is—and I've had enough surprises to fill a volume since the friendly faces of our editorial sanctum bade me "Godspeed" in the gloaming in Chicago, October 9.

Obliteration of time and space went on dreamily and luxuriously in the well-appointed sleeper, as we whirled through Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma and Texas. Joy in my native land, its vast resources, wonderful beauty, rapid development, tireless energy engrossed me every hour. I sat one day wrapped in the opal, crysolite, emerald, sardonyx tints that swathe the undulating expanses of Kansas,—palpitating, living color, pulsing, paling, flashing, an overflow from the glory of the Beyond. A speck came upon the rolling distance; it grew, it moved; unwavering motion, steady progress; a flash of red, a sheen of blue not steeped in mountain mists; every car window had a face in it. Can it be possible "the eternal feminine draweth on"—on a bicycle, over a Kansas plain with not a habitation in sight! Deep dejection reigned—in the smoking car—the woman question was settled,—and that woman wheeled calmly on east, and the train west, their backs to each other.

The valley of the Rio Pecos River is a vast plateau, more than two hundred miles in length, with an average width of ten miles. It is from 3,200 to about 4,000 feet above sea level, with an atmosphere between the airs of heaven and that "Isle of June," in the Bahamas, which has become such a resort for invalids and pleasure seekers. Every morning of the past week the mercury has stood at sixty-eight degrees on the sunny veranda of the hotel in Eddy, and at sixty-three degrees on the shady side. The air is so pure and dry it is not worth while to bury cattle that get tired of living. It is the "Sunshine Land" in truth, yet there is none of the "land-where-'tis-always-afternoon" air of places of less altitude, and though it has clouded and rained lightly every day the rainfall is so slight and uncertain that the valley depends entirely on irrigation for its crops.

Mexican laborers are a picturesque addition to these scenes. The men are very clean in appearance, but the women are inexpressibly dirty in their mud and canvas homes. They form but a floating part of the population, employed mainly on public works. One cannot help doubting if the religion Cortez grafted with fire and sword on these gentle-mannered people has done more for them than the worship of their ancient Mexitl, especially as under his shrine the young man or woman who became drunken on pulque was clubbed or stoned to death, and only the sick or the aged were allowed its use, except at high feasts.

Some other surprises await the tourist in these parts. First, a sense of great altitude, and the consciousness of sticking like a fly on the surface of the globe in its splendid movement among the spheres, which must be partly the result of an unbroken horizon line, an unusual fact in any scenery. Next, the men are at least five times more in number than the women, and are largely young men. If they keep abreast of the day's progress they will insist that their first state constitution—to be framed next June—shall have no sex limitation for citizenship. Thirdly, that so many cultured people so soon have found their way from the old states to this frontier. The peculiarly favorable air for cure of asthma and pulmonary diseases has attracted many, but a main reason will be revealed in the following attractions for the best class of settlers, which accounts also for the universal attention and respect I have received as a white-ribboner.

The first impression made on the traveler in this valley is of the first-class character of all the improvements, the order, system and beauty everywhere apparent. One looks in vain for the crudeness of a new country, and chief of all one misses the open saloon.

Nothing has ever impressed me with the god-like power of man to transform the face of nature like his application of irrigation to the waste places of the earth. By it he makes an arid region blossom, to feed and furnish homes to thousands, luxury and plenty to reign where famine desolated. The man who can do this stands like a creator for his race.

A few days ago I was driving among these wonderful farms. El Capitain, 11,000 feet high, stood in the foreground forty miles away; sixty-five miles off the snow-capped peaks of the Rockies outlined against the sky at a height of 14,000 feet. Just as the sun was sinking in the west the full moon rose in the east. Not an obstruction broke the perfect circle of the horizon. "From glory unto glory!" was all my heart could utter. As one glory sinks from sight another rises by love of the dear God for His children and His worlds. All about were the cattle of the plains—beautiful, sleek, human-eyed creatures, over whom the Creator has given us dominion. In this flood of golden light all living things were kin, man and worm but links in one chain.

As we drove on in the splendor of the west, it seemed as if the kingdom of heaven would have already come, did men use the generous gifts of Mother Earth in the unselfish large-mindedness with which they are given. The shadow of our industrial problem settled over me as I passed into the shadow of the hotel doorway, and I wondered how many processes of evolution society must yet pass through before a man learns to think of "t'otherest" first.

ITINERATING IN JAPAN.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Our dearly-loved friend, Mrs. Russell, an English lady of the China Inland mission, with whom we spent the week at Chefoo, came out to the steamship, Satsuma Maru, to see us off when we left for Japan by way of Corea. The prospect of the voyage was not a bright one. The ship officers were extremely busy finding room on deck for fifteen hundred Chinese, who were going to Corea for employment. The boat seemed to groan and sway under its heavy load. and we saw at once that we must be confined below throughout the passage. The captain—a good one—was thoroughly irritated that the company should compel him thus to overload his vessel, and told us frankly that under the circumstances he regretted that we had decided to share the annoyances of the voyage with him. A little later and a missionary couple with a baby joined us for the trip across.

With homesick hearts we waved our handkerchiefs in good-bye to Mrs. Russell. Why did we linger so and so sadly? We could not turn away until far away in the distance we fancied we caught the last faint waving on the shore nearly two miles off. It was as though we knew it was to be the long farewell. How strangely and half-unconsciously we divine these things! And her last words to us in this life were singularly appropriate for one close to the eternal shore! She had left the ringing message in our ears: "Remember, we are to be saved far above all principalities and powers." In another month Mrs. Russell had gone into the realities "far above."

The food on board the vessel was poor and the service, too. A heavy storm came on and we were so top-heavy that the boat rocked first to this side and then to that, as an object of interest drew the Chinese here and there on the deck above us. The cold was severe and the rain beat pitilessly on them, while the disorder and stench of so many human beings crowded together made it impossible to remain on deck in the fresh air. Our fellow passengers were dreadfully sick, and we, although not seasick, were, after a few hours, prostrated by bad air, poor food and the tossing of the vessel in the storm. We had one dreadful night when in the midst of the raging storm there came a shock and a crash and the machinery stopped. Immediately the vessel began to sink on one side and was caught by the high billows and dashed about like an egg-shell. I called to Mrs. Andrew above the noise of the storm and the creaking boat, "Did you feel that, are you awake?" "Yes," she replied, "and it is the first time I have ever really felt death to be near us at sea; that was an awful shock and this is a dreadful sea!" We laid still and commended ourselves to God. Then we heard the pounding of the engine begin and the boat righting itself to a level position, with a sense of relief from suspense. Doubtless the tipping of the boat to one side had been due to the startled Chinese running to the side on which the shock was felt to see what was the matter. The next morning at the breakfast table the officers, in answer to our eager questions, acknowledged the unusual crash and the stopping of the engine, but would not explain to us the cause, and we shall never know what happened. Undoubtedly the moment had been very critical. We were at the time in the Korean Archipelago, not far from Chemulpu, on an exceedingly dangerous coast, and the ship which followed ours over the same path only a few hours later was obliged to run close to the shore and anchor for safety under the shelter of some high cliffs which broke the force of the wind.

We reached Nagasaki Sunday afternoon and were delighted to be met promptly by Miss French, of the Methodist mission, Miss Julia Howe, one of the Chinese girls of the Kin Kiang mission, whom I had known as a child of six or seven, years before, and O Mut San, vice-president of the Nagasaki W. C. T. U., the president, Ma Sui San, being away from home on a gospel temperance and evangelistic trip with Miss Gheer, of the Methodist mission. We were pretty thoroughly worn out by our Chinese work and the rough passage across to Japan, and found it necessary to take a week's rest, not having any meetings until the end of that time. But even after that we found the work exceedingly irksome in our worn out condition. We were greatly encouraged by the evidences that the faithful missionaries, Miss Russell and Miss Gheer, were giving thorough training in W. C. T. U. methods to a number of unusually gifted as well as well educated Japanese young women. Mrs. Van Petten was also for the time at Nagasaki—an enthusiastic worker of the W. C. T. U. who traveled with Miss West and helped her greatly in her Japanese labors. Miss French is nearer than the others to the mission field, but is laying foundations deep and strong for a magnificent career. Ma Sui San, the president, we did not meet personally, but all accounts of her are to the effect that she is doing good work, the scope of which is enlarging all the time. The thoroughness of the training she is getting, and the substantial character of the work she is entering upon as an evangelist of the W. C. T. U., are causes of deep thankfulness to us, in a land which is blighted more or less by evidences of fatal shallowness in all its good intentions. If Japan ever comes to destruction—and God grant she never may—it will be because of such an intense desire to make a display that she has not the patience to look to the substance of her seemings.

From Nagasaki we sailed to Kobe where we found a brave, talented Japanese sister, Mrs. Yo Kota, the president of the W. C. T. U., with a good corps of members fighting against many odds to maintain the integrity and acquire the methods of real W. C. T. U. work.

THE WHITE-RIBBONERS' SUFFRAGE WORK IN NEW YORK.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Toward the constitutional convention we have directed our thoughts and our efforts for the past six months. Petition work was inaugurated upon a vast scale and carried on by all women who were believers in equal franchise. In a few weeks the state was humming like a vast bee-hive over the all-absorbing topic. It was exploited in the newspapers, from the village locals to the great dailies of the metropolis. It was discussed from the pulpit and the platform. It invaded the inmost penetralia of "society," and was the theme of innumerable parlor meetings. It captured the shop and the market-place. It won the allegiance of a multitude of women hitherto indifferent or opposed, and absolutely unified the progressive women of the state, fusing diverse aims and opinions and lukewarm interest into a white heat of enthusiasm.

Yet that which was foreordained by the politicians came to pass August 15, 1894, by a vote of ninety-seven to fifty-eight. The convention denied the prayer of that great army of citizens, for submission to a popular vote, and virtually declared that the "sacred right of petition" was not one which a constitutional convention was bound to respect, when the petition concerned women. This bitter experience ought to burn indelibly into our consciousness the conviction that a ballotless woman is a powerless woman in government; that she must stand, evermore, a suppliant in legislative halls and receive, in grateful humility, the crumbs of civil justice which the governing sex may have the grace and graciousness to bestow as a favor, but never as a right. That is what the convention by its action has said to the women of New York.

And what are we going to do about it? Are we so weak in faith, so infirm in purpose, as to be ready now, after this one brief campaign, to furl our colors, ground arms, and sign articles of unconditional surrender? No! a thousand times, no! The constitutional convention has died a natural death, but the legislature flourishes in perennial youth.

If one tribunal will not do us justice we will appeal to another, as Paul appealed to Cæsar. We will lay freshly to heart the parable of the unjust judge who said: "Though I fear not God, nor regard man, yet because this widow troubleth me I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she weary me."

Whatever politician is hugging to his soul the fond belief that equal franchise met its Waterloo in that convention is cherishing the colossal delusion of his life. Why, the women of New York have been led up to the very ballot-box and then rebuffed. The cup has been offered to their lips and then dashed away. Some of us, fifteen thousand at least, have actually held in our hands the white symbol of American sovereignty. We have tasted of the forbidden fruit; we have breathed for a moment in a new and bracing atmosphere. To permit us that one deep breath of the air of civil liberty was a fatal mistake, if they meant only to rerivet our political fetters.

The policy of repression is as shortsighted as it is selfish, and as perilous as it is unstatesmanlike. The national sky is dark with the clouds of social unrest. The air is heavy with portent. A fathomless political corruption has poisoned the founts of national life and tainted all the blood of the body politic. In this ever deepening crisis all women who are capable of a patriot's devotion must surely come to feel that life could scarcely lay upon them a more sacred duty than to thus minister, with pure hands, at their country's altar and to bring into our political life that saving moral force, the lack of which may yet doom the Republic. Except for the eternal salvation of human souls, I devoutly believe that there is not under the bending heavens a more holy cause; for woman's ballot might be the key to all public reforms and the weapon wherewith to smite down every evil that flourishes under the shadow of law.

We have no right to lose heart because our first real campaign did not carry everything before it. I believ that the hand of God was in that seeming defeat; that He who makes the wrath of men to praise Him, held us back in His all seeing wisdom, from what might have been a crushing defeat at the polls, and that this delay only gives us the needed time in which to so mold public sentiment that when the amendment shall be submitted we can command a majority of the voters. Our duty is to do our utmost and leave the issue to Him.

The present hour is brimming with opportunities, and full of good cheer. Kansas stands at the gate. Our sisters in Colorado and in far New Zealand have lately come into their kingdom. England is all astir. The dawn of woman's day, which means a better day for man, and the domination of material forces by forces spiritual, brightens all the firmament. Let us give thanks for Colorado, and pray for Kansas—pray in dollars if we can—and work for New York, and believe that our labor cannot be in vain.

"The flowing tide is with us," and every wave-beat on the shore of Time marks a higher water level of civilization. And every pulse of humanity's great heart, ever yearning and aspiring toward the ideal, brings nearer that golden age yet to come on the earth, when the aristocracy of sex shall vanish, when man and woman together shall build the home and the state and reign again, joint sovereigns, over the realm ceded to them in Eden.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICES AT THE NATIONAL.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—So many letters are coming to me in reference to the devotional hours at the Cleveland Convention, that I venture to answer them all at once through our valued paper. After conference with Miss Willard and the executive committee, it has been thought best to divide the service, holding a Convention prayer-meeting each morning from 8:30 to 9:30, and a half hour of devotion or Bible reading from 11:45 to 12:15. The appointing of leaders for these services has been left entirely with the National evangelistic superintendent. Though urged to take several services, I have invited ten ladies to lead these ten meetings, feeling that the responsibility and privilege should be shared. Some of these are from the ranks of our National evangelists; others are new in our work.

Uncertain as to my own presence at the Convention, I here urge the delegates to make these hours a power. We abandoned the devotional hour at the opening of our Convention, because it was practically a failure. Confusion abounded—reverent worship was impossible—delegates, committees, officers and citizens could not attend, and an impression was given that this service was of less importance than the routine of business. After consultation with Miss Willard, Hannah Whitall Smith and others, it was placed at eleven o'clock, and was so blessed at the Atlanta Convention as to be adopted by the executive committee. But the press of business has so crowded it out, sometimes entirely, that the superintendent has in three conventions besought the committee to consider and decide this whole matter.

At the recent meeting of the society of Christian Endeavor in Cleveland, the early morning devotional hours were crowded, and great power and enthusiasm were manifested. Let us go to our National Convention determined to sacrifice, if needs be, that these hours, set apart to seek the vision of His face, shall bring rich blessing to our hearts, our work and the city in which we meet.

Yours in His service,
ELIZABETH W. GREENWOOD,
World's and National Supt. of Evangelistic Work.

ANOTHER TEMPERANCE SHIP.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The triumph of principle over established customs was manifested to a high degree recently in the young but prosperous and enterprising city of Ashland, Wis. One of its indefatigable citizens, Commander E. A. Shores, already the owner of several fine lumber carrying boats, has added another, larger and better, to the little fleet.

The vessel is also one of the largest and best on the lakes, laden as it was on its first trip with 1,110,000 feet of lumber. It is, therefore, with no little pride that the friends of temperance point to this stanch and noble craft as the day-star of their cause, in that she was launched into the blue waters of Lake Michigan to take up the useful work that lies before her, with the immaculate, artistically arranged white ribbon swaying to the breeze, indicating in its graceful waves the glorious device: "For God and Home and Every Land."

Nor is this all. In the early twilight in the presence of the three hundred guests of Mr. and Mrs. Shores, their young daughter, Bessie, christened the brave vessel Adella Shores, in honor of their eldest daughter, by breaking, not a bottle of champagne, but of pure artesian water, decorated with the significant white ribbon. A new era of the temperance reformation has dawned upon the world. The wine of centuries upon centuries indispensable on occasions like this has at last given place to water, pure, cold water from nature's bounteous well; the nectar, not of the gods, but the crystal fountain from "the sacred spring whence right and honor stream"; the "beverage of life," the health-giving water of heaven; the delicate "spray" of the triune God, who, in His beneficence, generates the raindrop that glimmers in the sunshine, produces the pearly dewdrop that nestles among the leaves and flowers; forms the sparkling stalactite that captivates the eye, moulds the symmetrical hailstone than which nothing can be more perfect; brings forth the beauteous bands of the rainbow that spans the cloudy sky; blends the rich colors of the spectrum in the transparent bubble that is shrouded in mystery; causes the perpetual spring that neither frost nor drought can quench; creates the shining rill that flows on and on, nourishing the earth, ever gathering strength until even the rocks on either side of the mighty cliff tell in silent eloquence of the action of the waters for ages upon ages, and is finally spent in the "mighty ocean."

A delightful program and reception followed, in which among many choice numbers, Rev. Mr. Wright responded to the sentiment, "Cold water and the white ribbon," by saying: "I think the white ribbon and pure water are appropriate symbols for this occasion. The white ribbon, the symbol of purity and the badge of the society in which our hostess is so much interested, is exceptionally appropriate in launching forth the 'bride of the sea.' The pure water, too, is appropriate instead of the time-worn custom of breaking a bottle of wine on the bow in christening the bride. The pure, cold water God has supplied us with so bounteously, so sparkling and so unadulterated is used to signify the proper relation the bride should sustain to the great waters. May the good ship always be characterized by those things of which the white ribbon and pure water are symbols."

May the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Ashland long enjoy the presidency of one so devoted as Mrs. Shores to the high and noble principles inculcated by that incomparable society of true Christian Endeavor.

NUMERICALLY IMPOSSIBLE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Alice Stone Blackwell's articles on "Bishop Vincent versus Equal Suffrage" in your paper quote some words of the Bishop's which remind me of a like statement of his that I saw in a Methodist paper some years ago and which I answered at the time in a local publication. The matter may have some interest for THE UNION SIGNAL readers, who have been giving attention to Alice Blackwell's late articles.

The Bishop's words at that time were as follows: "A woman who cannot train boys and influence brothers and husbands to vote in the interests of mothers, sisters, wives and daughters is neither worthy nor competent to vote herself. The lack of moral influence in the one case unfits her to act in the others. A woman who cannot under our present civilization control from one to six votes would not make much by being able to deposit one, and might, from her so-called gain, lose from one to five votes."

To which I replied, "I will not dwell upon the fact that this rule of fitness for voting would, if applied to men, disenfranchise most of them, but do wish to note the insult to men that the doctor's words hold; for it is an insult to the intellect and judgment of a voter to say that any other person, no matter how worthy, can control his vote as though it were that person's own vote. Mind, Dr. Vincent does not say 'influence,' he says 'control,' and speaks in such a way as to indicate that the woman is to control the man's vote as completely as though she went to the polls and voted herself. Any woman of honorable womanhood would be ashamed to number among the half dozen men who stood nearest her socially, even one voter who could be so 'controlled.' But it was the numerical size and form of the statement that astonished me. I have not studied the census returns very carefully, nevertheless, I am not entirely ignorant regarding the population of the country, and how one woman could 'control' five or six voters and still leave half a dozen other voters for each other woman in the land to 'control' is beyond my comprehension."

When a man of Dr. Vincent's ability will make statements so numerically impossible, what can we think but that his prejudices have run away with his judgment but perhaps he would not make such a statement now.

FOR NEW YORK VOTEES.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—At the annual election in the state of New York, in November, there is to be submitted to a vote of the qualified electors a revised and amended constitution.

To the delegates making this revision there was presented an unusually large number of petitions, numerously signed, asking for two very important things, viz., the granting the right of franchise to women by striking from the constitution the word "male"; and some enactment that should curtail or eliminate the almost overruling power of the iniquitous liquor traffic. The prayer of all these petitions was very emphatically denied. In view of the summary manner in which the expressed wishes upon temperance and equal suffrage were ignored by the convention can the friends of these important questions be true to themselves and their duty to the cause unless they promptly and unitedly vote against the adoption of this constitution? Can we in any more emphatic manner express our dissent from the action of the convention?

Buffalo, N. Y. H. C. WHITE.

FOR ILLINOIS WOMEN.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I suggest that every white-ribboner of Illinois write, or see that the secretary of her union writes, to the candidates in her district for the state legislature in the Republican, Democratic and Populist party, asking if they will vote for, and use their influence, if elected, for the passage of a bill giving women township suffrage. Also if they favor an amendment to the constitution of the state giving them complete suffrage. Also ask their views of universal suffrage. I suggest that they write out each of the three questions separately and leave a space of three or four lines after each for the answer.

The candidates will commit themselves before election, and they will, I think, give favorable responses not, but vague after awhile. We will have them on record, with their own signatures, which will be good ammunition for our lobbyists at Springfield when the legislature meets.

Yours truly, J. H. FINCHER.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

And he said unto them, Why are ye so fearful? How is it that ye have no faith? And they feared exceedingly, and said one to another, What manner of man is this, that even the wind and the sea obey him?—Mark 4:40, 41.

Lack of faith to-day is the great stumbling block to the progress of Christ's kingdom and the success of those things which make for righteousness. One true soul, imbued with faith, goes on undaunted in the face of mountains of difficulty and comes out victorious, while the timid and fearful faint and fall by the way overcome by the first hindrance. We have held up Miss Jane Weeden as a noble example of what a woman can accomplish when imbued with faith and love for a holy cause. Long past life's prime, without influential friends or a dollar she can call her own, she has raised over two thousand dollars for the Temple.

Many will say it has not been so difficult for her, as she had no husband, children or household cares to trammel her in the work. We have, then, a woman of a different type to present who possesses youth, a home, a husband, social position, with moderate means. She has suffered much from ill-health, nevertheless she has accomplished great things for the Temple. Mrs. Evelyn N. Graham, president of the W. C. T. U. of Newark, Ohio, is the name of this noble woman. She called at the Temple the other day and left $69 which completes $100 to put the name of her husband beside her own on a tablet in Willard Hall. This makes $700 she has secured for the Temple, and $100 was her own personal gift. The rest she has raised through wearisome toil—giving entertainments and presenting the interests of the Temple before white-ribboners and the public. She has set her heart on completing a round thousand for the "House Beautiful," and there is not a doubt but she will accomplish it, as nothing is impossible to a self-sacrificing heart imbued with faith.

Without doubt large sales will be made for the Christmas holidays, of the three beautiful articles offered by the Columbia publisher, "The Temple edition of the Ladies' Household Repository," the "Educational Checker Game," and the "Game of Pixies," all for one dollar. Either one of these would make a lovely Christmas gift. The unions throughout the country are to be the agents for their sale. It will be easy to secure a hundred sales. This will net the union or the individual who makes the sale twenty dollars—after this is deducted one half the net profit goes to the Temple fund and the other half to the Columbia publisher. Let all unions who want to aid themselves and the Temple send for documents and further particulars to Miss Sara G. Johnson, Room 1113, the Temple.

The Evansville, Wis., W. C. T. U. are hard at work raising their hundred dollar pledge; undaunted by the hard times, they sent $10 towards it in July, and have now sent another installment of $33. Harvey, Ill., W. C. T. U. sends $8.10 on their pledge. A mother in Israel, Mrs. Susan P. Anderson, eighty-three years old, sends $1 of the above amount. The Brookings, S. D., W. C. T. U. have paid $60.25 on their pledge, their last installment was $10.25. Delevan county, Iowa's last installment on their pledge was $15. The eleventh district of Iowa sends $7. Mrs. J. B. Shesler sends $1 towards Iowa state tablet. Strawberry Point, Iowa, W. C. T. U., sends $10. Syracuse, N. Y., union sends $10 on pledge. The Walkill, N. Y., union sends $45 on their pledge. The superintendent of Temple work, Mrs. L. I. Johnson, Cortland, N. Y., sends $18.65; $15 of this amount is to apply on the pledge of Cortland county, New York. The W. C. T. U. and the Y's of Chatham, N. Y., sent a check for $20. The East Lincoln, Neb., W. C. T. U. sends $20 to be applied on the Stoner memorial tablet. Mrs. Kate B. Northup, state treasurer Nebraska, sends $5 which will be itemized in the financial secretary's report. Mrs. S. D. Whitney, Mrs. S. C. Lackie and Mrs. J. P. Hill, Petaluma, Cal., each send $5, making $15, which they desire to be credited to Sonoma county, California, W. C. T. U. Mrs. Charity E. Way sends $25 on a pledge of $100, from the El Modena, Cal., W. C. T. U.

We again desire to remind those who are filling mite-boxes that if they want the Temple souvenir spoon for Christmas they will kindly notify us by postal at once, so we may know how many spoons to order. Mrs. E. A. Ransom, Lockport, N. Y., writes: "This week I received one of your lovely souvenir spoons, which now lies before me. It is truly beautiful in both design and finish, and far exceeds my expectations." Mrs. I. W. Cheever, Hamilton, Canada, sent $5 to the Temple, in return for which we sent her a spoon. She writes: "I gladly paid the thirty per cent duty charged to be in possession of the lovely emblematic spoon, which I highly appreciate." A dear and aged friend who has sent us money before for the Temple, Mrs. S. J. Fosque, Onancock, Va., sends $5 for a spoon. In closing her most kind letter she says: "I hope that all will put their shoulder to the wheel and push on to the complete payment of the Temple." If all white-ribboners had done as much as she, the consummation she desires would be attained. Mrs. Eliza B. Shepard, Niagara Falls, N. Y., writes: "Many thanks for the beautiful souvenir spoon, which I received with a great deal of pleasure; it is a gem."

All persons sending $1 to the Temple will receive the beautiful Columbian souvenir. Any individual who sends the contents of a mite-box, amounting to $3.65, by January 1, 1895, will receive a solid silver Temple souvenir tea-spoon. This, however, does not apply to persons filling boxes for unions; they receive the Columbian souvenir. All money orders and checks should be made out in the name of William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, the Temple, Chicago, Ill.

MARAH AND ELIM.

BY HORATIUS BONAR.

To-day 'tis Elim with its palms and wells
  And happy shade for desert weariness;
'Twas Marah yesterday, all rock and sand
  Unshaded solitude and bitterness.
Yet the same desert holds them both the same,
  Soft breezes wander o'er the lonely ground,
The same low stretch of valley shelters both
  And the same mountains compass them around.

So is it with us here on earth, and so
  I do remember it has ever been;
The bitter and the sweet, the grief and joy
  Lie near together, but a day between.
Sometimes God turns our bitter into sweet,
  Sometimes He gives us pleasant water-springs;
Sometimes He shades us with His pillar cloud,
  And sometimes to a blessed palm shade brings.

What matters it? the time will not be long,
  Marah and Elim will alike be past,
Our desert wells and palms will soon be gone,
  We reach the city of our God at last.
Oh, happy land, beyond these lonely hills!
  Where gush in joy the everlasting springs.
Oh, holy Paradise above these heavens!
  Where we shall end our desert wanderings.

MY CRAFTY NEIGHBOR.

BY ELIZABETH PRESTON ALLAN.

"You must have your new neighbors to dine, my dear," said Stephen. "How would Thursday do?"

I had always made a point of responding cordially to any such proposal from my husband. He worked hard for his family, and provided liberally. I thought it was as little as he had a right to expect that he should be free to throw open his door, at any time of the day or night, to whatever guests he might choose to invite. And ten years' trial of this plan had assured me that Stephen had more pleasure and satisfaction in our simple village home, than many others who own palaces and villas and yachts galore. But I did not enjoy the prospect of having our new neighbors, the Seldons. They were people of good family and comfortable circumstances, past middle life, who had spent twenty or thirty years in the organized work of some charitable association in the city. The husband's health had broken down, and they had rented the pretty cottage next to ours for a year. There was no objection to charitable associations, of course. Dear me, no! Stephen and I contributed regularly to that sort of thing, and got reports by the dozen—which we never read. But you can see for yourself that this is not the kind of people one cares to meet in society. However—I agreed to the Thursday dining, and then wondered who should be asked to meet the new people. They did not attend our church, which was the prominent one in the village, but still, it might not be out of place to ask Dr. Brosins and his wife, and then I would have that pastoral business off my mind, anyhow. I picked out two other couples that I was in debt to, socially, and wrote the cards. They all accepted.

"What about the wines, Steve?" I asked. "I have heard that these people are cranks on temperance, and I don't know, either, whether it is just the thing to have wine with Dr. Brosins at the table, it might embarrass him."

"I would not ask people to my house," answered Stephen, rather haughtily, "who could be guilty of the rudeness of objecting to my customs. They need not drink wine unless they choose; there will be water, I suppose."

My table was laid with ten covers, and looked as dainty and stylish as possible. The bowl of scarlet poppies in the center gave the color tone, and no china was used that was not red and white. The name card on each plate had its Shakespeare quotation in red letters, and the initial on the napkins was embroidered in red floss. Although these people were from the city, I flattered myself they would not find my entertainment provincial. As a matter of fact, it was a charming success, but I could not help owning to myself that the charm lay mainly in the new neighbors. They were not in the least stylish, in manner or appearance, but they were altogether delightful, both as talkers and listeners. So far from talking "shop," as I had feared, it was a little hard to draw them out on the subject of their life work, but when once fairly launched the story was so thrillingly interesting that I almost forgot to watch and direct the movement of the dinner; nothing seemed to me to make any difference, except to hear more of the pitiful lives of that "other half," and the inspiring record of how certain brave and lofty souls were trying to help them.

Let me see—what was I going to tell you about this dinner party? Oh, yes, it was a very small thing, but it was the beginning of a great change in my life. When Charles went round with the napkined bottle, both my strangers (and Dr. Brosins, of course,) turned their pretty, wide-lipped glasses down.

"Won't you have your glass filled, Mr. Seldon?" Stephen asked cordially, and I mentally patted him on the back for keeping the slightest shade of insistence out of his voice.

"Not any, thank you," answered our neighbor, but nobody could have told whether it was because he meant to drink water or sherry. However, when the decanter was pushed across the table, that was declined, too. We saw a great deal of the Seldons. Stephen and I found ourselves getting more intimate with them, and really more attached to these two dear old people than we could have thought possible in such a short time.

"One thing constantly surprises me about Mrs. Seldon, Steve," I said to my husband, "she never tries to convert me to her way of thinking about things."

"That's because she has some sense," Steve answered.

"No, but really," I insisted, "if I felt as strongly about anything as I know she does about wine drinking, I could not hold my peace, you know; I would just have to lay hold of people about it, especially my friends and neighbors, and very especially younger people, who might be expected to listen to me."

"Well, my fierce little woman, I'm thankful then for every week of the two years' difference in our respective ages; for I am constitutionally opposed to being laid hold of by other people's opinions. By the way, where are you going now?"

"Oh, I am going to drive Mrs. Seldon in the dog cart down to see some of the factory people. She is trying to get some of those cruel fathers and mothers to take the little tots of children away from the factory."

"H'm!" said Stephen, meditatively, "she does lay hold of some people then. Does she address them as cruel fathers and mothers?"

"Oh, you dear old goose! She talks to them in the same sweet friendly way that she talks to me; she doesn't argue a bit, but just asks for these little folks to come to her kindergarten as if she couldn't get along without them, and won't they please do her this favor?"

"H'm!" said Stephen again. "So it is possible for her to treat people just as she treats you, didn't you say, and still think them very wicked. I wonder what she really thinks of you, this crafty old lady over the way?"—The Interior.

"GO FORWARD."

BY REV. HENRY BURTON, M. A.

The hearts of the Hebrews were beating a retreat when this divine voice reached them, and though they could not make a way through the sea they found one already made; for God never summons His people forward but He Himself clears the way. As used by the world, sometimes there is a certain tarnish about the word, as if it were half-related to pertness or to pride, but when we brush from it this soot of earthiness we find in the word a heavenly dove, with wings of silver. Motion, not rest, is heaven's great law, and motion, too, in an ever-ascending scale. We may truthfully say of our Gloria, "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be," for the triune God deserves all doxologies, temporal and eternal alike, but to nothing else, at any rate, nothing that is human, can we apply these words. The "is" is very different from the "was," and the "shall be" will be more diverse still. Revelation itself was a gradual development, the crescent orb "slow rounding" to the full, the old leading up to the new, and finding in the new its large fulfilling. Up through all the dispensations, the patriarchal, the Mosaic, the prophetic, we see the world ever moving on and moving up to its higher, better destiny, not on angel wings, either, but by the slow, successive rounds of the ladder steps. Longfellow puts his "Excelsior" in the lips of a dreamy, romantic youth, who will not but who, despite all allurements and all warnings, climbs up to a cold grave among the snows. It is not the most happy conception, whether we refer it to an upward climbing world or an upward climbing soul, for he who climbs finds opening beauties and an ever-changing music by his path, while a coronation, and not a burial, awaits him at the summit. But "Excelsior" is a good word anywhere; indeed, it is a divine word, heaven's monogram, inwoven in the pages of all the testaments. It is higher, ever higher, and so on towards the Highest, which is God.

Some people live in the past; always "out West" among the sunsets, instead of pitching their tents with Reuben "toward the sunrising." They venerate the past; they color it beautifully, laying the yellow ochre of a vivid imagination over the sober, somber facts of history; and then, like Jephtha's daughter, they go bewailing upon the mountains the decadence of our times! But it requires no deep historical research to find that this is the direct opposite of all the facts. The world's golden age does not lie in the past, but forward somewhere in the future, and though we cannot predate the grand millennium we know this, that each year sets it so much nearer, and that it was never so near as in this 1894. It is true prophecy as well as tr poetry which makes the years

"Ring out a slowly dying cause,
  And ancient forms of party strife;
  Ring in the nobler modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws."

But if such is heaven's law—not motion merely, but promotion, ever forwards and upwards—then this divine idea of forwardness must take possession of us, that is, if we care to observe divine harmonies. There can be no music without time, for if "time is broke and no proportion kept" we have but a jangle of confusion and discord. So, too, in our lives we must keep up to the beat, or we drop a discord into the music at once. If heaven sounds the advance, and we do not respond to it we strike a false discordant note; and if we stand still when heaven's forces move forward we fall out of the ranks, we get behind the music.

In our physical life we cannot help advancing, and in this march there is no halting, no falling to the rear allowed: for in the crowded pathway of human life it is "Move on, move on!" Whether we will or no we have to keep step with the music of the stars and suns, and with the beat of our "muffled drums." Then, too, we need no urging or commanding to step forward in worldly ways, financial or intellectual. The desire for gain, the thirst for knowledge, will be here a constant, impelling force; a sort of hidden spring, wound up by the unseen Hand, to keep our life well forward in activities and all kinds of enterprise.

But our spiritual life should have its advances; and it will have, if it be a true life and not a fictitious one. With some, conversion seems to be the beginning and the end of a Christian experience; and here they rest. They forget that conversion is but the genesis of the new volume; that it is but the birth, and that there are growths and ripenings to follow. Let us be thankful if we know what the "new birth" is, and let us, if possible—though this is not essential—keep up the memories of our birthday; but we must not be always children, our progress nothing more than the forward-backward rocking of the cradle. No; we must "feel our feet," as the mothers say. We must learn to walk, to talk, to reason, to love, to work, and so pass up to the complete manhood, "the stature of the fulness of Christ."

There ought to be in our spiritual life a growing feeling of independence; not an independence of God, but an independence of man and means, so that we can walk alone, if need be, facing quietly but resolutely every opposite drift. Then, too, we should step out of the purely passive voice into the active, learning to help others instead of waiting to be nursed and carried ourselves. He who gives himself up to the great I AM will soon learn to conjugate life's To Be aright, striking off his "I will be" and "I can be" with a kingly emphasis. Then we shall get clear away from Doubting Castle, becoming in fact, what perhaps we were in name before, believers, men of faith, women of faith, living out in modern ways, the eleventh chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews. And how changed will life and service be then! How easy to ourselves and how helpful to others! When our faith is but weak it is like a reed shaken by the wind; it cannot help others and there is nothing so attractive about it as to tempt men out into the wilderness to see it. But the faith that is strong, the love that is ardent—that forgets itself in its ministry for others—prepares in desert places the "way of the Lord," setting men listening for the Christ who must be near.

Shall we not then go forward? Have we not halted long enough, staying on the frontier of our first deliverance, or compassing this or the other mountain in monotonous repetitions? The cloud lifts; shall we not follow it? The Voice speaks; shall we not open the window of our soul and let the divine "Forward!" fall upon our inmost heart, until our whole being vibrates in answering resonance? Shall we not gird up our loins, and striking the tents of self-complacency and ease, reach out for heaven's higher, better things?

GOING TO SCHOOL.

BY MRS. ALBERT L. PRITCHARD.

Grandpapa sits in his warm, cozy place,
Soft evening firelight shines on his face,
Though he is white-haired, by age bent and lame,
Grandpapa still goes to school just the same:
But his long lessons will soon now be done,
His text-books silently closed one by one,
Some of their titles are Pain, Sorrow, Loss.
The first in two volumes and bound with a Cross.
Grievous these lessons, for some they are best,
Lead, grandpapa says, to Love, Joy and Rest,
Without them, these last might sealed volumes be,
The heart from its fetters never made free;
Grandpapa saw, through tears thick as the rain,
Angels of Love turn the pages of pain;
And the dark volume of Sorrow, at length
Learned, with the joy of the Lord for his strength;
When he cried out against direful Loss,
Rest waited for him at the foot of this Cross.
Now sits dear grandpa, his loving bright eyes
Filled with the faith that mounts to the skies;
Look at him well, and consider a life
That shall gain victory after the strife.
"Go, dear Fred, nearer, kiss grandpa good-night, Throw your arms round his neck, and hug him up tight."

"Lesson books learned," grandpa asks, "for to-morrow?
Learning of lessons is sometimes sweet sorrow.
Habits of temperance, like volumes in white,
Keep pure and unsullied, and con with your might,
Never let specks of dust, nor cobwebs so fine,
Spot or weave over them, or aught undermine."
Here grandpapa paused, laid his soft, trembling touch
On head of his grandson, his voice faltered much,
"In going to school, Fred, now hearken and mind,
That the tenderest teacher is the Father so kind."

A MEDAL SPEECH.

[Extract from a speech delivered by ex-Governor St. John in presenting the diamond medal, awarded to Miss Minnie Warren, at the Demorest medal contest, Music Hall, Cincinnati, June 28, 1892.]

We little realize to-day just what all this means. We look upon this young lady, and say with one accord, "Isn't she beautiful?" and, "Wasn't she grand?"

Three thousand bright eyes are now centered on this magnificent, diamond-mounted gold medal. Everybody seems happy; even the defeated contestants who acquitted themselves so nobly, join in their heartiest congratulations.

A generation from now the fact will have fully dawned upon us that back of this young woman, and back of this medal, is a great cause. And two generations hence, the world will know that the cause and inspiration that enabled her to move this great audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm was of God.

It requires no great stretch of imagination to look ahead sixty years, and see the winner of this prize, now still in her "teens," an old, white-haired grandmother, who has passed her three score and ten. It seems we can almost hear her great-grandchildren, as they gather around her, say:

"Grandma, please tell us a story."

"Well, children, what kind of a story would you like?"

"Will grandma tell us about what happened when she was a young lady?"

"Yes, yes, do," cried the rest with one accord.

Without another word of reply she moves slowly across the room, opens the upper drawer of an old-fashioned bureau and takes therefrom a little box, and as the children watch eagerly, she quietly unwraps from around it yards of what was once white cotton tape, but now yellow from age, and at last the box is opened, and from the midst of some more cotton she brings forth this medal.

The children's eyes, as they watch her, fairly stand out as they exclaim, "Oh, grandma, what's that?"

"A Demorest diamond-mounted gold medal, children."

"Demorest, who was Demorest?"

"Why, children, he was a Christian philanthropist, who a long time ago lived in New York city. He was once a poor boy, but by his honest, industrious habits, as he advanced in years, he increased in wealth until he was enabled to spend thousands of dollars annually for the good of humanity. He organized what was then known as the Demorest medal contests. This is one of the medals. I won it when a girl."

"What made that mark on it, grandma?"

"Why, I gave it to Dot's papa to play with when he was cutting his teeth, and he bit it!"

"Oh, the naughty little thing."

"What were the contests all about, grandma?"

"Why, you see, children, Mr. Demorest wanted to get rid of the saloon."

"Saloon? Why, grandma, what's a saloon?"

"Why, the saloon was a place where they used to sell a poisonous drink that made men so crazy that they would rob and steal and murder, and sometimes even kill their own children."

"Oh, my! wasn't that awful? Why did they let them keep such places?"

"The laws authorized them to do it, if they only paid money for it."

"Who made such laws, grandma?"

"The Democrats and Republicans."

"Democrats and Republicans. Why, what's a Democrat, and what's a Republican?"

"Well, children, they belonged to political tribes that used to inhabit this country, but they are extinct now."

"Don't they have 'em in the circus, grandma?"

"No."

"Oh, how we wish we could see just one."

"If ever you visit Washington City, children, you can see a few specimens of mummified Republicans in Smithsonian Institute."

"Well, aren't there Democrats there, too, grandma?"

"No, they couldn't preserve them; they tried it, but they wouldn't keep."

"But were there no churches then?"

"Yes, children."

"Well, what did they do, grandma?"

"They passed resolutions."

"What did the preachers do?"

"Why, most of them said they were holy men of God, and didn't want to mix politics with religion."

"Well, you mixed 'em, didn't you, grandma?"

"Yes, children."

"Did grandpa mix 'em too?"

"Well, children, it has been a long time since then, and your grandma's memory is not as good as it used to be, but I can say that your grandpa said grace and held family prayers twice a day and was always very kind to me."

"What became of Mr. Demorest, grandma?"

"He went to heaven long ago, and to-day in Central Park, New York, is a monument upon which is inscribed:

"IN MEMORY OF WILLIAM JENNINGS DEMOREST, THE FRIEND OF CHILDREN, AND THE FRIEND OF THE DOWN-TRODDEN AND OPPRESSED OF EVERY LAND. THE MAN WHO DARED TO DO RIGHT BECAUSE IT WAS RIGHT, AND CONDEMN THE WRONG BECAUSE IT WAS WRONG."

And now, my young friend, begging your pardon for this imaginative picture, which some day may come true, I take very great pleasure in presenting to you this beautiful handiwork of man, so fairly and grandly won by you in the cause of right. May your path through life be strewn with many victories for "God and Home and Native Land."

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Our self-denial Cornerers are reporting as you will see by some of their letters below. I have heard of others also and do not doubt that many Cozy Cornerers helped in this simple way to spread the temperance news around the world.

Among those from whom I have heard is the L. T. L. of Moorestown, N. J., which has sent $1.67, as the result of its self-denial week. Most of the children's contributions were earned by doing errands. This is a real, earnest, working Legion, which is always ready for the next thing and to help our great work in the world around.

Then there's the Bozman L. T. L. of Talbot county, Maryland. I was rejoiced to hear that they celebrated our president, Miss Willard's birthday with suitable readings, recitations and songs, after which the self-denial money was collected. It was very interesting, I am told, to hear how the little ones earned their money by denying themselves candy, cakes, pencils and other things that they might give something to our noble cause. This Legion numbers between fifty and sixty members and they sent one dollar. They are looking forward to having a larger membership next year and hope to send more.

While reading a Scottish religious paper not long ago, my eye was caught by the following sad paragraph:

"At an early hour last Saturday night, James Simpson, a boy eight years of age, residing with his grandmother at 545 Garscube Road, Glasgow, was found lying on the pavement and carried home. He told the girl who lifted him that he had got some drink, and became unconscious a few minutes afterwards. The doctor who was called said he was suffering from an overdose of drink, and had the boy removed to the Western Infirmary, where he died about one o'clock on Sunday afternoon. It is not known how or where the boy got the drink."

If that unfortunate little fellow had been a member of the L. T. L. or Band of Hope he would have known of the poison in drink and never would have taken it. Let us urge every boy and girl whom we can reach to come into our ranks, where alone is safety.

Affectionately your

Aunt Jane

NEPHEWS AND NIECES.

I have become very much interested in your Cozy Corner and I should like to become a member of it. I am nearly twelve years old. My birthday will be the 25th of this month. We started an L. T. L. to-day. We organized with seventeen members, there were eight boys and the rest were girls. I have been trying to get out some of the Soft-Shelled Nuts. I enjoyed hearing story of the birthday party very much. EDITH MARSH.

New Hartford, N. Y.

Success to the new L. T. L.! I hope it will grow to 117 and that every one will join the Cozy Corner, too.

I send you ten cents self-denial money. I denied myself butter. I know you will think it was not hard to do when I tell you there are three saloons and there will soon be another. Brother William sends his love to you and the Cozy Cornerers. Your niece,

Calhoun, Ky. EFFIE NOE.

That there are self-denying temperance boys and girls in Calhoun makes me sure that some day those saloons will have to "go!"

I am a little boy nine years old. I am in the third reader and belong to the L. T. L. My mother is president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union here. She takes THE UNION SIGNAL. I read all of the cousins' letters and thought I would write for the first time. I would like to have some of the cousins write to me. Good-bye. GROVER DRUMMOND.

Minnewaukon, N. D.

You are "right in line," Grover, and I hope to hear from you again.

I am a little girl nine years old. I like to read the Children's page in THE UNION SIGNAL. I saw my little cousin in Chicago was the first to send to the self-denial fund. We took the pledge a long time ago and we will never break it. Brother Bertie, Carrie, Rollin and I each take a nickel from our banks to send you. We were saving our money to buy a pony but we can wait a little longer. TUNIE E. MEISENBACH.

Pearl, Ill.

And how much more you will enjoy that pony when you do get him, just because you were unselfish and patient.

I am a little girl eleven years old and would like to join the boys and girls of the Cozy Corner, for I think it must be a nice place. All of our family are in for temperance. Papa is a Prohibitionist, and says he would not vote any other ticket. I would like some nieces to write to me.

Flushing, O. MARY SIDWELL.

We welcome you, Mary.

HEAVENLY PROMOTION OF ANOTHER LEADER.

THE LAST DAYS.

Towards the close of one of the busiest days of the past busy week came a message to our office which was too startling to believe. The message was brief, with no introduction or alleviation in the telling—"Mrs. Woodbridge is dying!"

"What!" we exclaimed. Our minds refused to accept that statement, as instantly the previous day's happy hours and the unusually bright and active labors of our National Corresponding Secretary were recalled.

Tuesday, October 23, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge was at her desk, or, intent upon her many arduous duties, was flitting in and out of the publishing offices, in the best of health and the fullest of spirits. Seldom had we seen her in so joyous a frame of mind. Never could we have associated sickness or death less with any being than with her on that day. She left at five o'clock, with a tender remonstrance to a companion who insisted upon remaining a little longer to work. In the evening, she accompanied her secretary to a lecture in a church near her residence, and returning to her home chatted merrily with Mrs. Bigelow, her hostess, till ten o'clock, when she retired.

The next morning she did not come to the office, but no surprise was felt, for it was known that she always had reserve work at home. Some proof requiring her personal attention, it was sent to her in the afternoon, and upon the return of the messenger the sorrowful news was learned.

Mrs. Helen M. Barker, to whom the word first came, immediately cancelled her engagement for the Missouri state convention, to which she had almost started, and went to her comrade's bedside, accompanied by several of our office force. But it was even then too late for recognition or administration, for a consultation of eminent physicians had already declared restoration to health or consciousness impossible, as paralysis had attacked the brain.

It was then learned that at seven o'clock in the morning Mrs. Woodbridge had asked for extra heat, as she was having a chill. Immediate attention was given her, and upon hearing that another chill had come in the night a physician was called. But all remedies proved ineffectual, and by ten o'clock the same morning complete paralysis prevailed, and the feeble breathing alone gave sign that the spirit still lingered.

Through the long day and night and until evening of the second day, the painful watching and waiting continued, the faithful white ribbon friends being reinforced by Mrs. Woodbridge's devoted husband and one daughter, Mrs. Way, the other daughter, Mrs. Brooks, and the son, George, arriving three hours after their beloved mother had "passed on."

At thirteen minutes past six on Thursday evening, October 25, the beautiful spirit took its flight so peacefully and sweetly that it was difficult to tell when the end came.

Telegrams were speedily sent to all the officers of the National and World's W. C. T. U. and to the many relatives. And when all was done that could be done, we endeavored to comprehend the sad event, but so far it is beyond all comprehension. Only the coming days and months can make it a reality, as the irreparable loss will be daily felt.

THE FAREWELL SERVICE.

Before the dust—so recently aglow with life—was borne to her Ohio home, her friends and co-workers gathered around the silent form on Friday afternoon to unite in a farewell service,—we can hardly say funeral, for that somber word seems all out of place. The first thing which met the eyes of those who entered the door of Mrs. Bigelow's home was the wreath of fresh green ivy fastened with purple ribbon, and thoughts were turned to eternity and immortality rather than death.

Dr. Goodwin of the First Congregational church, conducted the simple service, and the keynote of his words was life. He scarcely needed a text in that hour, for there in the quiet room lay one whose eager steps had trod the ways of life, whose steadfast hands had sought to lessen the power of sin which is the sting of death, and whose lips had borne abundant testimony of Him whom to know is life eternal. Thus his words were of one who had lived abundantly and were addressed to those who were yet to carry on the warfare against death. Never before had the listeners realized, perhaps, what a holy war is ours, as they did during that brief talk in which the speaker emphasized so strikingly the place the temperance cause holds in the church and in the world. Never before, it may be, had they realized the length and exceeding bitterness of the struggle, as when they looked with cleared vision back over the score of years during which Mrs. Woodbridge had not once laid her armor aside. Never before had the battle seemed so worth the fighting, the victory so assured. There may have been in the hearts of some in the presence of the dead a shrinking from the days to come without the counsel and comradeship that had been so strong and so sweet, but while the speaker's words fell upon their hearts they gathered courage and even in her death their yoke-fellow had done them good.

When Dr. Goodwin had finished speaking the friends gathered to look upon her face once more, while about the head of the casket stood a group of honorary pall-bearers, who might well be called a guard of honor,—Mrs. Barker, Mrs. Rounds, Mrs. Carse, Mrs. Hobbs, Mrs. Grow and Mrs. Bigelow, all friends and comrades of Mrs. Woodbridge.

There was nothing unnatural in the scene, save, indeed, the black color of the casket and the stillness of her who lay therein. All about were flowers—white flowers, "congratulatory blossoms," as one called them later; not a display of ornate designs, but just a wealth of bloom disposed as if for the reception of an honored guest. There was a Guest present, the One who overcame death.

Softly upon her upturned face fell the light from above her resting place, and it seemed as if she were listening intently, and presently would look up and answer in her own bright, winsome way. No death-pallor, no decay, no lines of pain, just peace, rest, satisfaction, majesty—overcoming-ness! Her friends looked—it would not have been strange had they spoken to her—and passed on comforted.

Then, a little later, that inner circle of the bereaved, husband and children, came to sit with her awhile,—for it seemed still that she was not away. It was only in harmony with the dominant keynote—life—that there should be no despair, no rebellion in their words. Tears were there, but tears lie deep where joy dwells, and smiles lit up the clouds. It was all as Mrs. Woodbridge would have wished.

Later in the afternoon those employés of the W. T. P. A. whose inexorable duties had not permitted them to attend the service, went to bid her their temporary farewells, and to them her triumphant repose spoke eloquently against the "king of terrors." To one and all her going has been but the completion of what was her living—a benediction—a speaking unto good.

THE HOME FUNERAL.

The spacious home in Ravenna, O., was filled to overflowing, Monday afternoon, Oct. 29, large numbers standing patiently outside during the entire service. The relatives present were the husband, Mr. F. W. Woodbridge, the two daughters, Mrs. Way and Mrs. Dr. Brooks and son, of Cleveland, the only son, George, his wife and little boy, Fred, two granddaughters, Edith Way Hyde and Anna Hyde, Mrs. Woodbridge's brother, Mr. George Brayton, and two brothers and a sister of Mr. Woodbridge.

There was a remarkable delegation of seventy-six white-ribboners, representing every union in Portage county, Ohio. Mrs. Perkins, Mrs. Oviatt, Mrs. Terrell and Mrs. Stevens represented the federated W. C. T. Unions of Cleveland, O. Francis Murphy, Mr. Logan, and other distinguished people were present.

Flowers in great profusion attested the fact that many loving friends had sent them as tokens of their love and esteem. Underneath the casket was a carpet of ferns and flowers, while the wall back of the casket was draped with white cloth, literally covered with cut flowers and sprays of ivy. Upon the casket stood the tribute of the World's W. C. T. U., a large globe of roses and chrysanthemums belted with white ribbon. The card attached bore these words: "In tender memory of our beloved friend and co-worker, Mary A. Woodbridge. From the General Officers of the World's W. C. T. U. 'Allured to brighter worlds and led the way.'" Upon the casket also lay a large double bow of roses white, the badge of our society, the gift of the National W. C. T. U. Upon the mantel at the head of the casket stood a beautiful Maltese cross of white roses sent with a loving message by the "Royal Helpers' Circle of King's Daughters of W. T. P. A." A most lovely design was sent by the W. T. P. A. A pen of purple flowers was embedded in a large open book of blossoms white, and the word "Finis" showed the book finished and the pen laid down. A vacant chair was another beautiful design, a tribute from the Ohio Prohibitionists. Her children gave a pillow, with "Mother" in dark letters amid a profusion of white. A wreath of roses from Lady Henry Somerset bore this message: "A token of loving remembrance to our promoted comrade from her sisters across the sea." Mrs. Whitelaw sent a wreath of callas and smilax. A sheaf of wheat spoke of a ripened life, and was a token sent by Mrs. Grow. A floral offering from the Federated unions of Cleveland was also received, and cut flowers from a host of loving friends made the parlor in which she lay one of purity and brightness.

The choir sang the two favorite hymns of Mrs. Woodbridge, "Lead, Kindly Light," and "Abide With Me."

Rev. A. M. Hills, for many years pastor of the Ravenna Congregational church, of which Mrs. Woodbridge was long a member, officiated at the services, reading the Scriptures, offering prayer and speaking eloquently of Mrs. Woodbridge's beautiful and consecrated life in its different stages of unfolding. Mr. Hills spoke of the special Providences that had shaped her life, of her devotion, not only to her church and temperance work, but to her family and friends. As a wife and a mother no criticism could possibly be made, for to husband and children her life's best was given till they no longer needed her special care. Special mention was made, too, of Mr. Woodbridge's devotion to his wife and her work.

Mr. Hills read a beautiful letter from Miss Willard, of which we can give only a part:

"Unbind the armor, her long day's work is done." How faithfully and well she did it let the records of the white ribbon movement in this and in all lands attest: for she was our gracious, vigilant and swift ambassador who, at the pen's point, carried victory everywhere that her strong, sisterly words penetrated, informed as they all and always were, by a personality of rich endowment in intellectual attributes, moral worth and religious enthusiasm.

Mary A. Woodbridge will always be a radiant name in our white-ribbon annals from the day of the Crusade to that "coming of age" for which she was preparing with her unequalled grasp of the situation and skill in the handling of details. Her benignant presence will be incalculably missed and mourned at the coming Convention in Cleveland, and her clear, womanly voice, with its deep tones, will be listened for instinctively by thousands who had known and loved it long.

Miss Anna Gordon followed with a most tender and fitting tribute in behalf of the World's W. C. T. U., and as the representative of Miss Willard.

Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, who for fourteen years had been most closely associated with Mrs. Woodbridge officially, spoke with great feeling and with broken voice of the work of our promoted comrade. She referred touchingly to a letter she had received the last day Mrs. Woodbridge was in the office, in which she told of the bright prospect for a most successful convention in Cleveland, closing with the words, "Praise the Lord."

Mrs. Helen M. Barker made most appropriate closing remarks, referring especially to her work during the last year while they had been in the office together, and testified to her faithful, loving service not only in her official capacity, but in missionary work in the city, and urged the women present to labor for the cause that she loved.

After the friends had taken an affectionate farewell and the casket was closed, a white drapery completely covered with ferns and roses was laid over it, entirely hiding its somber black. It was then borne gently down the long walk, shaded by grand and graceful trees which she had assisted her father in planting when she was a little girl. A long line of carriages filled with sincere mourners followed the silent form of our loved one to the beautiful cemetery one mile away from her home. Here she was lovingly laid to rest.

THE MEMORIAM MEETING.

A stranger finding himself in Willard Hall at two o'clock on Monday afternoon, the same hour of the home funeral at Ravenna, Ohio, would have observed nothing to indicate that a memorial service was about to be held for one whose name was loved and revered all around the world. There was nothing funereal in the aspect of the beautiful little auditorium, none of the trappings of woe upon pillar or platform, no suggestion of gloom or of the doleful soundings of the tomb. Magnificent white chrysanthemums adorned the speaker's desk and mingled with fern leaves surrounding a picture of Mrs. Woodbridge, which stood on a table at one side.

Notwithstanding the unfavorable weather, the hall was filled with those eager to honor the memory of the loved friend and comrade so suddenly lost. The W. C. T. U. and and the W. T. P. A. occupied seats specially reserved for them.

Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman conducted the service, and after a quartette had feelingly sung "We Would See Jesus," she said that we were not there to sing a dirge, but to realize that "rest is rapture."

The Rev. H. A. Delano, a life-long friend of Mrs. Woodbridge, read part of the second chapter of Ruth, the twenty-third Psalm, and the fourteenth chapter of St. John. "Ohio," he said, "was to-day weeping, not for any of her gifted sons, but for a gifted daughter. It was just like Mary Woodbridge to go away in the quiet, matter-of-fact manner she did. She had lived to see woman's faith and love—of which her own sturdy, indomitable life was a fit exemplar—belt the globe." He then offered prayer, and the quartette sang "Lead, Kindly Light."

Mrs. Hoffman, in presenting Mrs. Carse, "comrade of Mrs. Woodbridge from the beginning," remarked that we were "too Christian, too scientific, too sensible in these days to mourn as they which have no hope." "But after all," said Mrs. Carse, "our hearts are very tender, and He who wept allows us also to weep over the bier of our loved ones. We rejoice that a wide door has been opened for them, but we are still amid and of the mists and shadows."

A more recent friend of our beloved was, then introduced, Miss Frances Griffin, formerly of Alabama, now of Chicago: "Our society," she said, "was often referred to as a 'mutual admiration society,' the lesser it, was said, giving undue worship to the few great ones. God sifted the nation for workers, and it is not to be wondered at that we should admire those God-appointed, God-selected women." Brought up as she (Miss Griffin) was in an atmosphere of conservatism, Mrs. Woodbridge was one of the first public women to draw her attention, at once by reason of her wonderful voice and her womanliness.

Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson was the next to pay loving tribute to the departed one. She was impressed most, she said, during her year's association with Mrs. Woodbridge in W. T. P. A. work, by the all-roundness of her character—one so symmetrically developed. She did so many things exceptionally well. How well she could speak all know. "I cultivated my voice for my mother's sake; she was deaf for many years," she said once, when this valuable possession of hers was commented upon. This fact of itself was a wonderful index to her character. At the height of her power God called her to a better service beyond. Her nature was a remarkable combination of greatness and gentleness."

The Rev. Frances Townsley, of Nebraska, spoke of "our Mary" as a woman who "had time to be friendly." "Said a friend on our way to this meeting, 'We shall find the Temple draped in black,' and I was considering the propriety of tying a black ribbon in with the white, but we saw no badges of mourning—not even on the eleventh floor, only white flowers everywhere, even on her own desk —congratulatory blossoms. We are here to give her joy!" The speaker referred lovingly to incidents in her friendship with Mrs. Woodbridge, first in Nebraska, later in Chicago. Her last words to her a few days ago were, "I will meet you at the Willard Hall prayer-meeting." We shall meet her soon in a praise meeting!"

"Morning Land" was here beautifully sung by Miss Addie Austin and Mr. Shaffner.

Mrs. Hoffman closed the service with a brief and affectionate tribute to Mrs. Woodbridge as corresponding secretary of the National W. C. T. U.

After the choir had exquisitely rendered a beautiful "Good-night" song, the benediction was pronounced by Rev. Frances Townsley, and the audience dispersed with a quiet joy in their hearts, despite the deep sense of loss that is just beginning to be realized.

MRS. MARY A. WOODBRIDGE.

Mary A. Brayton was born April 21, 1830, in the goodly old town of Nantucket. Her ancestry was all that could be desired, from the most critical New England standpoint. Her gentle, refined Quaker mother was a sister of Mitchell, the astronomer, whose own daughter, Maria Mitchell, became, in after years, so famous. Her father, Isaac Brayton, was a Nantucket sea-captain until his genius for leadership and rare powers of eloquence so made themselves felt that his townspeople made him their representative in the Massachusetts legislature. In after years, upon his removal to Ohio he served in the State senate and was the father of the law governing charitable institutions for which that state is to-day celebrated. His Western home straightway became a rendezvous for such men as Joshua Giddings, Salmon P. Chase and Ben Wade; while his interest in the underground railway system was both active and practical.

With these facts in mind it is not difficult to trace the beginnings of the reformer and leader, Mary A. Woodbridge, in the child, Mary A. Brayton. She came by rightful inheritance into the possession of her quick intellect, her insatiable love of books and learning, her well-rounded mind, and graceful, gracious dignity.

She married at the early age of seventeen, Mr. F. W.

MARY A. WOODBRIDGE.

Woodbridge, a young business man of unusual promise, and for forty-seven years theirs was an ideal marriage. Each found his and her complement in the other and the delicate chivalry and tender pride of Mr. Woodbridge in his gifted wife were fully offset by her own loving, trustful devotion to him. Who that came close to her has not heard her say with that deep ring of happy, wifely pride in her voice, "My husband is, without a question, the best man on earth!"

To the interests of this "best man," to their children and to their happy home she gave all her powers, shrinking in an unaccountable manner, when one considers her Quaker ancestry, from any public work, never hearing her own voice even in public prayer, until that whirlwind of the breath of God—the Crusade—swept through her state. One who had known her intimately for years, her pastor, Rev. A. M. Hills, says of this time:

"A great public gathering had assembled by common impulse with no leader appointed. Her aged father, who knew her better than she knew herself, came to her and said: 'Mary, you must lead this meeting.' With a prayer for help she went forward and said—she knew not what, pouring out the fullness of her woman's soul, electrifying her audience with a wondrous eloquence. It was to her like a vision from heaven and a call from God to new duties and a new life. Invitations to speak poured in from every quarter and she stepped at once into public life of incessant activity."

What the activities of that new life have been let the record of the years which have followed, answer. For five years she was president of the Ohio W. C. T. U., leading that famous "Second Amendment campaign" for a prohibitory amendment to the constitution. During that time she started and edited The Amendment Herald which almost immediately reached a wide circulation and of which her editorials were the most striking feature.

"So great was the call for them that it became necessary for several weeks to have every paper electrotyped in order to supply the ever increasing demand. One of her articles reached a circulation of over half a million. During that campaign Joseph Cook visited her office as she was dictating to secretaries, editing her paper and making appointments for scores of speakers throughout the state and he declared that she was doing work enough to tax the mental and physical resources of any three men in Ohio."

In 1877 she was elected assistant recording secretary of the National W. C. T. U., and in 1878 recording secretary. Her presence at the great conventions was as regular as were the conventions themselves, and was a never-failing inspiration. Her voice, of singular depth, compass and sweetness, with a marvelously distinct articulation, was always a clarion-note, which roused and held attention.

In 1889 she was appointed America's secretary for the W. W. C. T. U., and in 1891 elected secretary of the World's W. C. T. U., in which position the broad, loving catholicity of her nature impressed itself upon all who came into contact with her through the medium of her tireless correspondence.

In 1893, at the Chicago convention, she was elected corresponding secretary for the National W. C. T. U.; thus, for eleven months holding a threefold position of responsibility, honor and most laborious toil as secretary of the World's and National unions and of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association.

And at the zenith of her powers, while the deeds she has wrought are being spoken of throughout the whole world, for a memorial of her, she is gone. Gone without a warning, in the full tide of her work; at her desk one day, and the next stricken with death. Is it a matter for regret? Doubtless had she worked less hard she might have been spared longer, but she could not work less hard and be herself. The might of an inward compulsion drove her constantly forward. The fire of a consuming passion for the world's redemption burned in her veins. and could not be quenched.

Her great-souled husband, with the light of Heaven's smiles mingled with the tears of earth's sorrow into a glorious rainbow glow, which those who saw can never forget said: "Do not feel that I regret her work or this year or separation. It was my work as well as her's. It was my part in it to give her up to go forth, and I did it gladly. We are perfectly content. Her one great fear had always been that she might outlive her usefulness. Only a short time ago, when warned by her physician that she was overworking, she said: 'I would be perfectly happy to die with the harness on.'"

That perfect happiness was hers. From a life of uninterrupted usefulness here, she passed, with no interim of sickness, or of old age, or decaying powers, into the wider usefulness beyond. All hail, prevailing one! We give thee joy that thy last personal desire found fruition.

The most striking elements of Mrs. Woodbridge's character were, first, her many-sided ability and strength; second, her singular unspoiledness and self-effacement in the midst of her honors; third, the cheerful, quiet, dignified brightness and joy of her personal bearing, and last the deep piety which was the bed-rock of her nature, and which revealed itself not so much in word, as in that supreme test of love-obedience.

Her executive ability was of the highest order and her patience and power in the mastery of detail was unsurpassed. With all this she had absolutely none of the self-consciousness and self-seeking which so often mar the symmetry of a great nature upon the heights of success. Her secretary, after her death, said, "She used so often to say to me, 'Never use my name when it is not absolutely necessary."

Withal she was the soul of cheeriness and hopefulness. Her "good-morning" on the darkest day was a sun-burst; her very presence a ray of hope. And she was all this and the infinitely more which cannot be compressed within the limits of a sketch, because she was reverently, joyously, wholly God's child. Her pastor says:

"I remember her most tenderly and lovingly as a church member and a Christian. And here I recall things too sacred to be told. In twenty years of pastoral experience no other member has been quite such an inspiration; no other girded me with strength by so much prayer. No other had a higher standard of piety, or labored more earnestly in season and out of season to advance the spiritual work of the church. She was wise in counsel and fertile in expedient plans, and always on the right side. She was usually called upon to close the prayer-meeting with a final prayer, as no other could so gather up the thoughts and inspirations of the hour and lay them before God in helpful, fervent prayer."

"She, being dead, yet speaketh." In the light of her white life and white death, with what prophetic power sounds in our ears again the last public words we heard her utter, at Miss Willard's reception, September 28:

"We cannot stop. God bids us on; we must and will obey. God bless you now! God bless you ever! Hold fast to the Infinite, the positive pole of holiness and power. Another palm shall strike your own, and on and on—until the negative pole of the world's weakness and sin shall be reached. Then will the divine current flow, and not only will His children be quickened, but the iniquity against which we inveigh shall be shivered and shattered to atoms. Then with voices tuned in the harmonies of heaven, we will sing 'glory and honor and praise and thanksgiving to Him who has redeemed us forever and forever.'"

She is singing that song to-day, though the work is not yet fully done; but—she will help us from the other shore.

QUEBEC CONVENTION.

The eleventh annual convention of the Quebec provincial W. C. T. U. was held at Point St. Charles, October 2 to 5. The skies sympathized a little too much with the cold-water movement, but inside the Centenary Methodist church, where the daily sessions were held, all was bright and cheery. Banners and flowers pleased the eye and wafted their silent message to the heart.

Seventy-two delegates and twenty-nine members of the executive were present. A good sprinkling of visitors during the day showed outside interest, and the evening meetings were crowded.

Mrs. Sanderson, the provincial president, occupied the chair, and, in her own kindly, capable way, guided the various county delegations through the mazes of parliamentary practice, had a cheering word for every superintendent of department, and gave fair play to the discussions following reports. The president's speech was a model of condensed information and suggestion, and bore fruit later on in the reports of the resolutions and plan of work committees.

Scientific temperance instruction was reported by Miss Prentiss, who highly recommended the use of Mrs. Hunt's "Help for Teachers." Heredity and health, the press and work in factories followed, in the latter report the necessity of the appointment, by Parliament, of a woman inspector of factories and all places where women and girls are employed was dwelt on.

Mrs. Patterson, of St. Andrews, showed that the use of unfermented wine for sacramental purposes was getting more general, and a strong appeal was made for good papers and other literature for the use of lumbermen in their winter camps.

Mrs. Rugg gave an interesting account of work at exhibitions and fairs. Gambling was suppressed in some places, much temperance literature, both English and French, distributed, and refreshment tents kept going as counter attractions to the drinking booths on the grounds.

Mrs. McLachlan, corresponding secretary, reported ninety-one unions in the province, with a total membership of 2,285. The treasurer, Mrs. Leet, showed a balance of $54.52, and expressed a hope that the finance department would receive greater attention in future.

The flower mission was presented by Miss Laura Hurd as being most effective, and the report on juvenile work by Mrs. Stevens, of Knowlton, was followed by an interesting discussion. Mrs. Middleton, the beloved honorary president, whose advancing years seem only to spur her to increased interest, spoke of the need for a link between the Bands of Hope and associations of grown-up people for boys. The outcome of this was a recommendation from the plan of work committee that the unions form temperance societies for boys between the ages of fourteen to twenty, to be called the Royal Society of Teetotalers. It was also recommended that unions form a department of Bands of Mercy, and that the first Saturday after the new year be appointed as Children's Crusade Day, each member being urged to bring one new member.

Mrs. Metcalf's paper on "Narcotics" was earnest and practical. The discussion on this subject brought into evidence strong feeling on the part of many members of convention. Mrs. Jones, of Montreal, proposed a resolution, which read as follows:

> We, the members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, in view of the evils resulting from the use of tobacco and its pernicious effects, especially on those of tender years, feel it to be our duty to record our unqualified condemnation of its use in any shape or form, and would respectfully urge upon all having the appointment of teachers, either for Sunday or public schools, to select only those who are free from the habit.

Two ladies spoke of the danger of using extreme language as likely to antagonize the very ones whose sympathy and coöperation we are most anxious to enlist, but a standing vote was decidedly in favor of the resolution.

A lively discussion, in which many took part, was brought out by the introduction of a resolution pledging the W. C. T. U. to support a Plebiscite vote for the Province of Quebec, if the government grant the permission applied for by the Dominion Alliance. The resolution was supported by a small majority, the minority being of the opinion that the province was not ripe for such a measure.

The plan of work committee were evidently desirous of stirring up the province, for in addition to the new departments already referred to, temperance grocery work was adopted, peace and arbitration was added to conference with influential bodies. A home mission band was recommended and also that "each union adopt some union in a distant land, correspond with that union, send them copies of the Woman's Journal, or THE UNION SIGNAL, or our provincial annual report."

A letter so bright that it was difficult to believe it came from a bed of sickness, was read from Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, Dominion president. A sympathetic answer accompanied by a bouquet of flowers was the only bit of convention which careful doctors and nurse allowed to enter the sick room, but if the bright blossoms expressed all the loving thoughts which went with them Mrs. Williams would be well content with her share. Mrs. Youmans was not forgotten in her state of chronic invalidism.

The election of office-bearers resulted in only one change. Miss Meiklejohn, recording secretary, being obliged to resign, was replaced by Mrs. Distin, of Quebec; president, Mrs. Sanderson, vice-president, Mrs. Foster, corresponding secretary, Mrs. McLachlan, and treasurer, Mrs. Leet, being all reëlected by large majorities on the nominating ballot.

Some reports were crowded out of the convention by lack of time, and lack of space must do the same here. Special stress was laid on the desirability of a close study of the provincial reports, especially in regard to the revision of the constitution made necessary after ten years' formation by changes in plan of work and experience in working.

The four evening meetings were largely attended and full of interest. The first was devoted to greetings and words of welcome, several ministers taking part and bearing testimony to the value of such an organization as the W. C. T. U.

Wednesday evening was devoted to the Y's, and it was only a pity the Centenary church was not crowded to the doors to hear what they had provided. A paper on "The Model Y," given by Mrs. Lawrence, of Waterloo, must have been a revelation to many present of what can be done by a band of young people who set themselves to do the right thing in the right way.

Another most excellent paper on "Our Attitude to Non-sympathizers with Total Abstinence and Prohibition," by Miss Ida Monk, of Montreal, showed close logical reasoning and a breadth of view which older persons would do well to adopt. Two piano solos and two songs, the latter by Mrs. Cruikshanks, of Point St. Charles, were delightful rests in the program, and Mrs. Copping, of Montreal, made a sensation by her recitation of "Workhouse Nan," followed by the encore of "Cuddle Doon, Bairnies."

On Thursday evening the county presidents had the platform and justified their position by bright and telling speeches.

Mrs. Clara Hoffman, of Missouri, brought a most useful and inspiring convention to a fitting close on Friday evening by one of her logical, telling lectures. Those who had the pleasure of listening to her must have wished to repeat the experience, as on Sunday evening the Methodist church in Montreal was crowded to hear what our "Legacies of the Future" are going to be unless we use the most strenuous efforts in the present to avert the evils so eloquently set forth.

A hearty vote of thanks to the ladies who had proved such bountiful entertainers was passed, and so closed the convention which had drawn together so large a body of women all deeply in earnest over subjects which closely affect the well being of all classes of the community.

RHODE ISLAND.

STATE CONVENTION.

Wakefield might well have been called wide-awake field on the morning of October 2d, for with less than thirty members in their union, and the state convention to be housed and fed, activity was the order of the day. Even the men on the streets were talking about it, and the best of it was, they didn't stay on the streets to talk, but came inside in goodly numbers.

The eleven o'clock train steamed up to the station so closely packed with delegates that one of our state officers was obliged to ride with others on the back platform, and when all had taken their places in the spacious church, which was tastefully decorated for the occasion with flowers and banners, it was a goodly sight to look upon.

The convention opened promptly with devotional exercises led by the president, Mrs. M. A. Babcock. Mrs. S. C. Babcock, of Wakefield, spoke cordial words of welcome to their homes and to their pleasant rooms across the way, and Rev. J. C. Duncanson greeted us kindly in the name of the church. Mrs. S. A. Hazard, of Arlington, responded for the convention.

The report of the treasurer, Miss E. F. Bliss, was followed by the service of the noontide hour, led by Miss E. C. Hodge, her subject being "Consecrated Service," not alone of time and talent, but also of our means, that all that we have and are may belong to Christ.

In the afternoon the presidents of our new unions were introduced, after which the corresponding secretary read her report which was, as usual, full of interest. She said: "In the retrospect it is good to realize that there has been an increase in our service. Among the speakers from other states who deserve special mention, we would place first Mrs. Mary C. Leavitt, who spent a week in our state giving twelve addresses. Her earnest words aroused a deep interest in many hearts."

One item calling forth applause was that in the church at Thornton, every male member except two voted the Prohibition ticket through influence exerted by the W. C. T. U. Other unions also reported a growth in public sentiment as a result of their labors.

Miss Nichols' own work was quietly summed up in one sentence, "Your secretary has given 116 addresses and sent out 2,650 letters and postals." If those addresses and letters could tell their own story of the actual good which they have accomplished and of the helpful and inspiring influences which they have scattered abroad, we should begin to realize what wonderful things God can work out through one life wholly consecrated to His service.

Our president's annual message began with a backward glance at the twenty years of work in our state since the first annual meeting, January 7, 1875. She spoke of the growth in the number of unions, from Providence, the first auxiliary, antedating the state union, to fifty-five unions now scattered through our state.

The present progress of our work was reviewed and practical helps given for the future. Miss Willard's plan for the election of officers by use of a ballot box open at certain hours during the entire convention, was heartily endorsed, and a suggestion made that more formality be used in the reception of members that they may realize the obligations of the work to which they are called. She noted the importance of a Loyal Temperance Legion in connection with every union, and urged the necessity for Y unions that shall keep up their interest and enthusiasm by centering these around some specific work. The Newport Y's with their rescue mission and other lines of evangelistic work, and the Providence Y's, with their practical philanthropy shown in the tea rooms, the drinking fountain, and in Rest Cottage, were cited as examples. She pleaded for a special effort among all the unions to enlarge their membership. If, instead of two thousand members we had twenty thousands, as with our present population we ought to have, the membership fees alone would give us a regular income that would solve the financial problem and enable us greatly to increase our usefulness. It was a helpful paper throughout, and the readers of the Outlook will be glad to know that it is to be printed in full in its columns.

Mrs. H. M. Barker, National treasurer, gave the address of the evening. Her subject was, "The Outlook and Uplift." It was logical, interesting and instructive. We have to thank her, not only for this address, but for her helpfulness during the entire convention. Her words of appreciation of the large attendance, and of the careful and condensed reports of work done, were very encouraging, coming as they did from one whose observations and experiences include all parts of our land.

Instead of the statistical reports usually given by the different superintendents each presented her work in a brief address. Mrs. A. W. Chase took for her topic, "Have You a Boy to Spare?" referring to the advertisement, "Wanted—two million boys to fill the places of the present drunkards." She is doing good work in the line of scientific temperance instruction.

Mrs. J. H. Pay, superintendent of L. T. L's, is one of our most active workers. She gave the L. T. L. of Wakefield a special drill, and the children's hour, with addresses by our president and secretary and singing by the children, was one of the pleasantest of the convention.

Dr. Matthews read an instructive paper on "The Care of Our Bodies." Miss Olney gave an excellent address, showing the progress which is being made in the line of peace and arbitration. Mrs. Peckham's earnest presentation of the work for railroad men elicited warm sympathy. Indeed, all the superintendents brought forward their work in a way to win the interest and approval of the audience.

Mrs. Barney's paper on the work of police matrons was followed by the introduction of the matrons from Pawtucket, Woonsocket and Newport. They gave many incidents connected with their work, with an earnestness that must have convinced all who heard them of the great need of these women in the cities, and further, that they are the right women for these positions. They are all earnest Christian women, and all wear the white ribbon.

Mrs. Clara Hoffman closed the day with a remarkably fine address.

Our general officers were reëlected with a unanimity which shows a growing appreciation of their faithful service and a hearty indorsement of their methods and plans.

Thursday evening was made memorable by a service which has given an impetus to all our work. Mrs. Moore, of Westerly, presented the subject of systematic giving in a way that spoke from heart to heart. Then an effort was made to pay off the entire debt which has so long embarrassed our work, and after a short time it grew in enthusiasm until pledge after pledge was heroically made, and the treasurer announced that nine hundred and twenty-five of the one thousand dollars needed had been raised. By a vote of the convention it was decided to postpone the completion of this exercise until the evening session. When that time came, the remaining indebtedness was cancelled, and now we stand free from a weight which has pressed heavily for several years, and ready to go forward with renewed faith and courage.

Thursday evening was given to the Y's. Miss Anna M. Cummings, of South Africa, was introduced and reviewed the growth of the work in that country and the encouragement to be found in consequence. The principal speaker of the evening was Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, World's secretary of Y work, who is a sprightly and charming speaker. The presentation to the Wakefield union of the prize banner for the greatest increase in membership, seemed a happy coincidence, although other unions deserve much credit for their successful efforts to gain new members. The new union at Saunderstown has increased over three hundred per cent since its organization just after our last convention, but as this is the first year that it has paid dues it was excluded from competition. Last on the program was a fine solo with chorus by the choir, and after the closing prayer by Miss E. C. Hodge, the crowning evening of the convention was an event of the past.

It is due the railroad company that mention be made of their courtesy in granting special and greatly reduced rates for our white ribbon delegation. The hospitality of our Wakefield sisters calls for hearty thanks. Not only delegates, but all the visiting friends were entertained freely and bountifully, and still when all was over, enough was left for a hundred more. The reports of our convention, as printed in the Westerly Daily Tribune, were full and sympathetic.

NEW YORK.

"MAJORITY" CONVENTION.

The Empire state W. C. T. U. has just celebrated its majority by holding its annual convention in Chautauqua county—Chautauqua, the birthplace of the Crusade. Do I hear some one say no with a capital N? Hear ye! New York claims her own at last, and before I report the convention proper I must tell you of our Crusaders' hour, led by Mrs. Esther McNeill, of Fredonia, our mother of Crusade fame. This came just before noon of the first day. Several took part who were among the early Crusaders, but the interest centered in Mrs. McNeill and Miss Stevens, of Fredonia, who gave testimony and proof that to Fredonia belonged the honor of the first Crusade work. Perfect quiet reigned as all were anxious to hear of the "beginnings," and at the close of Mrs. McNeill's remarks, a motion prevailed that New York state W. C. T. U. indorse the statements made by her and claim its own; also that a notice of the same be sent to THE UNION SIGNAL, even at this late day, and so I write of this here and now. It is always well to start right.

Our convention met in Jamestown, called the City of Homes, and aspiring to be called the Convention City. If all conventions are as well received as was ours it will not "aspire" in vain. Never in the history of our organization have we received a more cordial welcome, and never before have such elaborate preparations been made for our reception.

For some time previous to the convention we had feared that our beloved president, Mrs. Mary T. Burt, could not be with us. Twice during the year have the gates of eternity swung almost open for her, but God has been good to us and spared her, and as we looked into her face and realized His goodness to us and to her we thanked Him for having given her back to us and to the work. It had been announced on the program that owing to illness she would give no extended address, yet the words spoken by her, though brief, will not soon be forgotten.

The utmost harmony and unity of purpose prevailed throughout the meeting. The number present was not so large as usual, owing to the fact that Jamestown is in the extreme southwestern part of the state. About three hundred were reported by the credentials committee, however. Nearly every superintendent was present with her report, all showing faithful efforts along the various lines. The officers' reports were given the first day, and were well received.

Greetings were received from Miss Willard and from the National officers through Mrs. Woodbridge, from Francis Baldwin, our Prohibition nominee for governor in this state, and others.

A most beautiful memorial service was conducted by Mrs. Julia A. Bidwell, of Deposit, in memory of the three hundred and fifty-four who have passed away during the year. Each year the number increases, and so we hail with joy the "little feet coming" which shall walk in the paths which have been made by those who are laying down the burdens, and resting on the other side.

Our L. T. L. work is growing each year under the efficient leadership of Mrs. Metcalf, and a class of seven graduates received diplomas at this convention, just following the memorial service. The L. T. L. banner was presented to Chemung county.

Many visitors were presented, and cordially received. Mrs. Martha Almy, vice-president of the Political Economy club, was received as a fraternal delegate from that society. Mrs. Danforth gave a report of the presentation of the Chautauqua fountain in Chicago, on September 28, and many little "extras" not down on the program added to the general pleasure. The program, which was a very complete one, and packed full of good things, was entirely carried out, with no "left overs." A musical program had been prepared also, with all the hymns printed, and the closing service from White Ribbon Hymnal, each delegate being provided with a copy. These were highly appreciated.

Very many of the pulpits in Jamestown were filled by women on the Sunday preceding the convention, and in the Swedish M. E. church, Mrs. Emily U. Burgess organized a W. C. T. U. at the close of her service—the first distinctively foreign union in our state.

A special meeting was held in this church on Wednesday afternoon for the children of Jamestown, Mrs. Ellen D. Blair, of Nebraska, giving one of her most happy chalk talks.

OUR EVENING MEETINGS AND SPEAKERS.

The first evening was literally a "feast of fat things." We were welcomed, first, by the mayor of the city, Hon. Eleazer Green, then by the pastor of the church, Rev. Chas. C. Albertson, and by the president of Chautauqua county W. C. T. U., Mrs. Martha S. Mead, to whose untiring efforts was due much of the success of this gathering. I wish I could give these addresses in full and also the response, which was given by our first vice-president, Mrs. Ella A. Boole, but space forbids. The address of the evening was given by our matchless orator, John G. Woolley, and who would dare attempt to report it?

The Y's had the second evening, Mrs. C. J. A. Jump, secretary of Y Branch, presiding. A most interesting program was rendered and Miss Frances Ensign, of Ohio, delivered the address, receiving many words of praise for her bright and telling way of presenting the truth.

On Thursday evening Mrs. Jennie Fowler Willing, of New York, addressed us on the subject, "The Hard Times, their Cause and Remedy." It was an inspiration to us all to have Mrs. Willing with us at this time. It was she who drew up the "Crusade Call" to the women of the country to convene at Cleveland, O., in November, 1874, and who was chosen president of that memorable convention, and this gave her a warm place in our hearts, but even without this, Mrs. Willing would have charmed us all. Following her address, came one by Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson, Secretary of the International Order of King's Daughters and Sons. Her address related primarily to the work of the W. C. T. U., its advance and growth. It was a disappointment to many that she read it, yet it was a finely written address, marked for its literary excellence, and she held the attention of the large audience until nearly ten o'clock.

MUSIC.

The music of the convention was in charge of the corresponding secretary, and in addition to solos by her, fine music was rendered by the local singers of Jamestown. A male quartette and a ladies' trio were most enjoyable. Miss Jessie Shaver, sister of Mrs. Mead, sang "Behold a Multitude" in a manner that called forth prolonged applause. Miss Ella George sang "The New Kingdom" on Y night, winning many compliments. Jamestown may well feel proud of its musicians. The accompanists were Mrs. Ellen L. Tenney, our state treasurer, and Miss Edith Barlow, of Jamestown, both accomplished musicians.

THE CHURCH.

The church in which the meeting was held, was well arranged for such gatherings. The body of the house and the gallery were seated with opera chairs, and besides the parlors below, were numerous rooms, large and small, most convenient for committees. Miss Colman occupied one with literature and the others contained a postoffice, a telephone office, information bureau, committee on railroad rates, representatives of the Evening Journal, and a salesroom of the Y Branch, where many articles both useful and ornamental were disposed of. An elevator was a novel feature in this church. The pastor said in welcoming us, that the Epworth League, whose motto is "Lift up," had placed the elevator there, and we were welcome to use it, or to use any or all of the flights of stairs, including what had been called the "spinal stairway," which, as some one remarked, must be the "back" stairway.

DECORATIONS.

The decorations consisted largely of state and county banners, artistically arranged, with the stars and stripes displayed wherever there was a good place for them. The decorating committee, with Mrs. Preston Houston as chairman, received many compliments. The banner which, perhaps, attracted most attention, was the one which was exhibited at the World's Fair, and which occupied a prominent place near the large organ.

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

Our resolutions were sound and to the point, a good, ringing prohibition resolution being prominent. One which was fitting was a resolution of thanks to the reporters who had been so faithful during the entire session. Mrs. Mead and the W. C. T. U. of Chautauqua county were most heartily thanked for the perfect arrangements, and the successful carrying out of the same.

Our midday meal was served in the Baptist church by the ladies of that society, and was quite a source of revenue to them. The county W. C. T. U. paid them for every meal served, about twelve hundred in all. This relieved the union of the work, and thus they had the benefit of the convention. The Baptist ladies cleared nearly $200, and this amount completed the last payment on their organ.

During the early part of the convention a beautiful floral ship in full sail, with two white flags bearing the magic letters W. C. T. U., was presented as the gift of Mrs. Reuben Fenton, widow of ex-Governor Fenton.

SOCIAL EVENTS.

On Tuesday from four until seven a reception was given the convention at the Congregational church by the Woman's and Young Woman's Christian Association, the Political Equality Club and the Woman's Relief Corps. This was a most enjoyable affair. Words of welcome and fine music filled the first half hour, Mrs. Burt responding in behalf of the convention, after which elegant refreshments were served to all present. More than four hundred partook of this delightful hospitality. Each guest was presented with a tiny flag with a rosette of yellow and white ribbon on the stick.

On Friday, the day following the convention, through the generosity of the Jamestown W. C. T. U., we were taken up the lake to the Chautauqua assembly grounds, they having chartered a steamer and invited every one to go. Nearly two hundred accepted the invitation to visit this historic place, and in spite of the rain which fell steadily, all enjoyed the trip. An hour or two was spent in looking about and in partaking of the luncheon provided for us, and then we steamed back to Jamestown, where good-byes were said and each took her own way.

Our executive meeting was held in the cabin of the boat, and was a model meeting in many ways. First, the women all came—about forty-three being present. Next, they came on time, otherwise they would have "got left," and again, there was no running away to attend to outside matters. Business was done with promptness and dispatch, and I'm not sure but a boat cabin is the very best place for holding an executive meeting—especially when it rains.

NOTES.

Evangelistic meetings were conducted by Mrs. Mary J. Weaver each morning from eight to nine o'clock, and a "Time of Blessing" was held the evening preceding the opening of the convention.

The officers were all reëlected almost unanimously. Mrs. Burt, in acknowledging the honor began by saying: "On human battlefields they send the wounded to the rear," and then in her own graceful way accepted the office for the twelfth time. Mrs. Boole responded briefly and fittingly, when elected as first vice-president, Mrs. Graham as corresponding secretary and Mrs. Tenney as treasurer, were not allowed to make a speech, but the audience demanded from one a song and from the other an organ voluntary in acceptance of the offices. To Mrs. Gardenier belongs the palm for spicy speech making. She has been recording secretary for about fourteen years.

Our L. T. L. had two delegates of its very own.

The finest homes in Jamestown were open to the delegates.

By vote of the convention, Mrs. Burt's address was published in the Evening Journal.

Oneida, Schuyler, Tioga and Herkimer counties captured the president's prize banners, and Oneida Y's also received one for the largest percentage of increase during the year. Dutchess county for the fourth time took Woman's Temperance Work prize banner.

A telegram was sent to Francis E. Baldwin, our candidate for governor. The reference sent was Zechariah 13:8, 9. If you don't know what is is just look it up, reader.

Every worker in the state is asked to subscribe for Woman's Temperance Work, our state paper, and to send for a copy of our annual minutes. "This ought ye to have done, and not left the other undone." Next year our convention goes to Rochester.

INDIANA.

TWENTY-FIRST STATE CONVENTION.

The largest W. C. T. U. convention ever assembled in our state convened in Indianapolis (Roberts Park M. E. church) on October 5, continuing five days.

Our state officers were all present, Mrs. L. M. Beck, president, Mrs. E. L. Calkins, vice-president, Miss L. E. Reed, corresponding secretary, Mrs. M. O. Cammack, recording secretary, and Mrs. L. F. McWhirter, treasurer.

Stevenson, National superintendent of literature, Miss Clara Parrish, National organizer of Young Woman's Branch, and Mrs. Charlton Edholm, World's superintendent of press work.

The Crusade hymn and responsive reading of the Crusade Psalm were followed by a prayer from Mother Trish.

After the usual preliminary business, we listened to our president's address, in which he reviewed our twenty-one years of history—presenting our progress in a pleasing light, reminding us that courage is as much needed as ever, in order to gain a complete victory. She reviewed the progress woman has made in the various avenues open to her, reminding us that woman, for conscience sake, will do what she will not do for pleasure. She advised each white-ribboner to organize temperance clubs in her church.

Our corresponding secretary's report showed a broad outlook. She said "the world is becoming saturated with the idea that it is well to let strong drink alone." Our local unions number 318, sixty-eight of which were organized this year.

Our treasurer reported the receipts from all sources $3,550.21, of which $325.74 were the net proceeds from serving meals and lunch at our state fair cottage, which has been efficiently managed by our state treasurer and our superintendent of fair work.

A report of our other possession, Hadley Industrial School for girls, was given by the secretary, Mrs. A. V. Mendenhall, to whose business capacity and energy we are largely indebted for the quick completion of the building, and the large amount of money raised. She reported having sent out four thousand circulars, and written three thousand letters during the year.

Our Y and L. T. L. secretaries gave good reports. Mrs. Hagart, of St. Joseph county, received the banner for having organized more L. T. L. companies than any other county superintendent. The largest class, twenty-nine in number, was graduated by a superintendent of Wabash.

Our superintendents gave good reports. Among the best may be mentioned that of Mrs. Balch, superintendent of medal contests, Mrs. Anna Gunder, superintendent of law and statistics, and Mrs. Gougar, superintendent of temperance and labor. Mrs. Balch reported one hundred and two silver, twenty-six gold, two large gold and one diamond contest. The last was held Monday evening, during the convention. Two of the contestants drew for the prize and Miss Charles, of Spiceland, became the fortunate owner of the diamond medal.

The superintendent of temperance and labor said, "There are many causes leading up to the serious condition of the laboring classes, but the chief cause is the waste and degradation of the liquor traffic.

A change was made in our by-laws, making our state dues fifty cents per member instead of twenty-five cents. This plan does away with the annual assessment.

Among our resolutions may be mentioned the following:

RESOLVED, That we condemn the introduction of immoral representations into the exhibitions called living pictures, and we petition those in authority in our cities to suppress such immoral representations.

RESOLVED, That we commend the loyalty of the good women of Kentucky in their contest against W. C. P. Breckinridge, in defense of our standard of equal purity for both sexes.

RESOLVED, That while we continue to push our battle against the legalized liquor traffic, we, as Christian women, will not lose sight of humanity ensnared thereby, but we hail with delight any application of science or faith that can save one soul, and we indorse institutions for the treatment of diseases of inebriety, not as temperance measures but as institutions of mercy.

We were grieved to learn that our vice-president, Mrs. Calkins, would move to Michigan and would no longer be eligible to an office in our state. Miss L. E. Reed, our corresponding secretary, to our regret also declined renomination.

The result of our election was: Mrs. L. M. Beck, president; Miss Mary Hadley, vice-president; Mrs. Mary Balch, corresponding secretary; Mrs. M. O. Cammack, recording secretary, and Mrs. L. F. McWhirter, treasurer. Miss Margaret Dickson was elected Y secretary, and Mrs. K. T. A. Straw, secretary of L. T. L. branch.

The credentials committee reported three hundred and sixty-one delegates and members. There were also many visitors.

NOTES.

Twenty years ago the first convention was held in the same church. It is said that that convention was conducted principally by our brethren.

As usual, the love feast was the most enjoyable feature of our convention. Mrs. Denny, of Vincennes, presided.

We were delighted to have our former National treasurer, Miss Pugh, with us. Mrs. Stevenson, our National superintendent of literature, awakened us more than ever to the importance of our literature department.

Mrs. Louise Rounds delivered our annual sermon, which moved the hearts of her large audience most profoundly. We again welcomed Mrs. Woodbridge, who has become very dear to the hearts of Indiana women. Miss Clara Parrish also received a hearty welcome.

Among those who greeted our convention were Mayor Denny and Colonel Eli Ritter, whose remarks were replete with words of encouragement. Colonel Ritter is the brave champion of temperance, who won the important case of Mrs. Mary Haggart against John Stehlin et al., "which was a strong grip of the law upon the throat of the liquor traffic." He said the W. C. T. U. has had a greater influence for good than any other organization; that we do not have to wait for the ballot to influence legislation.

Mr. McWhirter, chairman of the Prohibition Central Committee, made an eloquent address.

Solon L. Goods, chairman of Good Citizenship League, who was introduced, believes in "crystallizing Christian sentiment into action."

Mr. Ritter, the president of the Epworth League, said the most important chapter in the history of the nineteenth century will probably be the one headed "The Woman's Christian Temperance Union."

The Rescue Home, under the management of the Meridian union of Indianapolis, was visited by many of the delegates to the convention. In the mission attached to the Home there have been three hundred and thirty-five conversions during the year. There were five girls in the home who had been rescued from lives of shame. Mrs. Edholm's effective work was felt in the mission. She accomplished what others had labored for years to do. Mrs. Edholm is available for work in the social purity department. She only asks that her expenses be paid.

Rev. Thomas, of Vincennes, was presented to the convention. Before coming to this country he was engaged in temperance work with Lady Henry Somerset in England.

Greetings were sent from the convention to Miss Willard, Mrs. Lathrap and Mother Wallace. Mrs. Rounds conveyed our greeting to the Illinois convention and Miss Hay to the Ohio convention.

PENNSYLVANIA PEN POINTS.

Bucks county is having a fine treat just now in the line of a series of readings given by the able president of the county union, Mrs. Cynthia Holcomb. The readings are taken from her own essays, and are very popular. The proceeds are to be devoted to the Temple fund, a very generous act on the part of Mrs. Holcomb.

Yardly Y has been holding "evenings with authors." Their "evening with Napoleon," brought in a snug sum for their treasury.

The Lycoming county convention was held at Hughesville. The reports of corresponding secretary and treasurer showed an increase in membership, and a surplus in the treasury. The address of welcome by Miss Fox, responsé by Miss Mendenhall and the annual address by the county president were all excellent. Mrs. Olive Pond Amies' lecture on the "Aim of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union," was an admirable one and the school of methods conducted by her was a prominent feature of the convention.

Tioga county convention was held at Blossburg. The various unions in the county were well represented. Mrs. Helen W. Bullock conducted an interesting school of methods, the topic being "Mothers' Work." Not only the mothers but the fathers participated in the discussion. Mrs. Bullock lectured in the evening to a very large audience whose attention she held for over an hour. One circumstance dampened the joy of the annual meeting, the continued ill-health of the county president, obliging her to resign. Mrs. Horton was elected to the office.

Allegheny county closed a successful year's work with the annual convention at Pittsburg, September 18 and 19. Notwithstanding the financial depression, the report of county treasurer showed the finances to be in good condition. The first session was devoted to routine work, reports from county officers and superintendents. The afternoon session opened with a Bible reading, conducted by Mrs. Atcheson, followed by the election of county officers, at which an entirely new corps was elected, with Mrs. M. A. Irvin, president. At four o'clock the Loyal Temperance Legion conducted a very enjoyable session. At the evening session an address was given by Rev. R. H. Hood. The time for holding the annual convention was changed from September to June.

Fayette county held a very pleasant convention at Uniontown, with a large attendance from all parts of the county. Mrs. H. F. King gave the address of welcome, responded to by Mrs. S. G. Kreps. Mrs. Lulu Luce read an excellent essay on "Sabbath Observance." Thursday evening a gold medal contest was held. The medal was awarded to Miss Oma Bend, of Uniontown. Mrs. Ritenour was reëlected president. There is a membership of two hundred and sixty-one in the county.

New Salem union held a very fine Demorest contest recently. Six young ladies took part. The medal was won by Miss Ella Jefferies and the rest of the contestants were given a handsome book. The music was furnished by Mr. and Mrs. Miller and Miss Baker, of Uniontown.

Pleasant View union held its second contest which was very successful. Miss Stella Campbell won the medal which was presented by Rev. L. W. Lewellen, who also made a fine address.

Dunbar Y's held another contest at which Alex Wishart won the medal. Fayette county seems to be doing most excellent work in the contest department.

Wayne county held its annual meeting at Honesdale, September 6 and 7. Mrs. Helen Bullock was present and conducted a question box in a pleasing and profitable manner. She lectured on "Sowing and Reaping" in the evening. At the close of the lecture she made a successful plea for new members, and on the afternoon of the second day conducted a Bible Reading. This convention was favored by the presence of Mrs. J. H. Johnson, founder of "Little Mother's Mission" of New York city. Mrs. Johnson is a sister of our president and spoke briefly on her work, enlisting the sympathies of all white-ribboners. The special work of this county this year has been printing and distributing the names of all signers and bondsmen on license applications. The following resolution was passed:

RESOLVED, That encouraged by the partial results from publishing the names of signers and bondsmen to petitions for license to sell intoxicants throughout our county, we will continue to publish the names of the same with any official title appertaining thereto, also supplement the names of judges and lawyers connected therewith.

A very beautiful poem was read by Mrs. Brown, a lady over seventy years of age.

Mercer county held their convention at Sandy Lake, September 20–21. An excellent program was carried out. Mrs. Harmer gave a fine lecture and conducted a parliamentary drill. Mrs. Rice lectured the first evening and conducted a chalk talk. The papers by Miss Forrest on "The Outlook," and Mrs. Minnie E. Ogden on "Franchise," were of a high order of merit. An entirely new corps of officers were elected.

Lawrence county held their first L. T. L. convention at New Castle. Mrs. Organ, superintendent of the work, presided. Over three hundred children were present. A class of seven graduated this year from the county superintendent's own Legion. This county has forty graduates, and some of them received the second seal at this convention. The exercises were all excellent. Miss Nettie Chapman was chosen president.

Venango county L. T. L. held their second convention in South Oil City. Four companies were represented by eighty-five members. A good program was rendered, a picnic dinner enjoyed and much interest manifested. Miss Belle Braham, the efficient state superintendent of L. T. L. work, is, we regret to say, lying very ill at her home in New Castle. The sympathy of all white-ribboners will be given her.

ADDA BURCH,
State Reporter, Southport.

MOTHERS and those about to become mothers, should know that Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription robs childbirth of its torture, terrors and dangers to both mother and child, by aiding Nature in preparing the system for parturition. Thereby "labor" and also the period of confinement are greatly shortened. It also promotes an abundant secretion of nourishment for the child. During pregnancy, it prevents "morning sickness" and those distressing nervous symptoms from which so many suffer.

Tanks, Cottle Co., Texas.

DR. R. V. PIERCE, Buffalo, N. Y.:

Dear Sir—I took your "Favorite Prescription" previous to confinement and never did so well in my life. It is only two weeks since my confinement and I am able to do my work. I feel stronger than I ever did in six weeks before.

Yours truly,

Corda Culpepper

A MOTHER'S EXPERIENCE.

South Bend, Pacific Co., Wash.

DR. R. V. PIERCE, Buffalo, N. Y.:

Dear Sir—I began taking your "Favorite Prescription" the first month of pregnancy, and have continued taking it since confinement. I did not experience the nausea or any of the ailments due to pregnancy, after I began taking your "Prescription." I was only in labor a short time, and the physician said I got along unusually well.

MRS. BAKER.

We think it saved me a great deal of suffering. I was troubled a great deal with leucorrhea also, and it has done a world of good for me.

Yours truly,

Treasurer's Corner.

REMEMBER, THE TREASURER'S BOOKS CLOSE NOVEMBER 1.

After an absence from the Corner the treasurer is glad to be back and to find that the reports coming in from the states are so encouraging. Up to date twenty-three states report an increase of membership, and others undoubtedly will be added to the honor list, for it is an honor to have made an advance in a year like the one just closing. In my visit to Maryland, Pennsylvania, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Rhode Island, I found our women cheery and the work very encouraging. Some of the county conventions in Pennsylvania were almost like state conventions in enthusiasm and in excellence of reports and papers. Maine, Rhode Island and Massachusetts state conventions were just what you might expect with such presidents as, Mesdames Stevens, Fessenden and Babcock. Rhode Island freed herself from a debt of $1,000, and all went home with new hope.

Self-Denial funds are now coming in quite lively, and the dues of many states are complete, while others promise that they will surely be in in time for report for the present year. In another column will be found a few Self-Denial messages, and many others are waiting, but they will keep, and we hope to brighten the Corner with them later on. Let every dollar that ought to be counted in this year's report be sent in without delay. HELEN M. BARKER.

Convention Corner.

WANTED—DELEGATES' NAMES.

States that have held their conventions should send their list of delegates immediately. We have received but very few complete lists yet, and don't know how many to expect or how to assign them without it. Corresponding secretaries will please see to it so we can send cards to delegates before they leave their homes. We would be glad if National superintendents and organizers would send their names also, if they expect to attend.

To the delegates to the National W. C. T. U. Convention at Cleveland.

DEAR CONVENTION COMRADES:—Will you, each and all, take with you to the Convention, and there use, at every session, your copy of the White Ribbon Hymnal? And will you each do your individual part toward making the music of the Convention a grand, uplifting, inspiring, successful part of it? Relying upon you for cordial coöperation, I am,

Yours for hearty, universal singing,

RAILROAD RATES TO THE NATIONAL CONVENTION.

After a great deal of planning and work we are able to make a partial announcement of rates to the National Convention. All roads belonging to the Central Traffic Association will give us one fare for the round trip. Roads in the Western and Southern Passenger Associations will give a one and one-third fare. Those leaving the west and south purchase their tickets to either St. Louis or Chicago, and take a certificate to that place. That will grant them a one-third fare returning from that place to their homes. Then they purchase a ticket from either St. Louis or Chicago to Cleveland, round trip ticket, one fare.

Delegates from the West going to the National W. C. T. U. Convention at Cleveland and having to pass through Kansas City, will find it to their advantage to write Miss Ellen D. Morris, 510 Rialto Building, Kansas City, Mo., as she is trying to make arrangements for all those going from or through that section.

Signal Notes.

"An alcoholic paralysis of the perceptive faculties" is what Dr. Norman Kerr terms the cause of the inebriate's inability to make reliable statements.

General Wm. Booth, of England, the head of the "Darkest England" enterprise, is in the United States on a tour of inspiration and inspection to the principal camps of the Salvation Army of which he is commander-in-chief.

Because the speakers at a St. Louis camp-meeting denounced the saloons and their patrons, the local liquor dealers' association has protested against its continuance as a "menace to public morals." The Congregationalist asks the pertinent question, "What is morality?"

Women are to be admitted in future to the Odd Fellows through the Rebecca lodge. The new law passed at the recent meeting in Chattanooga, Tenn., qualifies for membership all Odd Fellows and wives and all white women over eighteen years of age who "believe in the Ruler of the universe."

Sixty thousand dollars was last year's investment of the Union Club, New York City, for wines, liquors and cigars. These commodities were retailed to the members at a profit of fifty thousand dollars, thus proving the club successful in saloon-keeping, from a financial standpoint. The "profit and loss" to the consumer were not entered upon its books!

A recent cablegram from Yokohama reports that all throughout Japan the women are offering their services in the war. A corps of trained women nurses have been sent from the Tokyo training school to Seoul, and others are preparing to follow. Volunteer nurses are numerous and some women have gone so far as to offer to raise a corps of female soldiers.

Mr. D. K. Obata, of Japan, gave a highly instructive talk on the position of women in Japan before the recent Kansas state convention. Mr. Obata is a student in Baker university who expects to graduate and then return to his native land. He seemed much pleased with the position of women in America and promised to work for the elevation of his own countrywomen on his return.

Dr. John Henry Barrows, in his stirring appeal for a union of all forces against intemperance, at the celebration of Father Mathew's birthday in Chicago, October 10, said: "Moral suasion is good but it ought to be accompanied by legal suasion. Father Mathew's statue to-day in Cork is surrounded by drink shops, and this indicates that the strong arm of the law must enforce the right of the state and of the home to self-protection."

Drunkenness upon the streets is, in spite of the 7,000 open saloon doors, an exceptional thing in Chicago. Rev. John M'Neill, of Glasgow, on his return to Scotland, compared the vast throng of 750,000 people in attendance on Chicago Day at the World's Fair, with the Glasgow exhibition. At the former he did not see a drunken person; while the scenes at the latter made him think Scotland was "the drunkenest nation on earth."

An article in the Good Templar's Watchword gives the sad record of lunacy in Great Britain at the present time. The writer finds an alarming increase, the present proportion being 1 to 326 inhabitants compared to 1 to 536 in 1860. The total number confined is 92,607. Twenty per cent of the patients among the men are directly attributable to their intemperate habits, and eight per cent are among the women. This percentage would be largely increased by those cases which could be indirectly traced to alcoholism.

Mrs. Sarah A. Tooley, one of the brightest women journalists of London, reported the recent General Conference of the Wesleyan church for The Woman's Signal of London. It was the first time, strange to say, that a woman had ever been admitted to those sacred precincts, even in the capacity of reporter, and it is said that her presence caused no less commotion than that of the first woman delegate who has ever yet put in an appearance at said conference. The name of this delegate is Miss Dawson, a maiden lady of high repute in Wesleyan circles for her piety and beneficence, but these credentials did not prevent her case from being "referred to a committee"—after a hot debate in which that redoubtable champion of woman's cause, Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, carried off the brightest laurels, as is his custom.

"HOME, SWEET HOME."

That is what we all strive to have in every respect. Sweetness in the parlor, in the kitchen and personally. In this progressive age, when all can have the comforts of life, there is no excuse for those who are satisfied with just any mode of living, or denying themselves comforts that are easily within their reach. Looking at the home from the respective standpoints of Architecture and Hygiene, one cannot help but exclaim, what hath man and his inventions wrought; the comforts and beauty brought to homes in city and country during recent years. With all of this, think of the thousands of homes in this country which fail to recognize the laws of hygiene, in neglecting to reserve a place for, or planning in, the home a bathroom. Have you neglected this necessary hygienic adjunct on home comforts? If you have, it can be easily and inexpensively remedied, and that in a few days, by the use of the world renowned Mosely Folding Bath Tub. This bath tub is a marvelous invention, and is acknowledged as such by the tremendous sales of the same during the past few years. We have thoroughly examined them and know them to be a genuine comfort to homes without them. Send for their beautifully illustrated catalogue and observe their announcement on page 11 of this issue.

The Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Ry. hardly needs an introduction to most of the delegates to the Cleveland Convention. As they already know, it is the direct line, and runs numerous and well equipped trains daily in either direction Only one fare for the round trip.

The Lexow investigation committee, led by Attorney John Goff, has continued its unsavory work of uncovering New York's municipal corruptions. The effect on the elections is expected to be radical.

After a long illness, the Czar of Russia died at Livadia November 1. His eldest son, Nicholas II., issued a proclamation and assumed the autocracy the following day. Rulers of other nations sent condolences, and France especially mourns her powerful ally, with public demonstrations. The German army and navy will put on mourning.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, the venerable president of the association for the advancement of women, occupied the chair during the second annual convention of the association at Knoxville, Tenn., November 1. The reports were primful of the progress of women in all parts of the Union and in all lines of enterprise.

No intending visitor to the National Convention should fail to secure in advance, a reserved seat for the entire Convention, which may be obtained by inclosing one dollar to Mrs. Grace P. Oviatt, 419 Sibley St., Cleveland, O.

SUCH delegates to the National Convention as do not receive their entertainment cards before leaving home should, upon arrival at Cleveland, repair at once to the Hollenden Hotel, corner Bond and Superior streets, where they will be received by the entertainment committee and assigned to homes. The Hollenden will be general headquarters during the Convention.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND'S proclamation appointing November 29 as a day of Thanksgiving could be well characterized as a model of brevity. But it is excelled in this respect by that of Governor Pennoyer, of Oregon, who makes the following brief and complete announcement of the annual feast: "I hereby appoint the last Thursday of this month a thanksgiving holiday. 'In the day of prosperity be joyful, but in the day of adversity consider.'—Ecclesiastes 7:14."

COFFINS for concealing whisky! This was the way in which Richard Briscoe, of Emporia, Kansas, carried on an illegal traffic in intoxicants. He had been frequently accused, arrested, and his premises searched, but to no avail. But recently his stock of liquors was found hidden in several coffins in an undertaking establishment connected with his other business, and on October 29 he was bound over for trial. Would there were more coffins for the death-dealing fluid and fewer for the innocent victims of the drink!

THE national government has interposed to put a limit to the whisky seizures under the state dispensary law in South Carolina. The Attorney-General sustains the opinion of the treasury department, holding that the state has no authority to enter government bonded warehouses and to confiscate whisky stored therein, even though subject to seizure under the state law. Liquors in government warehouses are wholly exempt from the workings of state laws.

COL. G. W. BAIN holds the position of one of the most popular lecturers in the United States, and it is much for one who started and has always been loyal to the temperance platform to gain that rank. His recent lectures in Boston, at the Masonic Temple in New York city, at the Eastman College in Poughkeepsie, and elsewhere, even more than measure up to his great reputation. White ribbon women are proud of such a "brother-in-law," whose character and record are a model which mothers can hold up to their children alongside of the example of that "Father of us all," Gen. Neal Dow.

DR. HENRY S. LUNN, the distinguished preacher, writer and editor of the Review of the Churches, and projector of pilgrimages to famous shrines in Europe, also the originator of the Grindelwald Conference for the promotion of Christian unity, is coming to New York in the last days of January. He speaks in Dr. Lyman Abbott's pulpit and will be in Chicago about February 10. Dr. Lunn will give public addresses on his favorite themes and desires no fees or remuneration. Here is an admirable opportunity for the W. C. T. U., or any other wide-awake society, to secure the services of a gifted and well-known London preacher without compensation. We suggest that those desiring to address Dr. Lunn do so at once, as the demand for his services will be great. This can be done at No. 5 Endsleigh Gardens, London, N. W., England.

ONE of the leading departments of the National W. C. T. U. which deals with foundation work is that which "aims to develop in our young people the tenderest consideration toward all who are capable of pain." This department has recently received a special appeal from its near-of-kin, the American Humane Association, for coöperation in discouraging, as much as possible, "those methods of instruction, obtaining to some extent in our public schools, whereby the facts of physiology are set forth by means of actual experimentation upon living animals, etherized for that purpose." To this movement the W. C. T. U. unhesitatingly sets its hand and seal, believing that such experiments help to blunt the natural sensibilities of children, making it easy for them to be cruel and cultivating in them those tendencies of disposition which later lead to "inhumanity to man."

THE Philadelphia press having given to the public the impression that Miss Willard favors the organization of colored women in any other sense than simply the organizing of local W. C. T. Unions in which we have been engaged for twenty years, our Chieftain desires us to say that it is wholly untrue, and she believes was set going on purpose to do harm to the white-ribbon movement. We hope that all friends of the cause will discredit every report they may see which is out of line with the general tenor of our honored leader's life and work. "Hardly a day passes," writes Miss Willard, "in which some statement as absurd as it is incorrect is not sent to me by friends from different parts of the country. The enemy is on the warpath to minimize the influence of all who work against the saloon, the gambling house and haunt of infamy, and we must be ourselves alert to refute their ridiculous inventions which are intended only to cripple the growing power of our attack. But I am confident in the faith that our country shall yet be clean, pure and happy."

AT the request of her husband Mrs. Woodbridge's desk was closed the morning after her death and remained so until Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens and Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman, the National recording secretaries, arrived and took up the work just where the loving, busy fingers had dropped it on Tuesday evening, October 23. Mrs. Stevens came directly from the funeral at Ravenna, Ohio, and Mrs. Hoffman from her state convention at Brookfield, Mo. The two efficient officers are maturing the arrangements for the National Convention, so well forwarded by Mrs. Woodbridge, attending to the large correspondence of the office and superintending the publication of the National superintendents' reports. Their address will be The Temple Chicago, until November 14.

LADY HENRY SOMERSET has returned to England with the intention to preside at the quarterly meeting of the national executive committee of the British Women's Temperance Association, November 13 and 14. This meeting is to be held in Birmingham and is one of great importance. Lady Henry Somerset did her utmost to secure earlier dates so that she could be with us at our National Convention in Cleveland, but the committee did not see its way clear to do this; therefore, she sailed October 31, in the steamship New York of the American line, taking with her Mrs. Addie Northam Fields, well known to our white ribbon women as one of the best experts in Loyal Temperance Legion work. Mrs. Fields will remain long enough to introduce our juvenile methods into the work of the British women. Later announcement will be made as to Lady Henry Somerset's return to this country.

IN view of the fact that the Colorado women have been accused of "going over" to the Populist party we are pleased to publish the following resolution passed by the recent W. C. T. U. state convention and to record Mrs. Higgins' reëlection: "Realizing that 'the liquor traffic can never be legalized without sin'; and believing that, at no period in our history was there so favorable an opportunity for the working out of the principles of our constitution, which principles we have constantly affirmed, and that never were placed upon us such weighty responsibilities in relation to the continuance of the legalized liquor curse in our midst, Resolved, Therefore, that to the Prohibition party of this state and nation we pledge our influence, prayers and ballots; and, God being our helper, we shall stand on this platform, making no compromise with any saloon-licensing, soul-destroying liquor party."

THE prominence given in the daily press to the sickness and death of the Czar of Russia is, in one sense, not to be wondered at, since an event of such importance as the death of a ruler must largely affect the political relations of Europe and of the world. But that our papers should treat of this subject in just the manner they do is certainly a matter to excite surprise. That a Republic should attempt to curry favor with an absolute monarchy which, in this case at least, is clearly a despotism, is passing strange. That Alexander III. should be held up as a model man and a model ruler is well-nigh incredible to those who have read or heard Mr. George Kennan's masterly arraignment of the policy which peoples Siberia with strong men and delicate women who are political "suspects." That the Czar had private virtues we are not disposed to doubt, but, as a ruler, he stood for the iron despotism of the middle ages and no man's back was ever more resolutely set to the future. He did not even carry out the reform begun by his father and no nation to-day is in a more deplorable state of political bondage than is Russia. It is to be hoped that the son may have a clearer eye to the signs of the times and a heart more attuned to God's will and His people's weal.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

BY D. S. PENNELL.

A star has passed from out New England's sky,
The last of that long galaxy of lights
Which through the century that has drifted by,
Shone from its heights.

The constellation that has graced our time
And cast its glowing splendor on the age,
Sets with the writing of this mournful line
On history's page.

No more at banquet or scholastic hall
Will rise our genial autocrat in place,
With mirthful word, and, beaming over all,
The kindly face.

O Poet, laden with thy fourscore years,
Bearing thy freshness through the late decades,
Oft hath thy humor turned to smiles our tears,
To light life's shades.

Nor this alone, for long our hearts have owned
Thy depth of tenderness and pathos rare,
Like the sea murmuring in low undertone
'Neath sparkles fair.

"Thine outgrown shell" is resting with us now,
The soul, we trust, on that immortal shore
Where leaves of healing for the nations grow,
For evermore.

THE GEM OF MONOOSNOCK.

A Massachusetts Legend.

BY S. D. N.

The ledges and boulders of the Monoosnock Mountains were protected and concealed two hundred years ago by forests similar, but heavier than those which grow there now. One afternoon in that earlier time, when oak, maple and chestnut were all aglow in their farewell dress, the near settlers at the foot of the mountains gathered to assist Deacon Strong in raising the frame of his new house.

Kindly hearts strengthened willing muscles, and when the sun was setting the owner of the homestead drove in the last oaken pin that held the timbers fast. From the group of men and boys who stood watching below, three hearty cheers went up, and were echoed by a dozen feminine voices from the cabin near by where supper awaited. To the summons of the tin horn the men promptly responded, but unluckily Deacon Strong took his way past a pile of boards where his fiery temper flashed out at the sight of Granny Hayes stealthily draining the brown jug which was considered so important a factor in house raising. Under the force of his words and heavy hand the old woman fell headlong among the sharp-edged boards. He then passed on unconcernedly and joined his guests at the table.

Habit, not reverence nor gratitude, prompted the blessing he asked. The form of devotion perhaps recalled his good temper, and with generous hand he filled the pewter plates. Close upon the "Amen" of the blessing came Mrs. Strong's inquiry for her grandson whose vacant chair stood near hers.

"I met him goin' ter the brook to fetch a bucket o' water," answered Andrew Carter, adding, "He's mighty likely sort of chap, that gran'son o' yourn, marm. S'pose he 'members somethin' how them red-skins killed his folks t'other end o' the settlement an' it makes him kinder ser'ous like."

The ill-chosen subject was changed at the appearance of the youth. He took his seat, and as he drew his plate towards him his extended arm showed a dark, fresh stain on his sleeve. "Stephen, what is that?" asked his grandmother in quick alarm. The young man turned his arm unconscious of the tale it was telling, until he saw the stain. A flush passed over his face and instead of answering his questioner, he looked steadily at his grandfather and said, "Old Granny Hayes had somehow fallen out there on the timbers and cut her forehead; so I helped her up."

"The old woman ought to hang for a witch," growled Luke Wilder. Goodman Houghton lamented that some of the people had wickedly paid her money for fortune-telling, and stated his firm belief that she was in league with evil spirits. Deacon Strong grimly smiled as he thought of the "spirits" he had seen in her company, and avoiding his grandson's eye, asked the young man beside him if he had succeeded in splitting any stone on the south mountain.

"Yes," replied Ezra Beaman, "it splits well, but I want more help in haulin' on it. Wonder yer didn't use it in yer underpinnin' fer the new house."

"I wanted him to," remarked Mrs. Strong, "but he said just what you did about the haulin'."

"I'll tell yer what, Ezra," replied the deacon, "if yer'll help me with yer oxen, I'll git jest as nice a harth and door-stuns as my wife wants ter see, an' then I'll turn to and help you."

"Agreed, that's fair!" said the younger man, and with this promise of neighborly kindness the spirit of goodwill returned to the supper table, while Granny Hayes, with bitterness in her heart hobbled wearily off to her mountain hut. It was a sorry shelter for a human being, but the woman had known no better shelter for many years, and there she hid her miseries, and kept the secrets of her uncanny tricks by which she gained her living. The French and Indian blood which flowed through her veins seemed at war there. They who found her one day sullen and vindictive might meet her the next tenderly caring for a wounded animal, or gathering flowers and talking to the birds.

Deacon Strong's harshness stirred the savage elements so deeply that his grandson's kindness was little heeded by the woman at the time. The wound torn by the sharp edged boards ached and throbbed, and she grew faint and weak as she climbed her lonesome path. The moon was risen when she reached her hut, and lighted a cold, desolate scene, chilling even her rough nature.

She pushed open her unlatched door and the moonlight streamed in upon the ashes where she had left live embers in the morning. She stooped over them and tried to find some warmth for her cold fingers, but the fire had long been dead, and the stones gave her no warmer welcome. Her pet rabbit that usually nestled there had found more comfort in the miserable bed to which she now turned her bruised old humanity.

For several weeks none of the settlers saw her in her usual haunts, nor none but Mrs. Strong and Stephen knew how she suffered nor who ministered to her.

One morning in the Indian summer when she was sitting on the rocks enjoying, with savage comfort, the healing influences of sun and air, she was surprised to hear men's voices and the rumbling of cart wheels nearing her. As they approached she crouched closer to the rocks and was unseen. While she looked down upon them the scar on her forehead throbbed, and her heart beat fast with the torrent of rage it held. Day after day, for a week, Deacon Strong and his men tortured the granite walls with drills and hammers, unconscious of the weird figure perched above them cherishing a hatred that was only held in check by a daily gift of food which was left unseen at her door.

When Saturday morning came, another figure stranger than her own in its uncouth appearance, also sat on the rocks. He was known as her brother, but rarely seen. It was generally believed that he was a scout belonging to the French army, and for that reason he was hated and feared for his skill with Indian weapons, as well as with his flint-lock musket. Some of the settlers openly declared that he had led the attack of the savages on Lancaster, and shared in the infamous bounty which the French had given their red allies.

A revengeful interest bound the brother and sister in their vigils which would have seized any mischance which befell the workmen and turned it to greater harm. Without accident, however, the laborers finished their work, and the last piece of granite was started on its way down the mountain.

Shouldering his iron bar the deacon slowly followed. Suddenly he was stopped by something which whizzed over his head, and sped on unchecked by the severed maple twig which fell at his feet. Startled, he turned in every direction and saw no cause for fear, but something caught his eye gleaming out from the ledge which he had just cleft.

The arrow that a wild impulse sent with a deadly intent had cut a path for a gleam of sunlight which was caught in the rock, then sent out again in a dazzling stream of brilliant light. In an instant there flashed through the beholder's mind the stories he had unheeded of precious stones found among the mountains. With eager strides he reached the place where the rock held the glittering thing high above his head.

It seemed not ready yet to leave nature's setting and bear the brand of a market price, but clung firmly to the granite wall, returning in gleaming light the last rays of the day. The deacon tried to scale the rocks, but his foot could get no hold, and he reluctantly turned homeward and overtook his teams and drivers.

At first he was silent in regard to his discovery, but finally ventured to relate it to the men on promise of secrecy, and engaged Ezra Beaman's assistance in removing the treasure early Monday morning. The strange story, however, by some means became known, and in spite of Puritan principles and strict Sunday laws the mountain path was traveled Sabbath day by many feet, yet no eye saw the coveted gem. Deacon Strong, though sorely tempted and tried, waited till Monday morning, when at an early hour with Ezra and Stephen he returned to the mountain. He was far in advance of them when he paused, standing where he had stood Saturday night, and again looked up on the face of the rock. Carefully he scanned the gray wall, moved his position from side to side, stooped and looked upward; but no answering gleam met his gaze. With a strange misgiving he tried to ascend the rock where he had failed before, but it crumbled beneath him, and when Stephen and Ezra came they found him bruised and bleeding where he had fallen. They tenderly cared for him, and finding his injuries not serious continued the search for the lost gem until the deacon was satisfied that their efforts were useless. Sullenly he retraced his steps down the mountain-side where he met the kindly inquiries of his neighbors with curt answers and distrustful feelings. His friends soon realized that the whole matter was a sore subject and avoided it; but nevertheless the deacon's mind was troubled, and after a struggle with his conscience he secretly sought a questionable aid.

A UNIVERSAL PRAYER HOUR.

A SYMPOSIUM.

At the suggestion of Miss Willard the following letter was recently sent out from THE UNION SIGNAL to prominent thinkers and leaders in religious and reform work:

"In recognition of the Christian world's growing sense of its spiritual relations, and of the efficacy of union in the exercise of its spiritual powers, what would you think of a universal noontide hour of prayer, for many years observed in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union as indispensable for the guidance of our work? Might not such bodies as the Evangelical Alliance, the Salvation Army, the Y. M. C. A., Home and Foreign missionary Societies, the W. C. T. U., and others, secure a mastering spiritual impulse by union in a common moment of prayer, for more direct leading and for the fuller revelation and consecration of Christian power against all evil forces?"

The responses have been most cordial and evince a hearty concurrence in the idea as one of genuine inspiration for deepening the tide of spiritual power which is to sweep the world God-ward.

THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Your suggestion that the hour from twelve to one be consecrated as a universal prayer hour has my hearty sympathy. Though the organic union of the churches be far in the future, such a union of God's people as you propose would certainly seem to be practicable, and is devoutly to be wished. A flame of devotion daily encircling the earth, like a ring of Saturn, would not only make light enough to enable many Christians to see eye to eye, but would generate heat enough to fuse many hearts into oneness of love and purpose.

Yours fraternally, JOSIAH STRONG,
Gen. Sec. of the Evangelical Alliance for the United States of America

New York, N. Y.

THE SALVATION ARMY.

Concerning the matter of your letter, I am sure it will be of interest to you to know that for ten years or more the army has faithfully kept to its rule of prayer at 12:30. Of course, generally only a few minutes are kept. Sometimes, however, we spend an hour gathered together and enjoy it very much; but all over the world each officer and soldier is requested to spend at least a few moments in prayer, when the hands of the clock point to half-past twelve, and this regardless of time, place or circumstances. Those who happen to visit our headquarters at that time have been much interested to see the many workers, in the midst of the rush of business, drop pens and paper as soon as the bell rings the hour of 12:30 and kneel down to have a little prayer-meeting. All the way from the top of the building to the bottom, you can hear them in the different departments, singing and praying most enthusiastically. It would be impossible for us to spend an entire hour, as we are so continually rushed, and then, of course, our people have meetings to go to every night.

Yours, in our holy war. MAUD B. BOOTH.

KING'S DAUGHTERS AND SONS.

With reference to the "hour of prayer" you know that I am thoroughly in sympathy with the view that more spiritual, aye, and mental vigor, and therefore more of actual strong work along every line of Christian endeavor, would be the outgrowth of the observance of such an hour than would be the outgrowth of any one hour of comfort in the day, along any line, without it. We are coming to live so much in throngs and crowds, to think too much perhaps in groups and masses. I believe we should work together and act together, but I believe we should do much more thinking and praying apart, and that our acting together would receive therefrom its best element and impetus. We already have, as you know, a "twilight hour," and I have looked upon that hour as much more likely to be universally regarded than any hour in the midst of the burden and heat of the day. But I, personally, should be in favor of a transference of the hour, if necessary, in order that we might keep time and touch with the heart of the universe in its daily uplifting toward the heart of God. Cordially yours,

MARY LOWE DICKINSON,
Gen. Sec. International Order of the King's Daughters and Sons.
New York, N. Y.

UNITED SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

Personally I am in favor of the plan of consecrating the hour between twelve and one o'clock for the soldiers of Christ everywhere, and I believe that such an hour faithfully lived up to, will mean a great deal for spiritual Christianity and the unity of Christian people.

Yours cordially,

JOHN WILLIS BAER,
Gen. Sec. of the United Societies of Christian Endeavor.
Boston, Mass.

CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

I heartily approve of the effort being made to consecrate the hour between twelve and one o'clock as a universal prayer hour, and the International Christian Workers' Association have already done this as an association and individually. Shall be pleased to coöperate in every possible way that this noontide hour may be more fully observed throughout the world. Fraternally,

JOHN C. COLLINS,
Sec. International Christian Workers' Association.

WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS.

Madame De Staël says: "To pray together, in whatever tongue or ritual, is the most tender brotherhood of sympathy and hope that men can contract in this life."

I am sure this expression has such quick response in your soul that it will readily stir your thought like a bugle call. The reflection that as the clock strikes the noontide hour—the hour between the wax and wane of the day—symbolic hour!—all those who worship the Christ are bowed in prayer, in adoration, in petition, one band linked together by this golden chain, such a thought must stimulate faith. If "prayer moves the Hand which moves the world" what a living force could be thus generated to win the world for Christ.

Do not forget that it is prayer which holds the fleet angel fast until he bless thee, or, as Tennyson says,

"More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of."

PRESBYTERIAN BOARD OF MISSIONS.

For some years there has been observed by the various mission boards and societies, a twelve o'clock prayer-meeting specially in the interest of foreign missions. We do not confine ourselves to that one subject, but try to remember the cause of Christ in all its branches.

Perhaps this hour would be a suitable one for the kind of union prayer-meeting you suggest. I remain, with kind regards, fraternally yours,

S. H. CHESTER,
Sec. Foreign Missions Pres. Church of the United States.

WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

In our missionary work of the Methodist Episcopal church I have been for several months constantly pushing this idea—for a round-the-world custom. I am sure, while I hope the impulse is divine, the possibility of its practical form came from the uplift of thought and the strengthening of faith that has come to me in attendance on our W. C. T. U. noon meetings as I have had opportunity.

If we only would think that "more things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams" is not only poetry, but a practical, working, prosaic fact, it would be better for our intelligence as well as our faith.

Yours sincerely,

LOUISE MANNING HODGKINS,
Editor of Heathen Woman's Friend.
Boston, Mass.

METHODIST BOARD OF MISSIONS.

I cordially agree in your proposition to have an hour of prayer appointed for all the societies that have for their object the lifting up of the human race. Let us have such an hour appointed. So far as possible we will have its observance in all our missions. Yours faithfully,

C. C. MCCABE,
Missionary Secretary the Methodist Episcopal Church.

WORKING GIRLS' CLUBS.

More and more are we all becoming impressed with our absolute dependence upon our Heavenly Father and upon prayer. It would be a sacred link if all could join at a given time for prayer for each other. The hour only seems a little impractical, but the idea most beautiful. I do not know what action the clubs, as a whole, would take, but as individual Christians, many would join with hearty enthusiasm. Faithfully yours,

GRACE H. DODGE,
Editor of Far and Near.

MINERVA BRACE NORTON.

Who does not feel the thrill of Dante's majestic scorn, as he reads:

"Non ragimiam di lor, ma guarda e passa?"
"Let us not speak of them, but look and pass!"

This line has given to immortal oblivion those "colorless shades" who lived for self.

But there are those whom we must remember and of whom we must speak. Their benignant influence has shaped other lives and they have made themselves a part of what we all consciously desire in our best moments.

In the royal month of October in this New England of the west, when the rugged outlines of the oaks were concealed by a splendor of color which rivaled their sister maples of the east, a Puritan nature left us for a world whose beauty is symbolized by the most priceless gems. An astute foreign critic, whose impressions are subtle and comprehensive, has discovered under the superficial aspects of American society, tenacious characteristics of our Puritan ancestry and occasionally a personality—a woman—who embodies them all. "One reveres her and she is touching. One is thankful to her for existing, as one of the noble things of the world."

MINERVA BRACE NORTON.

Minerva Brace Norton was a Puritan mind and soul possessed with that "inborn love of justice" which those princes of our race brought from Holland; and with their "power of abiding,"—their birthright as Englishmen.

The three great enthusiasms of this life were given to teaching, to missions and to nature.

Mrs. Norton had a higher education in days when advanced study for women was exceptional. Her chief teacher, Miss Mary Mortimer, brought from England a reverence for the noble traditions of learning, and gave, out of a superb mind and nature, such a passionate impetus to her pupils that it became a ruling power in their lives. With the instinct of genius this great woman placed foremost in its influence upon character the study of history, and long before it had taken that literary rank which it holds to-day history was to her poetry, art, science. Such it ever was to her pupil, Mrs. Norton, whose last work was to embody in her memoir, "A True Teacher," the gratitude and admiration of a lifetime. It was not strange that she should have given the largest share of her hero worship to Arnold of Rugby, and that, when in Europe, no spot should have seemed to her so sacred as where he lived and taught. In her own teaching she scorned everything short of the highest ideals, and her patience was as infinite as her ambition. Nothing less than the solidity of educated character was her aim.

But the heroic elements, so predominant in this nature, found their most sympathetic expression in the chivalry of the Christian church—foreign and home missions. Their dreams, their achievements filled her imagination and her heart. Their grandeur, vastness and onward movement stirred and thrilled her, to quote her own words, "like strains of martial music." As secretary of the Bureau of Exchange of the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions in Boston and as a minister's wife in a four-year-old city of Dakota, she touched the possibilities and realities of missions.

But deeper than her enthusiasm for missions, stronger than her admiration for true learning, was her love of nature. Wordsworth was her singer, and this greatest of nineteenth century poets did not feel himself more akin than did the speechless poetry of her being to all that is lovely or majestic in mountain, field and sea. Before some miracle of light, mystery of shadow, breath of flowers, tears alone would tell of an emotion no words could express. Architecture and music were her favorite expression of beauty in art; but for a few painters, the most gentle and lovely of them all, Raphael, Correggio and Angelico, she reserved a shrine, exquisite with the votive offerings of her tenderness, perfumed with the incense of her love.

"Please never write anything about me, I have never done anything to deserve it," she wrote to a friend who desired to prepare a sketch of her life. Of what she did we will not speak. Her work was always well done, of the kind that is its own most eloquent eulogy. Through the gracious permission of your president, Mrs. Norton has a place among the notable women whose character and deeds are the pride of your great reforms and whose lives are recorded in these columns. Not so much through her work as her affections, was she a temperance woman. But we will hope that one who has loyally loved Miss Frances E. Willard, Mrs. Mary B. Willard, of Berlin, and held in such high esteem others of your gifted sisterhood, may find a place in your memory and in your hearts. Surely as Miss Willard's collaborateur in the biography of her mother, Mrs. Norton's own kinswoman, that place is already assured.

A sect in the sixteenth century chose as its symbol the "Rosecroix," a rose flowering upon the cross; science and beauty blossoming against a background of faith.

No one more truly enjoyed the richness of life than Mrs. Norton, but the flower grew about a cross of sacrifice and pain. "I worship Thee, Sweet Will of God," was the supreme utterance of her soul.

The open sesame to character lies in the smile, just as the natural sunlight accentuates every detail of a landscape, while it gives one comprehensive tone to the whole, so the spirit's sunlight brings out any defect in the human face and reveals the dominant color of the personality.

"I shall never see again her white smile," said one of her friends, whose strong artistic sense gives ever the right word. Strength, truth, love, force, rectitude, benevolence were all blended by the infinite sweetness which lay back of all, into the soft radiance of her smile.

For that ultimate expression of herself, those who loved her used to watch and in those hours of awful suffering, to long. The world grows old and we often feel an ironical sadness at the lack of the heroic in modern history and modern lives. Still and forever such as these will furnish us a truly epic grandeur in their soul's drama.

"They climbed the steep ascent of heaven,
Through peril, toil and pain—
O God! to us may grace be given
To follow in their train."

DID you ever stand at the foot of a great lighthouse at night? Through brilliant lenses splendid floods of light were poured out to sea, but not one tiny little gleam of radiance did that great lamp pour on the bit of sand close around the base of its tower. Do not be like lighthouses in this regard. Wherever else, far away or near, you pour the beams of your Christian life, be sure you brighten the space close about you in your own home. Let the light of gentleness, forbearance, kindness, unselfishness and thoughtful ministry fall on the life next to yours, on your weary mother, your burdened father, your tempted brother, upon the children in your family, on the guests who drop in, on servants who help in domestic duties. ITINERATING IN JAPAN.

(Conctuded.)

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Throughout Japan there is a strong tendency for the work of the W. C. T. U. to pass under the management of men, in consequence of which its very title may, in many instances, become a misnomer. It is exceedingly difficult to make a whole convert to Christianity out of a heathen man. The truth is he would a little rather hold back that part of the coming of the kingdom described as the realm where "there is neither male nor female." A Japanese brother (?) professing to be a most earnest Christian said to us, "Why do you spend the time with women, you have only to address the men and when they become temperance men they go home and tell their households what they must do." How sublimely simple! To his mind, we only need to do half the amount of temperance preaching, and exalt the virtue of obedience and servility in the other half who do not hear! Achilles was immortal except in one heel; but there he got his wound, of course, and died. It was his mother's fault. She should have plunged him twice, not once, into the river Styx. It is the mother church's fault that the best of men may be within reach of that serpent who bruises the undipped heel—masculine conceit—which will remain as long as a masculine ministry of the gospel holds sway. The church will perish unless it ushers in the time when "the women that publish the tidings are a great host."

The work seemed on a very genuine footing at Kobe. The public meeting was not very interesting, but at the meeting for women only we had a good time in spite of a heavy rain. They listened most patiently and at the end asked very intelligent questions as to the best methods for pushing the work.

Our next stop was at Osaka, where we have no union, but many interested friends. A very bitter anti-foreign and anti-Christian feeling is growing up in Japan of late years, and nowhere in all our journeys were we ever called upon to encounter such rudeness and insult as in the Y. M. C. A. hall at Osaka. Strange to say, the Christian men seemed to have but very little control over their own house. The most obscene insults were heaped upon the mission school-girls when they attempted to sing. Every mention of the name of Christ was greeted with shouts of derision. My feeble attempts to defend the cause by shaming the disorderly elements into decency were, in part, thwarted by an interpreter, who seemed lukewarm in the cause of proper order. It may be possible to get up a "happy family," Parliament of Religions (?) in Christendom, but I venture to prophesy that such an effort would be broken up in mob violence if attempted under other than Christian auspices.

Then we went to Kioto, where it was necessary to pause again and rest a considerable time, for neither of us had yet fully rallied from the poison we had imbibed in visiting the opium dens of China. Mrs. Andrew especially was very poorly. We had been looking forward to Kioto from the time we had received information in a letter written in English by a Japanese that we ought to meet and consult fully with Miss Denton, of Kioto, as to our temperance work. "Miss Denton," said the letter, "is the American Board of Foreign Missions." Perhaps some would object to that declaration, but we are sure all our friends in Japan will agree that Miss Denton approaches closely to being at least "the W. C. T. U." of Japan, because of her intense zeal and interest in the white-ribbon cause. We spent a delightful ten days in the home with her and Miss Wainwright, holding numerous informal consultations and meetings with various sets of Japanese workers, for in Miss Denton's opinion this was the best method of effecting permanent good, and it was most suited to our enfeebled condition.

We held one large afternoon meeting for women and a large public meeting, over which a Japanese Bible woman, Miss Kugimoto, presided very efficiently and with great dignity. The Japanese women had presided over our meetings for women elsewhere; but we were pleased at Kioto, Yokohama and Tokio, to have women take the chair at the great public meetings also. At Kioto we were fearful lest the disorders of Osaka might be repeated, and hence held firmly to the determination to hold the meeting in a Christian church. The members of Buddhist and other temperance movements strongly protested to Miss Denton and declared they could not come in any considerable numbers to a church. But she held firmly to it and the meeting was a success, the church being packed in every part. All listened most respectfully and showed real enthusiasm.

At Yokohama, whither we next went by sea, we were met out in the bay by Mr. Sho Nemoto, who had come down from Tokio for the purpose, by Miss Simons, Miss Griffiths and Mr. Hayaohi. At the wharf were a crowd of Japanese men and women—beloved and earnest friends of the cause. Among them General Taro Ando and Mr. Ito, and soon after reaching our place of entertainment, Mrs. Yajima, from Tokio, the president for Japan, and a friend came to bid us welcome. We were too weary to see them that night, but they remained under the roof with us and the next morning we spent together. We immediately felt our hearts drawn to Mrs. Yajima in warm affection. She is a true white-ribboner with hearty zeal for the cause in its most uncompromising form.

It is due our Japanese friends to say that our welcome to their country would have been tenfold more a demonstration had we been able to permit it, but to every place we were obliged to send the request that no social attentions should be paid us. All the strength we had we felt must go into solid work in meetings.

After holding a large women's meeting at which about three hundred were present, we proceeded to Tokio for the Sabbath. Japanese brothers accompanied us to show every courtesy possible, and Miss Spencer, of the Tokio mission, came part way by train to meet us and convey us to her home. It was a very rainy Sabbath at Tokio but nevertheless the house was full. Mrs. Yajima presided and Mr. Sho Nemoto and Gen. Taro Ando took part in the meeting. A remarkably good interpreter was able to allow me to deliver my entire address without pause, and then he redelivered it in Japanese with scarce the omission of a single phrase.

Returning to Yokohama Monday we were delighted by the arrival of a ship from San Francisco bringing Bishop and Mrs. Ninde and our white ribbon sister, Mrs. Mary C. Ninde. Just a glimpse of them and then we were off to our own loved country.

The farewell meeting was held in the Union church the same night we embarked for America. The church is one in which funeral services for Miss West were held: it is erected on the spot where Commodore Perry landed to make his treaty with the Japanese people about forty years ago. At this meeting several made interesting addresses, and we were cheered by the announcement that a W. C. T. U. of seventy-eight charter members had been organized as the result of the woman's meeting the Saturday previous. Miss Simons, Miss Griffiths, Mr. Tsuda and Mr. Ito conducted us to our steamship, the Belgic, and bade us good-by on board about midnight. We awakened the next morning to find ourselves tossing on the deep, and with a strange sense of loss as we remembered that our task was finished and the last meeting in the round-the-world journey over. What next? God knows; and "it is always better further on" for those committed to His keeping. KATE C. BUSHNELL.

HOW I BECAME A CITIZEN.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—When I found an opportunity had come for me to vote it did not take long to make up my mind so to do—not much longer than it takes a hungry boy to set his sharp teeth into a welcome slice of bread and butter. This being my "maiden" act toward live citizenship, I was preparing to march confidently to the registration booth, when I suddenly bethought me that I had opened my innocent eyes, not under the skies that bend above the "land of the free," but in another country where only those of the royal line may entertain hopes of ever sitting on the executive throne. Therefore I must be naturalized.

Having a feeling, not of fear, but of unusedness, I solicited the escort of a "brother-in-law" and set out for the awesome, dingy court room. Once there, I forgot my own errand at the sight of the applicants thronging forward for their "papers." They were all duly sworn, though it did not seem to matter in the least whether they understood the nature or language of that oath,—indeed, I had the temerity to wonder if the clerk himself knew what jargon he was rolling so untrippingly off his tongue.

My turn came, and with uplifted hand and a desperate effort to realize that the act was of the least gravity or importance in the world, I took an oath, the substance of which was that I and my witness—for my escort proved to be an essential, after all—were telling the whole truth and nothing but the truth. "How long have you known this lady?" the gentleman was asked. "Three years and a half." "Can you swear to the facts she has given?" (regarding my respective number of years in nation, state and city). "I have her good word for it," answered my scrupulously conscientious friend. "That won't do—how do you know she is stating the truth?" "Why, I know it." "That is, according to your best knowledge, she has been in this country the time stated?" "According to my best knowledge." That seemed to "do," for the paper was duly signed by which I was to apply at the door of the nation for permission to become one of the family. The foregoing quibble was somewhat of a puzzle to me, but I humbly concluded it was all clear to the masculine (?) brains concerned, so gratefully taking the document from the clerk's hand, I departed to find a judge and complete the ceremony.

After a series of labyrinthine wanderings up and down the great halls and in and out of great chambers of court, a judge was at last found "at home" and I sat down to await my turn, inwardly wondering how, in spite of my native fearlessness in the world of business, I could have made any headway where a "free white alien" woman was almost non est. Should I speak as small boys do, I should say I "wasn't in it."

While I sat waiting, other "free white aliens" came pouring in, and with all my American spirit of respect for the working man, I could only say to myself, "like dumb driven cattle," as I looked at the stolid, often brutal faces, low foreheads, dull eyes of these, my to-be fellow citizens. Through a bit of misunderstanding, I was not sworn in with the others so was able to stand near by, an interested observer.

There were about twenty of these men, each with his witness. They were herded in a corner by means of rough gestures and gruff orders from those "within the court," and all the labor-stained, perhaps honest, often visibly tremulous right hands were held up at one time, and the rapid oath administered. Since no word of protest was uttered by any one, the natural conclusion was that the glib American syllables conveyed clear and acceptable meaning to every alien's mind. Then came the examination of witness and applicant. "How long have you known this man?" "Is he a good man?" "How long have you been in this country? this state?" In many cases neither applicant nor witness could understand a word of English, and some bystander—alien—would make out to put questions and elicit queer, wavering, nervous or half-indignant, scarcely intelligible responses. Thus through prompting and ingenuity the free white aliens became noble American citizens, with the full right of suffrage.

I took the oath. "Mr. X., how long have you known this lady?" (they might have said "woman," I think!) "Three years and a half." "Oh, that won't do!" and our superior examiner pushed the document I had given him back to me. "Why won't it do?" "You have sworn here that you know this lady to have been in this country for five years." "I do know it, sir!" "How do you know it?" "I have known her personally for three years and a half and I know her relations." "That won't do at all—you must know that such a person as Maud Schilling existed in this country five years ago." Then this "free white alien" grew indignant. "What better knowledge do you want?" I asked. "Some one who has known you for five years—or knew you in this country five years ago, or knew your father in this country." "Supposing I cannot furnish such since there is no one in this city who knew me in person five years ago?" "Then we cannot naturalize you; you must take out intention papers and wait five years." "Well, I won't" I said within myself and walked out to seek redress. Some one who was an interested listener followed to suggest we go to another judge, saying nothing about our recent difficulty. We did so, and my curiosity to see if it were possible to swear to the same truths and have them both rejected and accepted predominated over personal interest in the process of naturalization. "How long have you known this woman?" (The word "woman" encouraged me.) "Ever since she has been in Chicago," was the answer, and his honor could see for himself by the document in his hand how many years that was. "Is she a good woman, of good moral character, intending to support the constitution of the United States?" Then, to me, "How long has it been your purpose to become a citizen of the United States? You swear to this intention?" He signed his name and I was free. Who was right? Judge One or Judge Two? Remembering the scene I have already described regarding my brother "aliens," I came to two conclusions. In the first instance I was examined by a hireling who realized that a woman with one small vote concerning one small share of the state's business was before him and his conscience came into sudden play on a technicality, which, however, was no difficulty in the case of the men whose vote was another thing entirely. In the second case, my examiner was a man, a true judge, exercising judgment and meting out justice to whom justice was due.

As I turned away a clerk tapped me on the arm and said as one speaks to children—"Now, lady, you just go up stairs to room No.—, and the man at the desk will give you a paper with a big gold seal, which you must keep!" Dutifully I did so, and in five minutes more, good Queen Victoria, whom I had loved from my cradle, had lost a loyal subject. MAUD SCHILLING.

ANTWERP LETTER.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It is sometimes difficult in a foreign country to separate tradition from facts when looking upon different mementoes and relics of ancient history. When this is successfully accomplished it is even more puzzling to know what will interest readers in general. Horace said: "He who unites what is useful with what is agreeable wins every vote, his book crosses the sea."

I believe that which will be most useful and agreeable to all who read THE UNION SIGNAL is to tell every incident that will lead in the trend of the onegreat thought,—the advancement of the cause of temperance.

I wish I could photograph a little prayer-meeting that was held in a cozy rustic parlor in Antwerp, just after the close of the Peace Congress there, and just prior to our departure for the Interparliamentary Conference that was to open here at The Hague. There were present (about this altar of prayer) about twenty of the Christian delegates. English, American and French, irrespective of denominational beliefs, asked God's blessing on the work that had been done, and His benediction on the future that was before us.

My mind involuntarily dwelt on the record in Sacred Writ of the Pentecostal morning when the disciples were gathered in Jerusalem waiting for the promised blessing from their ascended Lord. I think each of us went out from that little prayer-meeting, feeling a new consecration for life's work!

A number of the delegates to the Peace Congress were also delegates to the Interparliamentary Conference. A little sketch of a personal character concerning a few of the active workers for peace who are also doing much for the work of temperance may not be amiss. First, I would mention Hon. Gavin Brown Clark, M. P., England. He is always ready to act and speak for temperance. His wife is his active coadjutor. At wine drinking feasts, theirs are two glasses that hold nothing but water.

Mr. Clark, in addition to having been three times reelected as a member of Parliament, and having there done much "for the causes of peace, justice and temperance" is also a very active member of the International Arbitration and Peace Association of London. This is the second oldest peace organization in the British Empire. The first organization of this kind was called the Peace Society. Hon. Henry Richard, M. P., was, for forty years, the secretary. As this latter society seemed to be incorporated somewhat on a denominational basis, some active promoters of the cause of arbitration and peace felt there was a necessity for the existence of another society. Hence arose the incorporation of this "International Arbitration and Peace Association," of which Mrs. and Mr. Clark, Mr. Hodgson Pratt and Mr. Felix Moschelles and Mme. Moschelles and Mr. Lucas Mainville Burroughs are active workers. This society has actively assisted in the work of the Peace Bureau at Berne, Switzerland, and Mr. Hodgson Pratt has made extensive journeys through different parts of Europe spreading the propaganda of the gospel of peace, whilst Hon. Mr. Clark, as a member of the British Parliament, ever has his vote and his ability consecrated to the furtherance of the same great cause.

Hon. Thomas Snape, M. P., is another able English gentleman who works most conscientiously in the same way. He is a native of Lancashire, in which county he formerly carried on business, from which he has now retired and is devoting himself to public duties. A resident of Liverpool, he is a member of Lancashire county council, and is an ardent worker against the drink traffic. He devotes a large share of his time to the cause of international arbitration and peace, and holds the important offices of president of the Liverpool Peace Society as well as vice-president of the London Peace Society. His wife is a most active co-worker in all these efforts for the promulgation of peace and temperance. By her gentle spirit, genial hospitality and quickness to respond to every call of duty she is a most efficient aid.

Mr. Snape came to the United States in 1891 as a delegate to the Ecumenical Synod held at that time in Washington, D. C. Before that important assemblage Mr. Snape read a paper on "International Arbitration." President Harrison was president, and after the reading of the paper addressed the meeting upon the subject under consideration.

Mr. Felix Moschelles is the distinguished artist who in England is painting peace pictures, illustrative of its blessings and the horrors of war. Probably no one living man has worked more years as assiduously as he for the promulgation of the principles of arbitration.

During a residence in France for six years, where he was studying art, he was always actively engaged in his one grand effort, the peace propaganda. Subsequently going to Antwerp, he was there always trying to form "groups," out of which societies could grow, but with very little avail. He was about this time much strengthened in his apostleship of peace, by acquaintance with Mazzini, of Italy, and with Hon. Henry Richard, of England, both pioneers in the same grand work.

He, in company with Mr. Hodgson Pratt, began the work of apostles of the cause, and journeying through Europe they formed societies in different countries. I think no living man has been so many years engaged in this work.

Rev. Evans Darby, D. D., is another noble worker for temperance as well as peace. His great-grandfather was a British admiral named Henry D'Esters Darby. He was at one time captain of the ship Bellerophon (on board of which Napoleon was subsequently made a prisoner), and this, it may be remembered, was at the "Battle of the Nile."

Rev. Mr. Darby, it will therefore be seen, can lay no claim to an ancestral lineage of peace lovers. Mr. Darby is a Congregational minister. He was ordained in 1869, and held a pastorate at Chippenham. On the death of Henry Richard, M. P., he was elected unanimously to succeed this gentleman in the office of secretary of the London Peace Society. Mr. Darby now devotes all of his time to the work, and wherever he goes he is a strong advocate of temperance. Wherever a Peace Congress is held he is there. He was at the Paris Congress of Peace in 1889. He was secretary and organized the Congress that was held in London in 1890. He attended the Rome Peace Congress in 1891. His was the first English-speaking tongue that greeted me in that strange land—Rome.

Mr. Darby was also in Berne at the Congress held there in 1892, and at Chicago, in 1893, he was one of the most efficient delegates from Europe. In Antwerp this year he made one of the clearest and most logical speeches of the Congress, and has signed our Polyglot Petition of the W. C. T. U. Since he returned from Chicago, he has formed the Arbitration Alliance, and also reports that a new society has been formed on the west coast of Scotland, of which the Marquis of Lorne is the president. Dr. Darby is the chairman of the British section of the committee appointed by the ecclesiastical conference that met in Chicago in 1893. The object of this committee is to complete the signing of a petition that is to be presented to the various governments of the world, asking them to establish an international court of arbitration. Other good workers for temperance are Miss Peckover, of Wisbeck; Mr. C. Dalrymple Hall, of England; Mme. Dalencourt, Paris; Miss Ellen Robinson, Waterloo, near Liverpool; Miss Harriet Quelch, Bristol; Mme. de Goey, Antwerp; Mr. Hezekiah Butterworth, Boston, Mass., and Rev. Dr. Trueblood, Boston, Mass. We were a small band in that large Peace Congress, even when we were all numbered (and there no doubt were others whose names I do not know), yet "a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump" so far as this, that the Polyglot Petition was unanimously adopted.

I like Holland better than Belgium in one particular. There does not seem to be so much conviviality. Cleanliness reigns here. MARY FROST ORMSBY.

A SUGGESTION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I feel moved to write you on a subject which has been very near my heart for three or four years, and one whose importance impresses me more and more—the date of the National W. C. T. U. Convention. I realize that there must be very weighty and serious objections to changing the time for holding the Convention, and yet, if arrangements could be made to hold it in the future sometime during the regular summer vacation, I think a large number of women would be benefited and the work be helped. The present date of the Convention debars the thousands of teachers in this country from attending. Many long as I do for the help and inspiration of the Convention in the W. C. T. U. work put upon us, but we can take THE DAILY SIGNAL so are not the greatest sufferers. In our colleges and in public schools even where we have scientific temperance instruction are hundreds of teachers who know absolutely nothing of W. C. T. U. work. Many of these are highly cultured women who would gladly attend a National convention for the intellectual treat, and the result would be not only an increase in W. C. T. U. members but also an immense impetus to temperance instruction and sentiment in our schools and colleges. Most of the state conventions, too, are held during the school year, so that the utter ignorance of W. C. T. U. work shown by teachers and their indifference ought not, perhaps, to surprise me as it constantly does.

May I say a word also of Dr. Kate Bushnell's letter in THE UNION SIGNAL? Her plan pleases me very much, and I hope it may be carried into effect. I feel sure such an arrangement would help in many ways the home unions, and would be of incalculable benefit to the "distant" ones. I would suggest the terms "near" and "distant," rather than "home" and "distant." I am a native of Natal, South Africa, and have spent nearly all my life there, so know something of the difficulties of the "distant" work and the need the unions have of all the help that can be given.

UNSUITABLE MARRIAGES.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Nothing which we see at the present day savors more strongly of the idea that woman was created solely for man's gratification than the favor which the marriage of a young girl to an old man receives from all classes, and the disfavor of a union between a man of mature age and a woman a year or two his senior. "Old enough to be his mother" is frequently said where the difference is from two to four years. A woman who had no idea that even in thought she discriminated betwixt the sexes, in speaking of the approaching nuptials between a bachelor of thirty-two and a widow of thirty-four, said: "The bridegroom was of a much more suitable age for either of the widow's daughters," who were growing school children. All the more harmful is this evil because it calls forth no rebuke, while with a pure, enlightened public sentiment and a correct knowledge of the laws of health, the marriage of an immature woman would be held as criminal in the highest degree.

In true wedlock there is a fellowship of souls and no unequal yoke of youth with age, of purity with licentiousness, of master and menial. The man who unites himself with a person much his junior does so with the full belief that his will is to be the will of the family, however much he may have held out to the youthful maiden the advantages of being "an old man's darling." The recent death of such an one in a charitable institution in this county revealed the fact that since he had become enfeebled by age and disease he had been twice married to young women each of whom bore him several children, most of whom are county charges.

The fact of their being dependent is the least of the ills resulting compared with the undesirability to the state of such citizens as they are liable to become.

Let us rather encourage the sentiment of Scott, who says:

"The young bridegroom hath youthful bride,
The old bridegroom the old."

THE HOP QUESTION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I am glad you have opened your columns for a discussion of the hop question and I feel that I must "cry aloud and spare not." How my heart aches to see so many whose names are on church records, planting and picking hops. And I do not understand how women who have taken the W. C. T. U. pledge can do so, but they do and give the same excuse I have known saloon-keepers to give.

A man who was selling liquor said to me, "As long as liquor is made and sold I may as well sell it and have the money as any one." Another who proposed to go into the retail liquor trade said: "There is more money to be made in that than any other business." Another said: "I have a family to support; if I could find some other business in which I could make money as fast I would quit." A gambler said, "I am not able physically to do a day's work and I don't know of any business that I can get that I can make a living."

Now hop pickers and hop raisers make the very same excuses. They do it for the money. If money makes a thing right, then selling liquor is right and the W. C. T. U. should "fold its banners and silently steal away."

But we all know it is no excuse for wrong doing to say we make money by it. Now let us trace the question to its source. The liquor-seller must have customers or he cannot make money. The manufacturer must find a market for his liquor or he would not make it: the hop-raiser must sell his hops or he cannot make money. So the saloon customer buys the liquor, the saloon-keeper takes the money and pays the manufacturer. The manufacturer buys the hops and pays the money he received from the saloon-keeper; the hop raiser pays over to the pickers the money which came from the customer at the bar.

Here is an item from a religious paper, the reference being to a university settlement under the control of the church: "We have no idle men, women or children, those not having employment at home are making good wages in the hop fields of Oregon and Washington."

Hops are raised to be made into beer. Beer is made to be sold—made for the money there is in it, and customers must be found—somebody must drink the beer, or there would be no money in it. Hop raisers, Christian men, or at least men who were officers in churches and professed to be Christians, sell their hops direct to the brewers.

Mothers who pick hops to be made into beer to be sold to somebody's husbands and sons, go to prayer-meeting and say, "Pray for my boy, I fear he is drifting away." How Christians can do this passes my comprehension, for if the drink traffic in all its branches is not contrary to the spirit of Christ then nothing is. Forgive me if what I have written seems harsh. I feel only kindness and an earnest, burning desire to see my fellow Christian soldiers "come out from among them and be separate."

AN ANSWER TO "OUR CATHOLIC FRIENDS."

EDITOR UNION SIGNAL:—The question of such interest to "Dana Mansfield" in No. 42, Vol. XX of October 25, 1894, deserves a reply.

I therefore take great satisfaction in being able to state that both dancing and drinking are prohibited at church fairs by Archbishop Feehan all over the archdiocese of Chicago, as well as in that of Columbus, but if a few lawless people, such as those of the church on Carpenter street, will disobey their chief pastor, the public would show their good common sense, to say the least, by absenting themselves from such disgraceful antichristian assemblies. A father is not to blame if his children disobey him. Nor is the church at fault on account of some wayward members. Remember! In the College of the Apostles the number was only twelve, and one of them was a traitor. Yours sincerely,

Chicago, Ill. A CATHOLIC.

The life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me.—Galatians 2:20.

Willard Hall is rapidly becoming the Westminster Abbey of the temperance reform. Another bright and shining name must be engraved upon its panels. Mary A. Woodbridge, so honored and beloved throughout the land, has suddenly been translated from our earthly Temple, where she daily wrought so unselfishly with heart and hand and brain, to the glorious Temple not made with hands. To those of us who assembled in Willard Hall on Monday last to take part in the memorial service to her memory it was hard to believe that she who was with us less than a week ago full of life and work had slipped from us into the unseen, and that that wondrous voice, rich and powerful as the tones of a great sweet organ, should no longer thrill the heart as she raised it in defense of temperance, purity and righteousness. Yet who would not wish to go as she went—from loving labor to loving reward. We are comforted as we hear that voice from heaven saying: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, from henceforth; yea, saith the spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

We like the spirit shown in the following letter from Mrs. Emily T. Stoddard, Fairhaven, Washington: "Within I send you $5, with blessings and prayers for the complete success of the work you are engaged in. Although I can do but little, I feel that it is also my work, having been a member of the W. C. T. U. since the first organization of the order, just after the Crusade." Mrs. D. E. Colwell, Mattewan, N. Y., writes, "After receiving my mite-box I began to get in a hurry for my spoon, and hastened to get the amount I inclose, $4. I am keeping the box to try for another souvenir." Another good white-ribboner, Mrs. M. J. Work, Randolph, Ill., sends $10, and says: "I am glad to send the money. May I claim a souvenir spoon?" Mrs. L. Smith, Mill Creek, Utah, writes: "I have opened my mite-box and found $5. I wish it were five times that amount. I hope the Lord will speedily bless the effort you are making in the grand undertaking. Will you kindly send me the silver souvenir tea-spoon?" Mrs. M. L. Gose, Kingman, Ind., writes: "Inclosed please find $1; it is the associate collection of my little boy, Ernest, and a blind man, J. L. Dicks. He sometimes presented the interest of the Temple, and received some small donation, also of his own earnings has he given a part. We would all be glad were it a larger donation, but in these trying times financially we have done what we could." If that could be said truthfully of all our white-ribboners there would to-day be no debt resting on the Temple. A good brother who signs himself "Yours in His name, Samuel W. Pierson, Holmesburg, Philadelphia, Pa.," says: "In recognition of Miss Frances E. Willard's birthday, also desiring to place one brick in that grand structure, the Temple, I inclose $1; would it were ten, 'but according to what he hath,' etc., must be my rule." What a lift it would be if all our temperance brothers gave "according to what he hath."

The Columbian Publisher could not have proposed at a more propitious time the three articles he offers to give the exclusive sale to our W. C. T. U., provided they secure one hundred orders in any one town. People are on the lookout these hard times for pretty and useful gifts for the coming holidays, provided they are cheap. In this series we have two most delightful, as well as instructive, games for children, and the Ladies' Household Repository will be a most useful and acceptable gift to housekeepers.

The Marissa, Ill., W. C. T. U. sends $25 on their pledge. The W. C. T. U. of Mexia, Texas, also sends $25 on their pledge. Mrs. A. I. Wiley, of the Virginia Call, writes a beautiful letter enclosing $21.50, five of which is to be credited on the Virginia state tablet, and $16.50 on the pledge of the Brambleton, Va., W. C. T. U. She writes: "We are praying that God will open the heart and purse of some of His children to whom He has given an over abundance of this world's goods so that they may give a generous donation to the Temple. Why does not some noble-hearted man or woman give a million at once to this grand cause? I only wish I had it to give, but because I have not the means to give the great amounts I will not withhold the small gifts, for 'the mickle makes the muckles.'" The W. C. T. U. of St. Joseph, Mich., send $18 to apply on their pledge. Miss H. C. Young sends $17 for the W. C. T. U. of Ocean Grove, N. J., on their pledge. She writes: "It would be a great satisfaction to hear that the whole amount needed to pay off the indebtedness on our beautiful Temple had been raised." Miss Minnie Besson, Ramos, La., writes: "Enclosed find $10 for the Temple. I wish we could send ten times that amount, but our union consists of only eight members, but they are all very much interested."

Mrs. Annie M. Dyer sends $10 from the executive committee of the Arizona W. C. T. U. The Newark, Mo., W. C. T. U. sends $5. The W. C. T. U. of Wabasha, Mo., sends $5 on their pledge. The Lakewood Temperance Club, which numbers twelve members, was organized last year by the pupils of the Lakewood school, Colorado. They send $5 for the Temple.

All persons sending $1 to the Temple will receive the beautiful Columbian souvenir. Any individual who sends the contents of a mite-box, amounting to $3.65, by January 1, 1895, will receive a solid silver Temple souvenir tea-spoon. This, however, does not apply to persons filling boxes for unions; they receive the Columbian souvenir. All money orders and checks should be made out in the name of William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, the Temple, Chicago, Ill.

OUR NATIONAL CONVENTION.

Cleveland, O., November 16-21.

BY HANNA A. FOSTER.

Come, O, come, to this convention!
List, ye women! rouse and rally!
Each and all o'er hill and valley
Voice the call, nor fail to mention
Everybody is invited!
Let nor friend nor foe feel slighted,
All will surely be delighted.
Now to prove my best intention,—
Do not miss this grand convention.

Berea, O.

THE DROPPED STITCH.

One small life in God's great plan;
How futile it seems as the ages roll,
Do what it may or strive what it can
To alter the sweep of the infinite whole!
A single stitch in an endless web,
A drop in the ocean's flow and ebb,
But the pattern is rent where the stitch is lost,
Or marred where the tangled threads have crossed,
And each life that fails of the true intent
Mars the perfect plan that the Master meant.

MY CRAFTY NEIGHBOR.

BY ELIZABETH PRESTON ALLAN.

(Concluded.)

I knew Steve was teasing me, but I didn't half like the suggestion; I had grown too fond of my new neighbor to be willing that she should think hardly of me. The dog-cart and I went about with Mrs. Seldon almost every day for weeks and months. I lost interest in my fancy work and the weekly novel from the library often went back to its shelf unread, while I was growing acquainted with the lives and homes of people who had lived only a few streets away all my life. It was not a very happy, comfortable time for me; the people were so discouraging, so deceitful often, so grasping, so ungrateful, and yet so poor and wretched and ignorant and foolish and self-destroying, that I wished over and over again that I had stayed at home, and had never seen them. Mrs. Seldon never once asked me to do anything for them; she seemed to take it as a great favor that I should go about with her, and she asked my advice constantly, in a way that made me feel ashamed of having no opinions, and no right to any, on the subject. But something laid hold of me, if Mrs. Seldon did not. A great, solemn, uncomfortable conviction that I had been up to this time a dastardly shirker in the battle of life, grew up within me, and overshadowed all the pleasant places in which I had been walking. And along with it grew another tormenting conviction, that so far from doing any good to those who needed me, I had been doing harm. I assure you Mrs. Seldon did not once in all those months mention the word "temperance" to me. I would have remembered it if she had, for the word was disagreeable to me, and always stirred a little secret feeling of antagonism. But oh, I saw such blight and blast and ruin and suffering follow drink, everywhere, that I began to look at the wine in my glass and Stephen's with suspicion and aversion. It takes a jar sometimes, doesn't it, to form crystals, even when the conditions are all right? My thoughts and feelings were ready to crystallize into resolutions, I think, and then the jar came.

There is one part of my life that I haven't said anything about, because I rarely speak of it to any one; it lies so deep in my heart that it is hard to tear it up without bringing blood at the roots—or tears—which sometimes means as much. It is my little grave; the grave of our one little child, a beautiful bright angel, whom God took away again, after he had been mine for two years. I can not now look into the face of a little fair-haired, blue-eyed child without a passionate tenderness, because of mine. And in all this work of Mrs. Seldon's among our poorer people, it was the very little ones who seemed to fall to my share, and cling to my skirts, and nestle up against me. There was one dear little thing who drew me, especially; a bright, laughing child with that glint on his curls which stirred my most precious memories, and he was called Johnny, too; little Johnny Carr. One day Mrs. Seldon sent me a hasty message; would I please drop everything and come to her in the cart, her maid said; something was wrong at the Carr's. I was not long in driving up to her door, but Mrs. Seldon had gone, leaving me word to follow. Who has not felt that heaviness of heart which sometimes foreshadows evil? Mine beat painfully as I urged Gipsy down to the factory cottages, but I was not prepared for the sight of my precious Johnny, white and moaning in his mother's lap. He knew me, and held up his arms. Poor darling, he had nothing but pleasant times associated with me; he thought they would come back in my arms.

It was the old story in that poor woman's life; a husband ordinarily kind, getting "roaring drunk," and turning into a wild beast. He had struck her before in these mad fits, but this time he had pushed her down the steep steps, with Johnny in her arms, and the little spine was horribly injured. I felt such a murderous hatred in my heart for that miserable father, that I am afraid I could have killed him with my own hand at that moment. But when some such fierce word escaped me, the woman turned her poor bruised face to me with a reproachful look: "It ain't as bad in Jack, what tries to help it and can't, as 'tis in them what sells it to him for money. They know what it does to him; I've told them agin and agin; I've promised to give 'em twice as much as Jack pays for drinks, ef they'll jes' refuse him. They won't. They aggs him on by settin' it out before him."

A great shudder came over me; I shook so I had to put Johnny back into his mother's arms. I felt as if I had helped to do this awful thing in setting wine on my table day after day. How did I know but that a glass of the beguiling curse drunk at my right hand had proved the spark to inflame some dangerous appetite, to bring some mother and child to misery like this!

Two years have gone by since my red and white dinner party; almost two since my little Johnny was hurt. We hope he is getting well, though the wise city doctor to whom I carried him, could not promise me that he would ever be as strong as other boys. Perhaps you think I never had wine on my table after this; but you forget that it was Stephen's house, and he was master of it. He is very gentle and good to me about it, and though he does not see the matter as I do, he gives up more and more to my piteous suffering at the sight of it. Mrs. Seldon has gone back with her husband to the blessed work of saving other children from such a cruel fate.

"She was undoubtedly a crafty little woman," said Stephen the other evening, looking half ruefully at his glass of cold tea; "I never saw her equal."

"Why, Steve," I said innocently, "Mrs. Seldon did not try to influence me; she never said a word—"

"Oh, you little green pea!" said my husband, good-naturedly; "I don't understand myself what magic she used, but the walls of Jericho did not tumble more effectually to the rams' horns, than your prejudices and customs fell before her guile."

This was the first time it had occurred to me, reader, that my crafty neighbor had set snares for me!—The Interior.

AUNT ROXEY'S OPINION.

"Yes, I've been to the convention, Jerushy, but it seem's if I wasn't feelin' just right. We had a good convention, too, but somethin' seemed different. I might jest as well blurt it right out an' tell you what it was—the white-ribboners is a-gittin' proud in dress, I believe. They be! Why, it was more like a reception than a W. C. T. U. convention. The wimmen, some of 'em, wore three diff'rent gounds a day. An' sech gounds! Laces, ribbons, shiny filagree an' silks a-rattlin' everywhere. We uster go up to convention an' wear one gound the hull time. But now most of our wimmen has a gound fur forenoons, a gound fur afternoons, an' another fur the evenin's. There was Sister Purdy, now. She uster come up to convention in a black gound jist made as plain as plain could be. An' when she spoke one ov her thrillin' speeches nobody thought about her gound nor seen it, nuther. But here she was this time in a black silk covered with lace, an' a-glis'nin' an' a-rattlin' like an Injun princess at a war dance. Then she'd another gound for the forenoons that was purty enough fur a party. I'm afraid sech fine dressin' is a-goin' ter do our W. C. T. U. no good. It's all well 'nough ter hev fine close fur fine occasions, but I don't believe in goin' on dress parades to conventions, Jerushy. Ain't it a-goin' ter keep the rank an' file of our organization away, jist as it keeps some good folks away from church? Why, I felt like I wasn't at home among sech finery, and wanted ter hide myself in some little corner an' not say one word, fur I felt 's if them wimmen was jest a-eyin' my plain close.

"'Oughter be glad our wimmen is gettin' better off'? That ain't what I'm a-talkin' about, Jerushy. Ef anybody kin dress nice why I'm glad on't. But I say, an' I say it sadly, 'cause I know it's so, that whenever our wimmen has ter take a trunk along with 'em to carry their finery to a W. C. T. U. meetin' then they're not likely ter think ov much else 'sides that there trunk an' what's in it. That's a solemn fac', Jerushy.

"'Tiresome ter wear one dress so many days'? Well, hev somethin' plainer to change with. Our preachers go to conference with only one suit of close, an' ain't we allus a-quotin' men's doin's an' a-apen' of 'em when we're gettin' up our organizations? Do let us ape all the sensible things if we ape anything or else don't le's's quote 'em 't all, Jerushy."

[There are two sides to many questions and extremes of both sides, so though, from one standpoint, Aunt Roxey's plea may seem to many like that of an extremist, doubtless she has ground for her utterances. The dress question is a vexed one, and in religious, philanthropic or reform gatherings, plain dress is never out of place. However, a sister whose purse or prejudice forbids the "laces, ribbons, shiny filagree an' silks a-rattlin'" need never feel "like she wasn't at home," because of their presence. "Handsome is that handsome does," says a homely proverb, and while many a gay gown covers the sincerest of hearts and most devoted of spirits, may it not be true that homespun gowns cover bitter pride and rebellious ambitions?—and vice versa. If silk makes my sister to offend, however, would not the wearing of "stuff" at our gatherings be a real sensible proceeding, and let the dear comrade of "one gound" forget her grievance in absorption in the program.—ED.]

THE FEAR OF POVERTY A CRIME BREEDER.

"Bethink yourself, and see whether most of the crimes and vices are not begotten of poverty or the fear of poverty. Burglary, cheating, stealing, swindling, forgery, legacy hunting, arson, child-murder and suicides; are not all these crimes committed out of need or for the sake of pecuniary gain? And is not this eagerness for wealth, where it is not occasioned by actual poverty and want, due to a fear of poverty? Even lawyers' quibblings, the perjuries in the law courts, and certainly simony may be included in the list of sinful acts which spring from this source. Now I put it to you whether there is any necessity for that fear of poverty; whether, if each pair of hands were free to work, each mouth could not get its loaf of bread; whether, if the people were not denied access to bountiful nature, there would be that stern necessity for taking thought for their life, what they shall eat, or wherewithal they shall clothe themselves?"

"Ah, it's perverse human nature!"

"You libel human nature, which is capable of greatness and nobility, were it not stunted by unnatural conditions. Human nature is prompted by the natural instinct of self-preservation. Put no impediment in the way of their existence, and men are kind and noble. Threaten their existence and they become fierce and ferocious. When you are sitting at your sumptuous table, with full knowledge that there will be more than enough to satisfy the appetites of all those present you are kind and attentive to your neighbor. The soup that has been placed before you, you pass courteously to him, because you know you will not lose by your politeness. But fancy yourself on a desolate island in company with several thousand fellow beings, with just a few ship biscuits, barely sufficient for a day's provisions, and with no hope of immediate relief. It is under conditions like these that human nature becomes perverse. There is a general stampede and rush for the means of life—a struggle for existence, in which the bestial instincts gain mastery over the finer qualities of man. And if some of the nobler souls escape becoming murderers of their fellow men for the sake of a morsel, it is only because they have hearts stout enough to take their own lives by preference."

"That is a horrid picture!"

"It is the picture you have beheld all your life, and the loss of which you are now lamenting on moral grounds. I repeat my challenge. Excepting the crimes due to the jealousies of the sexes, or occasioned by mental aberrations, could you name me a single crime that is not traceable, directly or indirectly, to poverty or the fear of poverty? Add to that the thousands of poor wretches who, under the shadow of your own palace and cathedral, walk the streets in shame, forced to it mostly by poverty—or ignorance, the result of poverty—and then tell me where the moral obligation comes in to perpetuate the institution which is the primary cause of all this."—From "The Story of My Dictatorship."

THE greatest men that ever lived are those in whom you cannot separate the mental and the moral lives. . . . If any one calls them intellectual it startles you, but as you think about your wonder, you discover that it does not come from an absence of the intellectual life in those who are thus spoken of, but from the fact that the intellectual part of them is so blended and lost in the symmetrical unity of their life that you have never been led to think of it by itself. All this is very frequently true concerning women, whose unity of life is often more apparent than is that of man.—Phillips Brooks.

LITTLE LIZETTE.

As little Lizette was out walking one day,
Attired with great splendor in festal array,
She met little Gretchen, in sober-hued gown,
With a basket of eggs, trudging off to the town.

"Good morning! Good morning!" cried little Lizette;
"You haven't been over to visit me yet.
Come over and live with me always, pray do;
For I have no sisters. How many have you?"

"Nein," answered wee Gretchen. Lizette cried, "Ah, me!
I have to pretend I have sisters, you see;
But, try as I will, I can't make it seem true.
And I have no brothers. How many have you?"

"Nein," answered wee Gretchen. "Nine!" echoed Lizette.
"Why, you are the luckiest girl I have met!
And have you a baby at home, tell me now?"
"Nein," answered wee Gretchen, and made a droll bow.

Then lingered Lizette by the roadside that day,
To watch the wee maiden go trudging away.
"Nine brothers, nine sisters, nine babies to pet!
Oh, I wish I was Gretchen!" sighed little Lizette.

THE MORTGAGED STEED.

BY G. M. RITCHIE.

There was an old barn standing back from the road. In days gone by it wore a fresh coat of paint, but now its color was in the face of the man who once owned it. In that barn was a steed, in its prime a noble stallion, but who now was old and jaded and lame, with a drunken vagabond for a master. But there was a mutual affection existing between them, and for all the master was a drunkard he loved the noble beast, the friend in his days of prosperity.

It was morning in that old barn, and the sunlight came creeping through the broken walls. The birds were singing without, and their merry songs seemed trying to cheer some hearts that were sad. The master stood beside the steed, and stroked his flowing mane.

"I say, old fellow," said the man whose name was Joe, "they want to take you from me, because, you see, they hold some papers signed by me."

As thus he spoke two men entered the barn.

"You shan't have him," cried the master, "I was drunk when I signed the papers."

"But the courts have decided," said one of the men, "so you must give him up."

"Just look at me, men," said Joe. "I know I am a drunkard, but I am sober now, and I love that noble beast. He is my only friend. Give me time and I will redeem the mortgage."

"Time?" shouted one of the men, "speak no more of that. We have given you time, but you still soak your body in rum. We will wait no longer, so go and drink until you are dead."

With these words they threw the master to one side, unhitched the horse and led him from the barn.

"They have robbed me of my only friend," cried Joe as he staggered to the door to take a last look at his old companion. "But I am to blame." Then he took from his pocket a half pint flask filled with whisky.

"This," he continued, as he held it out at arm's length, "is the only friend that I have left. Friend, did I say, did I say friend? Who calls it a friend, who kisses its fiery lips, who buys it with virtue, with manhood, with love, with honor, with everything that is true and noble? No one but the heartless demon of hell. And I am the purchaser of such a friend, the friend that has robbed me of everything but the vile serpents that play around me today, that are even now eating the fibers of my brain, and burning my soul."

His eyes glared as he spoke, and with a trembling hand he drew the cork from the flask, and was about to partake of the fiery drug when a better nature seemed to seize him, and he repeated what one of the men had said,

"So drink until you are dead."

"Will I obey the command," he murmured; "drink till I am dead? No; I can yet be a man and I will." He brought the words out with an emphasis that told of a tragic nature within. Then suddenly lifting the flask, he dashed it to the floor and broke it into a thousand pieces. "You have been my enemy," he cried, "but you shall not be my master."

From that day on Joe was a new man, a sober man; but he suffered from a severe sickness which well-nigh carried him to his grave. When he had fully recovered he found himself a rich man. He had fallen heir to a large fortune. At once he thought of his old companion, his horse, and started out to find him; but during his sickness the animal had been shipped far away.

"I will find him nevertheless," said Joe, and at once instituted a search, and went wherever he could find a clue. Finally some one told him that the steed had been shipped to a certain large city. Joe acted upon the information, and for days sought but his efforts seemed to be in vain.

One day, however, when he had almost given up hope, he heard the sharp crack of a whip, and on looking around there he saw the old steed hitched to a dump cart loaded with coal. The wheels were stuck in the snow and the driver was cutting and slashing with his whip; but the load was too heavy for the poor beast. Joe was enraged and the hot blood rushed through his veins.

"Stop, you rascal," he cried, running to the rescue of his old friend.

"Who are you?" cried the driver.

"That is my beast," said Joe.

"In smoke," said the driver, again striking a severe blow with his whip.

This was too much for Joe, and he leaped upon the cart and struck the driver a blow that landed him from his seat to the frozen ground. By this time a crowd had gathered, and the driver was about to have his assailant arrested. But Joe understood his business, and pulled out a roll of bills, and told the driver his story and handed him double the amount that he asked for the horse. It was a purchase at once and Joe commanded the driver to unhitch the heavy tugs, then called the horse by name. The beast recognized his master's voice, and a joy seemed to flash in his eyes.

"You are mine again," said Joe, and started to lead away his old companion; but relief had come too late.

"What's this?" he exclaimed. But as he spoke the old beast dropped to the ground, and there in a heap of snow his life went out, and he lay before his master dead.

There were tears in Joe's eyes, but he tried to hide them as men will, and in a voice that choked with sorrow, he said: "There is the end of a noble life but he did not die a slave. I have paid for him and he shall have an honored grave."

HE KNEW.

Our geography boys and girls will appreciate the following story from an exchange:

The teacher in geography was putting the class through a few simple tests.

"On which side of the earth is the North Pole?" she inquired.

"On the north side," came the unanimous answer.

"On which side is the South Pole?"

"On the South side."

"Now, on which side are the most people?"

This was a poser, and nobody answered. Finally a very young scholar held up his hand.

"I know," he said hesitatingly, as if the excess of his knowledge was too much for him.

"Good for you," said the teacher, encouragingly; "tell the class on which side the most people are."

"On the outside," piped the young boy.—Detroit Free Press.

345. 1. THE UNION SIGNAL and World's White Ribbon.

2. Deliver me from mine enemies, O my God; defend me from them that rise up against me.—Psl. 59:1.

Correct answers: Helen Robertson; Jessie Jorris; Abby M. Collester.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—To those of you who have a mother or sister in the W. C. T. U. or Y, the name of Mrs. Mary Woodbridge is a familiar one. Perhaps you may have gone to a church or lecture hall in your home town, and sat among the audience listening earnestly to the alert, deep-voiced, motherly woman who talked so well. How plainly she pointed out the dangers of the drink habit, and fearlessly told the men voters that they were to blame for allowing this great evil to go on unchecked. Perhaps she told some funny story, which set everybody laughing, but only to realize more clearly how much in earnest she was with all her fun. Maybe your mother took you to the platform after the meeting and you had a closer view of the lady's pleasant, good face. Then you noticed her shining gray eyes and the funny twinkle in the corners of her mouth.

Perhaps your mother told you that the lady was an old Crusader, one of the first of the honored band in the old Crusade state. How she has kept on through all the years since then with voice and pen speaking and working that men's eyes might be opened to the evils of the liquor traffic, devoting all her great powers to the service of temperance.

It would seem impossible to you, perhaps, to think of this polished, courteous, cultured lady as once a little girl. But if you had lived near and known her better she herself would have told you of her childhood home in Nantucket, Mass.; of the visit of the great Horace Mann when she was four years old and how, placing his hand upon her brow, after she had recited the multiplication table backward for him, he prophesied that she would be a great woman. And so it proved. What was better still, she was not only great but good as well.

And so we know that when God called her to Him so unexpectedly that she was ready to go. As the best of Books tells us, "To die is gain," for those who are "always abounding in the work of the Lord."

Yours affectionately,

Aunt Jane

NEPHEWS AND NIECES.

I am a little temperance girl eight years old. I have two brothers and five sisters. I love to have mamma read THE UNION SIGNAL to me, and I read a good deal for myself. I found a song about Neal Dow to the tune of "Yankee Doodle," and to-day I found one to the tune of "Little Drops of Water." It is "Little Drops of Whisky." It is pretty, too. BERTHA MEDLOCK.

Minden, La.

I hope you will always be a friend to THE UNION SIGNAL, Bertha, and a believer in what it represents.

As I would like to be one of your nephews I thought I would write a few lines. My mamma takes THE UNION SIGNAL, and my papa is a Prohibitionist. We four boys have signed the red, white and blue cards. We have a baby brother named Willard, and a white kitten named Toots. We all expect to vote with papa when we are old enough. ROBERT FRAZER.

Erlanger, Ky.

That is what I call a manly letter, and I know all the Cozy Cornerers clapped their hands when they read that last sentence.

I enclose the answers to the two Bible questions by "one of Aunt Jane's readers." The oldest record of surveying and map-making is found in Joshua 18:9, and the first woman's rights movement was by the great great great-granddaughters of Joseph found in Joshua 17:4. I don't "guess at it." L. E. WHITNEY.

Union, Broome Co., N. Y.

These answers are right, and the reply to the latter question is also to be found—where?

DEAR COUSIN BESSIE:—I come for admission to Cozy Corner as your correspondent. I am thirteen years old, and live with my grandmamma. She is a member of the W. C. T. U. I am a temperance girl. We haven't an L. T. L. here now, else I would be a member. I am so glad that you are a temperance girl. Grandmamma takes THE UNION SIGNAL, and I enjoy reading the letters from the nieces and nephews. Hoping to see a letter from you soon, RENA MILLER.

Madisonville, Ky.

Now I expect all the Bessie cousins will be claiming this letter for their own. But we all share it, Rena.

This is my first attempt to write to the Cozy Corner. Mamma takes THE UNION SIGNAL and I always read the Cozy Corner. FLORENCE MORGAN.

Next time you'll tell us something more, won't you, Florence?

SELF-DENIAL RICHES.

There is something in self-sacrifice and in self-denial, the simple record of which, without announcement of drum and trumpet, commands at once the reverence of the human heart. It matters not much whether it be St. Paul, who would "eat no meat while the world standeth," so he gave no offence to his brother, or the self-denying mother, who closes her lips before needed food that her children may be fed, the spectacle is akin to sublimity.

The life of the W. C. T. U. has been self-denial. The history of a "dead" union or member is the history of a pampered ego to the ignoring of greater claims. Self-Denial Week, not long passed, was no new effort, for from Convention to Convention might be called Self-Denial Year. This one week was but one of all the others, red-lettered as a blessed memorial of the weeks behind and an inspiration for those to come.

Very precious, indeed, is a certain pile of letters now reposing in the files at Headquarters, that on and before Self-Denial Week came dropping in from north, south, east and west. They possess one characteristic in common—their brevity and reticence touching the "denial," leaving us in no doubt concerning the familiarity of our blessed sisterhood with the command touching "thy left hand." Now and then one modestly gives an outline of the little story of self-refusing, but the tone of recital shows that the details are only narrated "to the praise of grace," as good Methodists are wont to express it.

Sparse as the narratives are the letters are yet rich in suggestiveness and from them not a few valuable thoughts may be gathered. So, begging respectful permission of the writers, whose every word is sacred to us, we would pass on two or three of the lessons that came to us as we reverently handled the carefully kept sheets.

Perhaps the most striking thought of all presented was this,—that He who sacrificed heaven's richest treasure to save the world provides the sacrifice which loving hearts would make. One sister writes, "This beautiful Monday morning the problem has been solved just how the Master will accept the offering." Another, "God has just shown me how I may deny myself." Doubtless many of these faithful ones remembered the old story of Abraham and Isaac, and the ram caught in the thicket. Given willing heart and hands, "God will provide himself a lamb," and though the lamb is not always as it was then, a substitution for what the heart holds dearest, the service of sacrifice is turned into one of praise and blessing. Bread without butter becomes sweeter than honey and the honeycomb and extra hours of labor bring only balm to the wearied body.

Here is a letter that might be written in characters of gold. The sum referred to is small, as the world counts money, but in the heavenly balances its recorded weight would surely closely challenge the widow's mite. "Until yesterday," reads the letter (the last day of Denial Week) "I could see no way possible for any denial which would bring in any money, but as this does represent a keen denial, I hope it will give aid even in a small degree." In a small degree? Ah, it must surely be, that the drink demon—who is the quintessence of all selfishness—saw drawn against him that day a keen and mighty sword that shall smite him woefully. The metal of that coin was tried in a heart-furnace and its ring is true, its power not to be measured by human tests.

"If a loyal heart and deepest interest and sympathy will count for anything, I can give in large measure," writes another. Her reward is written down, "For with the same measure that ye mete withal it shall be measured to you again." There is a great deal of giving in this strange world that it would be hard to find a record of in heaven, since gifts without heart are less than straw and stubble in the flame.

Just two more and we have done—or rather, barely commenced. But the records are better written Elsewhere! The writer this time is one who has reached the "years of the silver crown." "This has been to me," she says, "a veritable week of self-denial. The lengthening years have brought me to the time when many of the consoling and inspiring activities of life must be given up. Only in spirit have I journeyed to meet the associates of twenty years in state convention." So she who is nearing the other side gives largely of this world's coin, enriched by the prayers of one who through long years of praying sees but thinly the intervening veil.

Last, is the self-denial of the children, who, though "least" in the height of little forms and strength of restless little fingers, are great in the sight of the King who forbade them not. An L. T. L. made this particular offering which was raised by "individual efforts." "When they found how well they did by their efforts, it was a denial to some of them to part with it." Bless the open hands of the children! They are learning now to give, to-morrow they shall act in the great temperance arena, and only the future knows what heroes of self-denial shall give life itself to free our country from this second era of slavery.

From Genesis to Revelation, from Bethlehem to Calvary, from youth to old age, the crown is won through the cross, and the blessed country of the New Jerusalem where "there shall be no more curse" is builded upon the foundations of buried selves.

BOYS' AND GIRLS' BRIGADES.

The thoughtful article on militarism which graced our Contributors' page last week formed a part of Mrs. Monroe's annual address before the recent Ohio Woman's Christian Temperance Union convention. That it was received with approval by that state union is proven by the resolutions which were adopted with great enthusiasm by the convention.

These resolutions were offered by Miss Willard, who prefaced her remarks in part as follows:

"Whatever Europe may have to do, America need not encourage this spirit. The army of boys which is now organized in the boys' brigades cannot be viewed except with regret, especially as it has gone so far that just the other day there was the rattling of arms and the brandishing of sabers in the very house of God. Such things are an outrage to the Prince of Peace, whom the Crusaders serve. They look to a soldiership not of the bayonet, but of the ballot. Therefore,

"Resolved, That the W. C. T. U. of Ohio views with profound surprise and anxiety the organization of Boys' and Girls' Brigades, and the brandishing of weapons in the hands of the manhood and womanhood of to-morrow.

"Resolved, That we hereby pledge ourselves to use our utmost influence to arouse public attention to the evils of this system and to contrast with it the gymnastic exercises of the Loyal Temperance Legion with its soldiership of good habits, its prohibition, purity and peace."

We are heartily glad that one state Woman's Christian Temperance Union has spoken with no uncertain sound upon this growing question, and we feel confident that others will not be slow to follow the lead of "the mother of us all," in this as in so many forward movements of the past.

This question of militarism in all its aspects is one of continually growing importance, but no phase of it can be so vital as that which touches the organization of the Christian church. Founded for the express purpose of promulgating the doctrines of the Prince of Peace, its very birth-song having been the angelic chorus of "Peace on earth, good-will to men," it is surely not strange that those who are most eagerly looking forward to the day of this full, triumphant reign should regard with distrust and oppose with vigor the instilling of the military spirit by that very church into the manhood of to-morrow.

On the part of the brigades there is much good to be said: They instill high principles of morality; pledge their members, if we are not mistaken, against profanity as well as against tobacco and alcohol, and strive to keep before their minds the glorious ideal of being soldiers of the cross. But,—and here is the grievous charge,—all this good may be nullified by the adoption of a line of policy and action in direct antagonism to the governing motive and constantly expressed principles of the founder of the Christian church.

What shall be said of the following account taken from the New York Recorder and describing a corps of cadets in a wealthy Fifth avenue church?

After looking about very thoroughly for proper arms for the corps, and listening to the boys' strong objections to "make believe" wooden guns, very suitable weapons were obtained. They are Burnside carbines, bought from the United States Arsenal at Governor's Island, by special permission from the Secretary of War. No small degree of charm for the boys is added by the fact that the very guns they handle were once used in real fighting. They weigh about six pounds and are, therefore, not too heavy for even the smallest soldiers—for the cadets range from four feet two inches in height to five feet seven inches. All of the other boys of the club not enrolled in the corps are drilled without uniforms; so that as soon as a vacancy occurs a well-trained boy can be put in it.

In a masterly article in the August Arena, B. O. Flower, the editor, after quoting the above, and many parallel instances, says:

The position of the church on this question is at once astonishing and incomprehensible, if we admit that the spirit of her Founder still vivifies her being; for even the most superficial thinker knows that the drilling of youth in the manual of arms must necessarily fill the brain with ideals which are the exact antipodes of the teaching of the Prince of Peace.

The religious leaders, who introduced military instruction and drill in the churches and those who later favored it, whatever may have been their motives, committed an error so grave that it even now threatens to turn civilization back towards savagery and destroy the opening blossom of peace through arbitration. I do not wish to impugn the motives of those who advocated the formation of military companies in the churches. I believe that for the most part they only sought a way of drawing the young into the church by means that would naturally be attractive. The error they committed lay in departing from the fundamental teachings of their own accredited Leader, who, in life, spirit and word, emphasized in the most solemn and impressive manner the importance of driving from the brain every dream of war, every ideal that looked toward physical violence, every thought which comprehended the taking of life.

I most profoundly believe that if Jesus came to the republic to-day His first command would be, "Ground arms"; for the present arming and drilling of His professed followers is a flagrant insult to His life and teachings. He was emphatically a man of peace, and even opposed to retaliation. Love was His talisman. He taught that hate and the murderous spirit of war were from the pit. They represented the savagery of the brute. His disciples must be children of peace if they would please the infinite Father whose name was Love and who dwelt in light. "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God!" The sign manual of Divine sonship was peacemaking, exactly as fostering the spirit of slaughter is the unmistakable sign of the atheism of greed, the materialism of animality.

These are strong statements, but are they stronger than the facts of the case demand? Are they stronger than Christ's own words, "Whoso taketh the sword shall perish by the sword." "If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight."

Who does not believe that the fostering of the military spirit and the carrying on of wars in the name of Christ lay at the foundations of the long train of causes which led to the darkness of the Middle Ages? One gifted with logic and prophecy must see that the same results will, to-day, follow the same causes.

THE DISTURBING FACTOR.

To the adherents of King Alcohol, Chicago's temperance day was, as a sign of the times, ominous. Liquor leaders, even more than Prohibitionists, are quick to see and to measure any vantage ground gained by the latter, and Mida's Criterion (a liquor organ from which we often take occasion to quote for the edification of THE UNION SIGNAL readers) notes with evident alarm that the "trend of the speeches at the Auditorium was directed almost solely against the saloon, which it was declared 'must go.'"

To the Criterion it is "a matter of deep regret" that the saloon should be such a disturbing factor in the liquor business. To the manner in which this "institution" is often conducted it attributes the increasing popular hostility toward the traffic as a whole.

Now as upon the retailer depends the prosperity of the trade generally, and therefore of the liquor organs themselves, it seems hardly fair for the Criterion as representing the leaders and the capital in this great "industry" to attempt to make a scapegoat of the saloon-keeper. Why denounce the "lawless" saloon-keeper when the whisky trust and the brewers' combines, and even the great Republican party itself, are all making such desperate efforts to evade the law, or to interpret it according to their own unrighteous inclinations? Is not the entire drink business, from the manufactory down to the lowest dive in the city slums, characterized by an active spirit of lawlessness?

A man who can bring himself to engage in this body and soul-destroying business shows by that very act that he has within him the stuff from which lawbreakers are made. Every man who deals in intoxicating liquor "makes his living" by the misfortunes and miseries of his neighbor, and whether he be in Congress, in the city council, or behind the bar of the dramshop, is not likely to manifest much respect for law, divine or human.

The whisky trust may force Congress to do its bidding in the matter of tax or the bonded period, but it is not so easy for the "disreputable" saloon-keepers of New York or Chicago—while they may have money enough and votes enough to secure "police protection" in their law-breaking operations—to assist so openly and directly in the law-making process. And so, not being able to abolish what the Criterion designates as "those reasonable and just restrictions which the law has thrown around the business," they do what the same authority condemns—"overrides" them.

"The lawless saloon-keeper is the cause, the bitter Prohibitionist the effect," says this astute editor. Not at all. The Prohibitionist (bitter to the liquorite because judged by his own code) is the effect, not of lawlessness but of law. It is not the methods of the traffic he primarily objects to, but it is to the traffic itself—to the law under which it is fostered and protected. We know there are "good temperance people" who aim at nothing more radical than an improved system of "regulation" which shall provide for the elimination of its most dangerous factor, the licensed saloon: but they are not the Prohibitionists. When Prohibitionists declare that "saloons must go," they mean that the entire liquor traffic, root and branch, must be annihilated!

It is said further that the saloon-keeper who sells to minors and drunkards is a far worse enemy of the trade than the Prohibitionist. Now is it to be expected that the retailer will refrain from selling to minors when he knows that it is largely from this class that his customers must be recruited? Is it not to the interest of the trade generally that as much liquor be sold as possible, and is it not consistent that the drink-seller, like every other merchant, should endeavor to create increased demand for his wares? We think the Criterion hardly rings true to the great liquor concerns which support it, and whose views it is supposed to voice when it opposes the training of boys to become profitable patrons, and advocates the moderate use of "nature's bounty" (!) From the standpoint of good business policy it seems inconsistent, to say the least, to declare it would be "one of the first to rejoice" at the advent of "true temperance" (the moderate kind). We should think the moneyed liquor interest would regard such statements as rank heresy!

As to selling to habitual drunkards, what wife of a drunken husband would not infinitely prefer to have the poison sold to him rather than to the son of twenty-one or twenty-two, her only hope and stay? If the law sees fit to restrict the sale at all, let it be not to the confirmed drunkard, who will obtain it under any circumstances, but to the young man not yet a slave to appetite. Let us save the curables.

The Criterion fears that unless everything obnoxious in the retail traffic is eliminated therefrom, the innocent will continue to suffer with the guilty. What is there which the trade generally would consider obnoxious which rendered business brisk all along the line and poured money into its coffers? And where draw the line between innocence and guilt in the liquor business? Are "those who make their places the rendezvous of the vicious and criminal," and whom the Criterion would "repudiate and denounce," more guilty than those who keep "respectable" saloons where the young man receives his first impulse downward, where he gets his first training toward vice and crime? And behind the "respectable" retailer is the purse-proud wholesaler, the wealthy and aristocratic manufacturer. And behind all, behind this guilt, and, alas, part of it, are the American people, or rather would we say, the voter—for we believe that when the voice of the whole people is heard and heeded, this nation will withdraw from its guilty and foolish partnership in the drunkard and criminal-making business.

MISS ANTHONY IN SARATOGA.

Our editor-in-chief was recently a "looker-on in Venice," or, to put it more plainly, a spectator of the white ribbon convention of the state of New York. Beside her sat several remarkable women, among them the leader of our English host and Susan B. Anthony, president of the National Woman's Suffrage Association of the United States, and for well-nigh fifty years leader of the movement for the enfranchisement of woman. In another place we have referred to the heroic effort made by Miss Anthony to secure recognition from the "party of moral ideas" in New York, and its total failure to respond to her plea. We are glad to give the party credit for what it has done elsewhere in favor of woman's ballot, and its record in that respect is improving, while we are sorry to say that the record of the Democratic party is such as to bring it in at the rear of the procession, a place that should not be occupied by the political organization, whose very name professes to represent "the people."

By invitation of the managers of the famous sanitarium of Dr. Strong, where we were all entertained, Miss Anthony spoke in the parlors, and we took notes for the benefit of "all concerned." Miss Anthony, at seventy-five years of age, is a more commanding figure than ever before; tall, erect, perfectly well-poised, with a masterly face and commanding action she enforces every word of her cogent argument by a personality that will long be retained in the memory of the American people, for it has been reproduced on canvas and in marble.

The argument she gave is common property, and we suggest that it ought to be repeated by friends of woman's suffrage the world over, as they have opportunity. These were her points:

In the first place I want women to have all the rights that it is possible to give them, for the sake of men. Every man drops down to the level of the woman at his side; every boy drops down to his mother's level. We want to make women companions of men in the most complete sense of the word.

But I can tell you, women of this enlightened age, that in those days no man wanted to marry a woman who had "views." For any woman to allow it to be known that she cherished "views" was to condemn her to a single estate for the rest of her days; and this I knew, but still I dared the situation and I have taken the consequences.

Another thing that I complained of (and do still) was that men do not hesitate to enter woman's sphere and take to themselves any advantages possible. They feel perfectly free to be cooks, but when they do so must have a big salary, not one dollar a week, but ten. Men took it into their heads that they would make women's dresses. but when they did so it became a great enterprise, and Worth, of Paris, is a millionaire. They do not think that women have any rights they are bound to respect, although we women have had so few occupations that one might think that the "boasted chivalry" of men would have led them to say, "We will not intrude on woman's sphere." But no, that was far from their idea,—they wanted to keep all they had and get what they could, and they have done so. Do not misunderstand me, I am not blaming men. If they had not acted in precisely this way we women should not have come to a place (as we have now) where, instead of seven occupations being open to us, as we had some years ago, there are hardly seven that are not open to us. So man's desire to do well for himself has really led him to do well for us although he did not mean it. Nor do I blame him on the merits of the case; he wanted to succeed and make for himself a wider world. He had a right to do so, but the point I want to make is that we have just as good a right, and intend to exercise it.

Finally, in respect to the temperance question,—you cannot make bricks without straw. Rochester women crusaded in the saloons, but there were several hundred more when they finished than when they began. Prayer is good, but to be sincere, work must go along with prayer. You know what Fred Douglass said; he prayed for many a year that God would set him free, but at last it was revealed to him that he must pray with his feet, and he set out to make tracks by the light of the North star for Canada, and from that day he has been a free man. So, I say to the W. C. T. U., you must pray not only with your hearts and your lips but with your ballots. When you do that, the legalized infamy that curses your homes will be put down, and not before. The rebellion was not conquered until the slaves were released; reconstruction was not effected until the slaves were enfranchised; the republic will not be redeemed until the 'home-guards' are fitted out with the ballot,—that strikes home more swiftly, and with a deadlier aim than any bayonet or bullet.

She said much more, this prophetess of the nineteenth century, but all to the same general purport. Long live Susan B. Anthony!

When the suggestion was made by certain objectors to Chicago's Temperance Day demonstration that instead of the school children the drunkards should parade the streets as an object lesson it occurred to me that the lesson would be still more impressive if after the procession of drunkards, would march the drunkard-makers. First, the liquor-sellers, with appropriate "personal liberty" badges and banners, and perhaps a float bearing specimens of their work from poor-house and penitentiary; second, all citizens, who, by their votes or their influence perpetuate the saloons. Leading this last detachment we would have attachés of the political party which openly and unblushingly caters to the liquor interest—their mottoes, "Long live the dramshop," "Rum is King," etc; after these the supporters of that party whose watchword is "compromise," the party whose fitting cognomen would be the "artful dodger"—in view of its attitude upon the supreme issue of the day. The lesson would have been effective, but for obvious reasons its presentation was impracticable. No man is willing to publicly brand himself as a drunkard, neither does any voter in the liquor parties care to advertise himself—on Temperance Day, at least—as a drunkard-maker.

The massing of millions teaches a powerful temperance lesson. Not one of the self-made millionaires is a drinking man. John D. Rockefeller never permits strong drink to pass his lips. A mere sip of wine for the sake of courtesy is the extent of the indulgence of William Waldorf Astor. Jay Gould tasted wine not over two or three times in his life, and then not because of a desire for it. The Vanderbilts are equally abstemious. C. P. Huntington does not even drink coffee. His strongest beverage, as related, is tea. Russell Sage once in awhile takes a spoonful of Bourbon whisky in a glass of water as a tonic. It is said that not one of the leading millionaires uses tobacco, and not one uses profanity. The American millionaires are a model lot in their personal habits, at least.

Loneliness is of the spirit, not of the surroundings. I have been lonely and not lonely in the same half day and the transition had been made without the shifting of one outward circumstance. "And prisons would palaces prove," sang the old-fashioned saints who were making melody in their hearts because of the presence of One who makes all the difference in the soul between daylight and darkness. One with God is a majority that can dispel every bit of fear, self-pity, discouragement. Indeed, when a lonely soul gets its vision fixed on the things of life which are eternal, it may easily regret the opening of the door which lets in the visitor so yearned for before. "Lo, I am with you always"—then why fret so for human companionships?

An interesting debate has been stirring in the realms of the "woman question," given rise to by the recent dictum of Judge Coffey upon women as clients. He heaped ignominious accusations upon the head of our sex and awoke such a storm of refutal that the matter broadened out until it involved the whole question of woman's sphere and her equality—or the reverse—with man. Among the participants in the debate was Jacob Voorsanger, Rabbi of a leading Hebrew congregation. He makes use of some ancient platitudes, saying that "woman was a noble creature in all vocations, but that as wife and mother she is noblest." Granted. But he shows in all his expressions an unworded fear that if woman goes on "from strength to strength" she is in danger of somewhat marring her qualifications as home-maker and keeper. "We are not," he says, "in so much need of women in the world as of women at home to mold the strength of their children so that their future might be safe." Ah,—there is the rub!—"so that their future might be safe." And that has been the mightiest impulse of all that has pushed woman over the threshold of the home out into the arena with her brother. She has been fleet of foot, keen of eye, steady of hand, clear of brain and pure of heart, and the manliest men are aiding her as she goes—goes for the children's sake, "so that their future might be safe." Discussions of this nature do no harm,—such participants as Rabbi Voorsanger, Robert G. Ingersoll, Judge Coffey, may not be moved one whit but they make what perhaps they would not wish to, a fine advertising medium for this question which women are anxious should be held up in every possible light.

ON DUTY.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD

MASSACHUSETTS.

STATE CONVENTION, FITCHBURG, OCTOBER 16–19.

Fitchburg—where is it? Fifty miles from Boston, on the Fitchburg & Hoosac Tunnel railroad, in the Wachusett mountain region, where the golden autumn shines out with a peculiar beauty from the lovely setting of the hills. Fitchburg is a no-license city of about thirty thousand inhabitants and the atmosphere is cleaner and purer in consequence. The mayor, pastors and many of the people are in sympathy with the temperance work, and although the really active workers may be few, there is a wide sense of coöperation.

"Abounding in hope," was the keynote of the twenty-first annual convention in Massachusetts. The Old Bay state, it seems sometimes, has an unusual number of discouraging things to face, but even advocacy of an evil may make more shining by contrast the white light of truth.

THE TWENTY-FIRST MEETING.

How is it, you ask, that Massachusetts has held her twenty-first annual convention and the National does not attain her majority until next month? It is a case of abnormal development, or rather of unusual precocity—the child was born before its mother! Mrs. Livermore vouched for this, and she was sponsor to this precocious child. The Massachusetts temperance union was born in a Baptist church in Boston a little while before the organization of the National W. C. T. U. at Cleveland, O. After Mrs. Livermore's return from that meeting this union wheeled into line as one of the auxiliaries of the National. One other long time temperance worker who was present at that first meeting in Cleveland, and who will be there this year, is Mrs. Mial Davis, of Fitchburg. She will bring you a genuine Massachusetts breeze. Her husband also "is known in the gates, and he praiseth her." Mrs. Gifford, the first Massachusetts W. C. T. U. president, and of kin to Mrs. Fessenden, was also at the Fitchburg meeting, and I believe at Cleveland. Mrs. Mary A. Livermore to whom the debt of womanhood can never be paid, or even acknowledged, was undoubtedly the most welcome guest at the convention. Massachusetts white-ribboners will never forget the hour of prayer when with a beautiful tenderness and consecration she brought the work and workers to the mind and heart of the King.

PRESENT AND PROPHETIC.

The above are some of the more historic features of the convention. From Monday to the closing hour Friday afternoon the skies were bright, literally and figuratively speaking. Never did an earnest host rally with greater unanimity around a trusted leader. Mrs. Fessenden's ability is well known and appreciated, and all through her hand was upon the meeting and her heart in the Great Abiding. The vice-presidents are goodly New England women, each one of whom is worthy of being "written up," but time and space are wanting. "Their works praise them." The state superintendents are also a company of ardent, aggressive workers—specialists in this and in other fields.

The president's annual address handled the pressing themes of the day from the temperance outlook. This statesmanlike production may not be characterized in the limitations of this report. Turn to the annual minutes of the Massachusetts union for the reading, and find it worth your while.

Massachusetts has had no corresponding secretary during the past year, but as clearly and fully as possible the achievements were gathered up by Mrs. Esther T. Housh, formerly Vermont president, and presented to the convention. The state considers itself fortunate in having secured Mrs. Housh for this long vacant and important post. The membership was held good in spite of the hard year. "Visitations" by county presidents, no-license work, a municipal suffrage campaign, Neal Dow and other public meetings and celebrations and the issue of "the best paper ever published" are among features of last year's work; also the week before the convention that redoubtable of workers, Mrs. Helen G. Rice, organized at a meeting called in Taunton the state Loyal Temperance Legion of Massachusetts.

The Y's had the special pleasure of welcoming at this meeting their National secretary, Mrs. Frances J. Barnes. Her address and the talk of the Somerset Y's college girls from Holyoke, Wellesley, Northfield, and also other faithful workers, revealed a great amount of hopefulness. Seven hundred young women members in South Africa are among the brighter indications of a better day. The girls told of one pastor who said, "The Y's are a perfect nuisance," but no one seemed daunted. "Total abstainers or no husbands," was one of the progressive sentiments advanced. Miss Caroline M. Caswell is the efficient secretary of the Y Branch in Massachusetts.

The teachers of Fitchburg and vicinity gathered en masse Thursday afternoon for instruction from Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, as to methods in teaching scientific temperance. This was one of the rare opportunities so greatly coveted. Members of the school board were also present, and as one of the results the superintendent subscribed for copies of the School Physiology Journal for all of the teachers—Mrs. Hunt's new publication in her department.

The resolutions committee presented the usual platform of principles with special indications of the coming winter's work for suffrage, and against any imported "system" of liquor selling. We have system enough.

SPEAKERS, GUESTS, ETC.

Helen M. Barker and George W. Bain gave evening addresses with the characteristic force and power of these speakers. They are too well known to need our meed of praise. Indeed, the story of a meeting like this is so familiar to the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL that simply to hint the outline is to enable the reader to fill it out with greeting and response, address and music, report and resolve, and the recurring hush and uplift of devotional service.

The address Friday afternoon by Frederik Peterson was a helpful contribution to the conflict before us against the Norwegian system. At the last moment word came from Lady Henry Somerset and Frances E. Willard, the distinguished guests now in our midst, and the following telegram was sent in reply: "In the name of the Lord we bid you welcome." A similar interchange was held with conventions in session at the same time in Oklahoma, Colorado, New Hampshire, Delaware and Rhode Island.

OHIO.

MAJORITY CONVENTION.

The twenty-first annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of the Crusade state opened its session at Cincinnati, in the Central Christian Church, October 10, at 8:30 o'clock a. m., the president, Mrs. Henrietta L. Monroe, of Xenia, in the chair. All the general officers were on the platform, and two hundred and twenty-two voting members, besides a large company of visitors, occupied the pews. The church was tastefully decorated with bunting, flags, banners, plants and cut flowers. The convention opened with an inspiring Bible reading on "The Conditions of Successful Prayer," by Mrs. Marie M. Powell, of Athens.

We were highly honored by the presence on the platform of Lady Henry Somerset, president of the British Women's Temperance Association, on her first visit to Southern Ohio. As the graces of her person, her exquisite manner of expression, charming voice, rare consecration to the Master's service have become so familiar to the white ribbon women of America, we will only say that our convention was thrice happy to have her conduct our birthday thankoffering service, in celebration of our twenty-first birthday. "Blest be the Tie that Binds" introduced the exercise, in the singing of which all joined. Lady Somerset then made a short address telling of the ten happy years of her life that had been spent in the service of Christ, striving to lift up men and women from the curse of strong drink. Envelopes prepared for the occasion were distributed and in them, each one desiring to do so, placed a penny for each year of life that God had so graciously granted unto her. Seventy-six dollars and forty-six cents were thus collected, and Lady Henry Somerset closed the service with prayer.

The junior young women's union of Lockland then sang very impressively "Some Glad Day," after which a Crusade service followed. Mrs. Rev. Wm. I. Fee, one of the forty-three Crusaders of Cincinnati who were arrested and locked up in the station house for praying on the streets of the city, led the hour. "Jesus, Lover of my Soul," the hymn they were singing when arrested, was sung, and Mrs. Ewell, of Walnut Hills, also one of that heroic band, read the 146th, or "Crusade Psalm." Mrs. Dr. Bell, of Ripley, led in prayer. Mrs. Fee then recounted their experiences. Mrs. F. W. Leiter, of Mansfield, the first secretary of the state union, spoke earnestly on, "Has It Paid?" Mrs. Pine, of Washington Court House, gave a sketch of their Crusade history. All hearts deeply regretted the absence of Mrs. Thompson, of Hillsboro, Mother Stewart and Mrs. H. C. McCabe, the first president of the Ohio union, all of whom were detained by sickness, but sent welcome letters.

In the afternoon, Mrs. Hammond, editor of the Ohio Messenger, reported the financial condition of the official organ as surpassing the record of any former year, it having money to pay all of its expenses for the year past, and something more.

Mrs. Southworth, of Cleveland, state superintendent of franchise, spoke of our school suffrage law, and regretted that the refining influence of women at the polls would be lost because of the separate ballot-boxes provided. She kindly gave all present privilege to examine the books, enrolling permanently the names of the friends of equal suffrage in Ohio. In the report of the department of scientific temperance instruction, it was shown that Cincinnati is the worst city and Toledo the best in regard to enforcing this state law. It was urged that county teachers' institutes be induced, if possible, to employ a regular instructor in this line of study. The departments of literature and THE UNION SIGNAL, and unfermented wine were vigorously presented. Five minute speeches by district presidents added variety and spice to the program.

On Wednesday evening the large church was crowded. Because of Miss Willard's illness Lady Henry Somerset had consented to give the address of the evening as a benefit to the Ohio union, and an admission of twenty-five cents was charged at the door. After the organ voluntary and devotional exercises by our National evangelist, Mrs. R. J. Trego, Mayor Caldwell, of Cincinnati, welcomed the convention to the city, and Mrs. D. E. Taylor, of Hartwell, one of the honored veterans of the regiment, gave the welcome for the Hamilton county union. Mrs. Frances W. Leiter, of Mansfield, responded to these addresses. Miss Willard then made one of her inimitable, unreportable, short speeches, her wit provoking much laughter, but her logic impressed a deep lesson in regard to the work of the union, and won all hearts.

Lady Henry Somerset's address followed. In speaking of the temperance situation in England, she said the first difference that impressed her is that the American audiences are largely made up of women, while in England they would be largely composed of men. America is infinitely more favored than England, in that the latter has not a sober womanhood. She urged women to take an interest in politics, and made an eloquent plea for the ballot for women. The press of the city unanimously commended Lady Henry Somerset's address an dexpressed high appreciation of her intelligence, deep thought and earnest conviction.

Thursday morning an interesting report of the Young Woman's Branch was given by Miss Ensign, showing an active membership of one thousand three hundred and one thousand honoraries. Sixteen new Y unions have been organized, a profitable state Y conference has been held and the work advanced.

The president's annual address was one of the ablest ever delivered before the Ohio union and received deserved commendation from Miss Willard. It presented the encouraging features of temperance reform, exhorted to renewed effort along lines needing to be specially pushed. It was unusually strong regarding the department of peace, and set forth clearly and irresistibly the teachings of the Prince of Peace:

Dr. David H. Moore, editor of the Western Christian Advocate, spoke with fervor, advocating military training for the youth of America, as an instrument to bring about disarmament in Europe. Miss Willard followed in behalf of peace and presented a resolution commending the drill of the Loyal Temperance Legion, with its lofty ideas of citizenship, purity, peace and Prohibition. This was the last visit of Miss Willard and Lady Henry Somerset to our convention and each gave us a parting message and the latter led in the noontide prayer.

The afternoon was largely given to reports. After that of the juvenile department, the banner, a reward for the largest increase in membership, was again awarded to the sixth district, though a counter claim upon it was urged by the ladies of Dayton.

The corresponding secretary read her annual report, showing, as it alone does, the character, amount and scope of the work done by the local, county and district unions. Our active membership for the year is 9,678.

The treasurer gave an excellent report, showing that the dues received from local unions were $2,419.64.

The board of trustees, the many departments of our work, the remaining district presidents, the committees on plan of work and resolutions, etc., all reported with interest and profit.

Thursday evening Mrs. Frances W. Leiter, National superintendent of physical education, gave a fine address on "Physical Equipoise."

Friday morning was largely given to the election of officers. No changes were made. President, Mrs. Henrietta L. Monroe; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Antoinette H. Clevenger; recording secretary, Miss Anna M. Pollock; treasurer, Mrs. Estelle J. Purdum. Mrs. R. J. Trego, Mrs. M. G. Townsend and Miss Margaret J. Peebles were elected to the board of trustees. All unfinished business was left in the hands of the executive committee, and the twenty-first annual convention was declared adjourned.

The program for Friday evening was in charge of the Young Woman's Branch. Miss Ensign, state superintendent, presided, and Miss Clara Parrish, of Illinois, gave an excellent address.

NOTES.

Miss Frances E. Willard, of Illinois, Lady Henry Somerset, of England, Miss Clara Parrish, of Illinois, Rev. Henrietta G. Moore, of Ohio, Mrs. Beauchamp, of Kentucky, Miss Mary G. Hay and Miss Margaret Dickson, of Indiana, were made visiting delegates to the convention without power to vote.

Mrs. Beauchamp, of Lexington, Ky., made a fine impression upon her Ohio sisters, as she told us of the zeal and earnest effort for the cause and of the keynote for purity that has been sounded by the women of Kentucky. Her face was aglow, and her speech showed clearly that to the daughters as well as the sons has descended that eloquence for which Kentucky has been so justly celebrated.

Bishop Walden and Dr. Hartzell, of the Freedmen's Bureau, were welcome visitors to our convention. Each expressed a deep interest in our organization.

A Marvellous Showing.

The U. S. Government, through the Agricultural Department, has been investigating the baking powders for the purpose of informing the public which was the purest, most economical and wholesome.

The published report shows the Royal Baking Powder to be a pure, healthful preparation, absolutely free from alum or any adulterant, and that it is greatly stronger in leavening power than any other brand.

Consumers should not let this valuable information, official and unprejudiced, go unheeded.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., 106 WALL ST., NEW-YORK.

Mrs. Mattie McClellan Brown, of Cincinnati, one of the first women who proposed the organization of a National union, was with us on Friday and offered the noontide prayer.

Many pastors from the churches of the city, and from remoter places, came in to greet and wish our convention God-speed.

Cordial greetings were received from the members of the Elizabeth Gamble Deaconess Home.

A department for finding homes for homeless children was created, and Miss Mellie Marks, of Yellow Springs, was made superintendent.

The Bible readings and devotional exercises of our convention were excellent almost beyond those of any former year, and clearly showed that there is in Ohio a noble company of young women rising, ready to lead the church of Christ into the deep truths of His Kingdom, as only those can who sit at His feet to learn of Him.

The beautiful solos sung by Miss Charles, of the Conservatory, and Miss Ziegler, of the College of Music, and others, were among the most attractive features of our meetings. The committee on music had made every effort to have the music of the highest excellence, and their efforts were a success.

Perhaps nothing that occurred at our convention so encouraged our forces for future effort as the resolution passed by the Ohio Liquor Dealers' Association, also in session in the city, that they had no enemy to fear but the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

ILLINOIS.

ANOTHER MAJORITY CONVENTION.

Illinois held its twenty-first annual convention in the First Methodist church in Mt. Vernon, October 10 to 15, 1894. The anxiety about attendance, so far south, was dissipated by the presence of two hundred and thirty-four delegates, besides visitors. Everything possible was done by the W. C. T. U. and Y union to entertain the convention right royally.

Wednesday was devoted to the work of the executive committee, while Miss Anna Downey, superintendent of the evangelistic department, led a gospel service throughout the day. Wednesday evening was Y evening. Miss Mary Mahon, superintendent of young woman's work, presided. Ninety-two members of the Y filed into the church together. Christian Endeavorers and Epworth Leagues were also there in a body. Mrs. McCullock, of Evanston, gave an address entitled, "The Girls of To-day," which was full of interest.

Thursday morning the convention was formally opened by the president, Mrs. L. S. Rounds. The doxology was sung, the Crusade Psalm read, and a morning offering made to the Lord, each district president rising and repeating a verse of Scripture. The roll-call was followed by addresses of welcome, most cordial and hearty in tone, and the responses were bright, cheery and appreciative. The president of the local W. C. T. U. and of the Y union, each voiced the welcome of her union; Rev. Van Cleve, pastor of the First M. E. church, welcomed the convention on behalf of the churches. A Christian mayor, of this city without a licensed dramshop, welcomed the ladies on behalf of the citizens. There was special fitness in this, for much credit is due the local unions for aiding in defeating license in Mt. Vernon last spring. It is a Democratic city, but no-license usually prevails.

Miss Downey used her ten minutes in setting forth methods for evangelistic work, but a peep at her report revealed the following for her department: Church services under auspices of W. C. T. U., 731; special evangelistic services held, 1,052; gospel temperance meetings, 2,970; cottage prayer-meetings, 459; personal visits, 7,194.

Press work very naturally came next, for like the evangelistic department, it can aid every other. There has been advance along this line. There is more temperance reading in papers. More editors are willing to grant space for W. C. T. U. news than there are women who will faithfully supply it, but about 200 superintendents are reported as doing this work. There were seventy-six "W. C. T. U. columns" reported, edited by superintendents, besides the general temperance reading and news printed promiscuously with other matter throughout papers. There are 1,580 newspapers in Illinois, a majority of which have temperance reading of some kind. Great newspaper syndicates are multiplying the glad tidings. No report is attempted of the W. T. P. A.

Mrs. Rankin, of the narcotics department, has "a zeal according to knowledge," and no person will remain uninstructed about narcotic poisons if she can prevent it. By Mrs. Rankin's request the convention voted to petition the incoming state superintendent of public instruction to sanction the forming of Anti-cigarette Leagues in all public schools.

The department of scientific temperance instruction, with Mrs. Mary L. Brumbach, of Odell, superintendent, reports superintendents in every district and 300 throughout the state; 3,500 teachers have been addressed in institutes. The Central Teachers' Association of 810 members, voted unanimously to teach the effects of alcoholic and narcotic poisons as thoroughly as any other study. Mrs. Mary H. Hunt is to speak in Illinois from November 3 to December 13.

Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson was present with a good supply of W. T. P. A. literature, and spoke on "Our tools, and how to use them." She interested all with her bright, cheery manner, and her table of literature was one of the central attractions. Mrs. Rounds, by general consent, gave her the "right of way" among the delegates during the convention, but it is doubtful if she secured many new UNION SIGNAL subscribers, for Illinois W. C. T. U. workers, as a rule, know that our National organ is a necessity for intelligent service, and already have it.

Mrs. A. E. Sanford, editor and publisher of our state paper, spoke of "The Illinois Watch Tower, how to use it and how to abuse it." In her report later it was shown that there was increasing interest in this paper, so necessary for local workers as a channel of communication between them and the state.

Our president's annual address was given Thursday evening to a large and appreciative audience that filled every available corner of space in that beautiful and commodious church. It was a strong paper, with a broad outlook and called forth many outbursts of applause. Two little surprises were perpetrated upon Mrs. Rounds before the address. The Y's presented her a beautiful bouquet of roses tied with white ribbon, Miss Durham, of Normal, voicing the love of the Y. W. C. T. U's. This was followed by the gift of a handsome fan and nice umbrella from the older folks, Mrs. Grout throwing in a cheery little speech.

Each of the district presidents gave a survey of her particular field, but I will not attempt detail, but will let the general department work all along the lines indicate the efficiency of these leaders in securing more thoroughly organized work.

Mrs. J. D. Collins, of Vandalia, never forgets the railroad work, and reported 100,000 pages of literature distributed in Illinois last year among railroad men. The "W. T. P. A. Railroad Bond Card" has been used, and many have taken the pledge; some are wearing the "R. R. T. A." button. About two hundred conversions were reported in connection with W. C. T. U. services among railroad men.

Miss Mary Mahon, of Moline, has cared for the young woman's work the past year. The active membership numbers 1,451, with 355 honoraries. Coöperative work, with other young people's organizations, is being planned. The Vandalia Y won the prize banner.

The L. T. L., with Miss Margaret Wintringer at its head, has been marching on. It has 338 L. T. L's, with a triple pledge membership of 28,000, and an enlisted membership of 40,000. They have raised and expended $2,560; held 8,672 meetings, with an entire attendance of 260,280. During the year Miss Wintringer has traveled over 13,000 miles, and spoken at 220 meetings.

There have been graduates in four districts who have been awarded diplomas for completing the course of L. T. L. study. Saturday evening Mrs. Bradbury, of Wisconsin L. T. T., gave an address. Diplomas were awarded and received by proxies for the graduates, Mrs. Rounds making the presentation. The Oak Park Legion won the beautiful prize flag.

Saturday evening's program closed with a charming reception, given by the Mt. Vernon Y to the Y delegates, and a better looking set of young people are rarely seen than those present on that occasion.

The evening previous, George W. Bain, of Kentucky, gave a lecture entitled, "Drink, the Enemy of Labor and Business," to a large and enthusiastic audience. This netted fifty-nine dollars for the state treasury. At its close, Mrs. Rounds clinched his unanswerable arguments by asking all who believed that the liquor traffic ought to be prohibited by law, and that such a law could be enforced, to rise. It looked as if everybody rose, but it was said that there were a few exceptions.

Mrs. Tyng, of Peoria, has the Sabbath observance department always on her heart. She reported one hundred and thirty-five superintendents and three hundred sermons preached by pastors at the request of the W. C. T. U. upon this subject.

The memorial service, Saturday morning, was very impressive. The little souvenir booklet, prepared by Mrs. Rounds, showed one hundred and ninety eight names of "promoted soldiers" that had gone from the ranks of the Illinois W. C. T. U. the past year.

It was not strange when the time for the election of officers came, that there was great unanimity of sentiment. Mrs. Rounds was elected for the ninth time. Mrs. Carrie L. Grout was chosen vice-president; Miss Maud Rittenhouse, of Cairo, recording secretary; Miss Helen Walker, corresponding secretary, and Mrs. A. E. Sanford, treasurer. Applause greeted these announcements. Miss Walker reviewed the Illinois field as corresponding secretary and gave many hopeful outlooks from the retrospective glance. In her literature report she gave the summary of 3,008,202 pages of literature distributed. She urged even more enthusiastic work in this department.

But space forbids much further reporting. The Illinois columns have been marching with "the swing of victory" in their movements the past year, and are entitled to thirty-four delegates in the National Convention.

Many telegrams and letters of greeting were received, and many were sent to absent co-workers and fraternal associations. Of course, "our chieftain" was not forgotten nor Miss Hood and Mrs. Hibben, so long connected with Illinois W. C. T. U. work. Fraternal visitors were introduced.

The devotional exercises Monday morning took the form of a Mary Allen West birthday memorial service, in which each one who desired to do so should make an offering of as many pennies as her age indicated, or rather a sum equal to that, the amount to be devoted to the scientific temperance department, in which Miss West was so much interested.

The treasurer's report showed the Illinois W. C. T. U. membership to be 15,342, an increase of 642 the past year, and more than $600 in the treasury—a larger sum than at the close of any previous year. The fourteenth district leads in membership with 1,465; the fifth is second, with 1,255 members. The sixteenth has the largest per cent increase in members and the largest number of new organizations. The fifteenth district has the greatest number of unions—sixty-nine. The fourteenth follows with forty-eight unions. There are four districts with more than 1,000 members each. There are 1,210 honorary members. Sixty-nine unions have headquarters.

The endowment fund for the National Hospital and Sanitarium reached $354.53, besides the endowment of a bed by Mrs. J. B. Hobbs—$350. The Illinois room furnishing fund was $76. Lake and Grand Crossing unions paid $60 each for furnishing rooms. The L. T. L's gave $18.22 toward endowing a child's bed.

Much business was dispatched in the closing day of the convention. The resolution committee's report included a declaration of radical W. C. T. U. principles, among them total abstinence for the individual, prohibition for the state, equal suffrage for men and women and morality in government. It commended the Christian Endeavor "good citizenship" movement, the Civic Federation, the Anti-cigarette Leagues and all wise efforts for the uplifting of humanity. It was enthusiastically resolved, "That we heartily indorse that political party which best represents our principles."

As a whole, this was conceded to be one of the best Illinois W. C. T. U. conventions ever held. Many thanks were given to the Mt. Vernon Y's and W's, pastors and people, who spared no pains in their generous arrangements for the comfort and happiness of the delegates. Nothing was left undone.

STATE CONVENTION NOTES.

The thirteenth annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of Tennessee met at McKenzie, Tuesday, October 16. The attendance of delegates was good, notwithstanding the convention met in the western part of our state where there are few unions. The usual committees were appointed, and the convention was soon busily engaged in the regular order of business. Department reports throughout the convention showed much active work done all along the line the past year.

Tuesday afternoon memorial services were held in memory of two of our promoted workers, Mrs. McKinney, of Harriman, and Mrs. Jane Clark, of Robbins.

Tuesday evening hearty addresses of welcome were given by Mrs. Bessie McClanahan and Rev. T. H. Cannon, pastor of the church where the convention was held. Mrs. Allen responded in good style. This was followed by a splendid address by Mrs. M. J. Gardner, subject, "A Wheel Within a Wheel," a plea for district organization.

Wednesday morning the reports from state superintendents were continued, and two excellent papers, one by Dr. Drouillard, of Memphis, on heredity, and one by Mrs. Clopton, of Milan, entitled, "A Mother's Privilege," were read. A rising vote of thanks and the Chautauqua salute were tendered the two ladies for their excellent papers.

After the reading of the report on press work arose the discussion of the most important measure before the convention, concerning the advisability of a state organ. After considerable discussion as to ways and means, and the appointment of a committee to consider the matter carefully, it was finally decided that we issue our paper monthly for the present, and that it be about the size of the Woman's Column.

Wednesday evening Mrs. Settle read an interesting paper on scientific temperance instruction, and afterward circulated petitions through the audience for the passage of the bill by the coming legislature.

She was followed by Mrs. Meriwether in her annual address, subject, "Ten Years," in which she reviewed, in a masterly way, the ten years' work of the Tennessee W. C. T. U., since she had been its leader. At its close she received the Chautauqua salute from the highly pleased audience. Thursday morning, after the reading of the report of state treasurer, and some miscellaneous business, the convention proceeded to the election of officers. Mrs. East, our corresponding secretary, much to the regret of her many friends, declined, on the plea of ill health, to serve us longer, and Mrs. Settle, an earnest, faithful worker, was elected in her place. With that exception the old officers who have served us so long and so faithfully were reëlected. The superintendents of departments, with few exceptions, were retained without change. One or two of the departments were dropped out, and the department of evangelistic work with Mrs. Ada Elliott Lee, of Friendsville, as superintendent, taken up.

Thursday evening was devoted in part to reports of district presidents, something new, but long needed in our state work.

A touching incident occurred when Mrs. East handed twenty-five cents to the convention, the legacy of a little boy who, on dying, had left that sum to the temperance work.

Invitations were extended to hold convention next year at Harriman, Jackson, Winchester, Knoxville and Chattanooga. Decision as to place was left to the executive committee.

Thursday night an address was given by Mrs. Weeless, of Nashville, concerning the maintenance of a home for ex-convicts, and other homeless men. This was followed by an address by Mrs. Meriwether in her usual inimitable style on "Personal Liberty." A request that every man who would vote for Prohibition to stand on his feet, was followed by the rising of almost every man in the house, while the women clapped their hands and waved their handkerchiefs.

Then a circle was formed, the union sang, "God Be With You Till We Meet Again," the convention adjourned, and all went home with hearts uplifted.

UTAH.

UNIONS IN ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The fourth annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of this territory was held in Salt Lake City, October 11 and 12. There were sixteen delegates present, representing unions at Salt Lake, Ogden, Manti and Nephi. Provo and Mt. Pleasant reported by letter. Mrs. G. W. Martin, of Manti, second vice-president, presided.

The convention was called to order at ten o'clock in the morning, and after devotional exercises and appointment of committees a report of the year's work at Ogden was given by their president, Mrs. A. M. Crocker. Active work has been carried on in several departments, especially rescue and jail work, and the union of that city has now opened a home for women, with five inmates. Mrs. Hunter added a few words in regard to this rescue home, and told in a most pathetic manner of the conversion there of a young girl only fourteen years old. The morning session closed with an interesting Bible reading by Mrs. McNeice, and earnest prayers by many present.

One of the pleasant features of the convention was the lunch, which was served each day in the church.

During the afternoon session an address of welcome, full of hearty, cheering words, was given, and was responded to by our acting president. Reports were heard from the territorial officers, and these were mostly encouraging. Mrs. Day, superintendent of prison work, gave a complete and interesting account of work done along this line. One of the features of the afternoon session was a lengthy letter from our absent president, Mrs. Hester Griffith. It was a greeting with all the bright, cheerful encouragement of our dear sister.

An address on "Save the Boy," by Mrs. Helen Tibbals, was most inspiring, and she proved by her argument that our boys can be raised for the Master's work in Utah as well as anywhere. The report of the Salt Lake union was encouraging. Evangelistic work has been faithfully carried on at Ft. Douglas, the city and county jail, and during the summer gospel temperance meetings have been held in thirteen churches by the W. C. T. U. Parlor, kindergarten and mothers' meetings have been held once a month. A splendid recitation on "Restricting Evils," was given by Miss Mary Tibbals.

Nephi gave a report of the year's work and spoke especially of the work of our territorial evangelist, Mrs. Sarah Reed, who spent six weeks there during the past winter, holding gospel temperance meetings in the Mormon Tabernacle, the churches, the schools and in the homes. Successful mothers' meetings have been held regularly, also L. T. L. meetings.

The most encouraging report of all unions was that of Manti, though the work there seems to be most difficult. Three successful Demorest medal contests have been held. A reading room has been started by the union, but during the summer months has been closed. It was reopened last Monday evening. Successful mothers' meetings have been held regularly.

Most helpful reports came from all the unions in regard to social purity, and Mrs. Rathbone's report of her work during the year along this line showed the need of more literature and the circulating more thoroughly the white cross pledge. Miss Burton, a deaconess, gave an address on social purity, which opened our eyes to the great necessity of more active work, especially in Salt Lake. Her visits to dens of infamy were most graphically portrayed.

During the afternoon session reports were heard from the following departments: evangelistic, kindergarten, mothers' meetings, fairs, soldiers and L. T. L. These were all entertaining, and we are sure that more energetic work will be done this year than ever before. Mrs. Hunter, delegate-at-large to the National and World's W. C. T. U., reported those two great conventions in her Samantha Allen style, which was much enjoyed by all. Mrs. Day, of Ogden, made a plea for the Christian Home at Council Bluffs, and as Utah has sent several children to this home, the convention voted $10 toward its support.

A resolution was adopted earnestly requesting the constitutional convention to insert in the constitution a clause to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage. The convention took no action in regard to woman's suffrage, as the question is yet unsettled whether it is the best thing to do just now. The Republican, Democratic and Populist party have all adopted a woman's suffrage clause, so in all probability when Utah is admitted as a state suffrage will come with it. We wish we were as sure about Prohibition.

The place of meeting next fall was left in the hands of the executive committee.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Mrs. G. W. Martin, Manti; vice-president, Mrs. R. G. McNeice, Salt Lake City; corresponding secretary, Mrs. H. W. Brown, Salt Lake City; recording secretary, Mrs. E. E. Shepard, Salt Lake City; treasurer, Mrs. M. Dunshee, Salt Lake City; state reporter, Mrs. E. E. Shepard, Salt Lake City.

The convention has been a most successful and profitable meeting in the interest of temperance. It has strengthened the weak, and added zeal to the zealous. All go to their homes with renewed interest in their fight against intemperance.

RAILROAD RATES.

Please read the following carefully, for I hope this information is complete.

The Central Traffic Association has granted a one fare for round trip to Cleveland. This means all territory east of and including Illinois, also St. Louis, on the following conditions:

Tickets may be sold November 14 and 15, good going only on date of sale as stamped on back by selling agent, and good returning to initial point of ticket not later than November 17, 1894, except the return limits of tickets deposited with the local agent of the line over which the return portion leads may be extended for return passage to initial point up to and including November 23, 1894. Tickets so deposited shall remain in the custody of the agent until the day on which they are desired for the return journey, and then made available for continuous passage only by train designated by the agent and leaving Cleveland on the day on which the ticket is reclaimed from the repository.

The Western Passenger Association, (which includes all territory west of Chicago, St. Louis and the state of Illinois) has granted one and one-third fare up to eastern gateways. Buy your ticket to St. Louis, Peoria, Bloomington or Chicago, and take a certificate to entitle you to a one-third fare returning from that point, then from there by round trip ticket to Cleveland at one fare. All eastern lines sell on a one and a third fare with certificates, buying your ticket through to Cleveland at full fare and getting one-third fare returning. Read following instructions:

1. The reduction is to persons going to the meeting from Trunk Line territory, i. e., from Niagara Falls, Buffalo and Salamanca, N. Y., Pittsburg, Pa., Bellair, O., Wheeling, Parkersburg and Charleston, W. Va., and points east thereof except in New England.

2. The reduction applies to persons starting from Trunk Line territory who have paid seventy-five cents or upwards for their going journey. Each person availing of it will pay full first-class fare going to the meeting and get a certificate filled in on one side by the agent of whom the ticket is purchased. Agents at all important stations and coupon ticket offices are supplied with certificates.

3. Certificates are not kept at all stations. If, however, the ticket agent at a local station is not supplied with certificates and through tickets to place of meeting, he can inform the delegate of the nearest important station where they can be obtained. In such a case the delegate should purchase a local ticket to such station and there take up his certificate and through ticket to place of meeting.

4. Going tickets, in connection with which certificates are issued for return, may be sold only within three days (Sunday excepted) prior to, and during the continuance of the meeting; except that, when meetings are held at distant points to which the authorized limit is greater than three days, tickets may be sold before the meeting in accordance with the limits shown in regular tariffs.

5. Deposit the certificate with the secretary or other proper officer of the organization at the meeting, for necessary endorsement and vise of special agent.

6. Certificates are not transferable, and return tickets secured upon certificates are not transferable.

7. On presentation of the certificate, duly filled in on both sides, within three days (Sunday excepted) after the adjournment of the meeting, the ticket agent at the place of meeting will return the holder to starting point, by the route over which the going journey was made, at one-third the highest limited fare by such route. The return tickets will in all cases be closely limited to continuous passage to destination.

8. No refund of fare will be made on account of any person failing to obtain certificate.

The same arrangements apply to the Southern Passenger Association. Buy tickets at one and a third fare through to Cleveland, taking certificates and get one-third fare returning.

Remember, those outside of Central Traffic Association, take a certificate when they buy their ticket. These certificates will be signed by me at the Convention. Take this with you when you buy your ticket and permit railway ticket agent to look it over, if he is not familiar with instructions.

Yours for a large convention,

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Philip Gilbert Hamerton, the well-known author, poet and artist, died at Paris last week.

Attorney-General Olney has decided that railway employés have a legal right to belong to brotherhoods.

The National Waif Saving Association met at Pittsburg, Pa., November 8, and elected ex-Gov. Russell Alger, of Michigan, its president.

There is danger of war between France and Madagascar, the government of the latter having refused to grant the demands of the former.

Equal suffrage has received a temporary setback in New Jersey by the adverse decision of the supreme court against woman's vote at school elections in the state.

Returns from the elections show large Republican majorities in many states hitherto Democratic. In Illinois twenty-four thousand women cast ballots for trustees of the state university. Mrs. J. M. Flower, of Chicago, was elected.

The General Missionary Committee, consisting of Bishops of the M. E. Church, met at Brooklyn in seventy-fifth annual conference, during the week. One million two hundred thousand dollars were apportioned for missionary work in various sections of the globe.

The eminent divine, Rev. T. Dewitt Talmage, has resigned his pastorate of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, assigning as a reason that he does not want the members to assume for the fourth time the arduous task of building a new church, and announcing his intention to devote himself to evangelistic work.

The amendments proposed by the New York Constitutional Convention have all been adopted by the people's vote, including the one which extended the prohibition against lotteries to embrace all pool-selling, book-making and other forms of gambling and a law forbidding the use of public money for sectarian schools.

Chicago's Civic Federation has resumed its prosecution of the anti-gambling crusade; a sub-committee on obscene literature has been appointed and the committee on morals has decided to press the strict observance of the Sunday law closing saloons and will wage a warfare against massage parlors and other places of immorality.

THE National treasurer's books just closing reveal a very satisfactory showing. Despite the general depressed financial condition of the year just passed, the receipts of the National W. C. T. U. are larger than for several years. While this is caused chiefly by the special ten cent fund last November and the Self-Denial week in September, there is also an in rease of dues, thus forcibly demonstrating that our membership has increased instead of diminished. A year ago this bright result would have been prophesied by no one. At that time the National had a debt of two thousand dollars, and the prospect of losing many members who could not afford to pay their dues. But our worst fears, in this as in most cases, have not been realized, and we close this unprecedentedly hard year with a larger membership, a fuller treasury and braver spirits than we have known in many a year. The twenty-seven states that have increased in membership are: Arkansas, Arizona, North Dakota, South Dakota, Delaware, Idaho, Illinois, Indian Territory, Iowa, Maine, Maryland, Missouri, Mississippi, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, West Washington, Wisconsin, Wyoming. Four states, Colorado, Connecticut, Louisiana and Rhode Island, send just the same amount of dues that they did last year. Five states, Michigan, Nebraska, Virginia, Minnesota and Pennsylvania, have almost equalled their dues of last year, and as money is coming to the treasurer, Mrs. Barker, almost every day, it is possible that these and other states may show an increase before the Convention.

SEVEN years ago General William Booth visited Chicago, and the city is again preparing to do him honor. On the 22d of this month in the great Auditorium will gather the Salvationists and their friends, to greet and hear this man, who has organized a movement through the agency of which thousands of sin and poverty stricken ones have found "the way out." The General's theme on the 22d will be "In Darkest England and the Way Out," and Chicagoans will hear valuable suggestions, for the great young city has many dark corners.

IN response to its recent request for a plebiscite from leading temperance people as to what they considered the best and most practical way to deal with the drink traffic, the Christian Commonwealth of London has received two hundred and forty replies. One hundred and twenty-six voted for National Prohibition; one hundred for the Direct Veto (local option); eight were for moral suasion, and six for the Gothenburg system. Most of the one hundred who preferred local option declared themselves to be in favor of prohibition, but voted for the former in the belief that it was a more practicable means to be used as a beginning. We are glad to note the direction of public sentiment among English temperance leaders as indicated by this vote.

REPUBLICAN Kansas, from whom so much was expected, has failed to keep up with her western sisters in the procession. She has defeated the equal suffrage amendment and can no longer be considered par excellence the "woman's state." Miss Elizabeth U. Yates, who has been at the helm in this contest, reports that the defeat is due to three B's, brewers, bishops and bums! A prominent brewer's agent is authority for the statement that Dr. Buckley's arguments in the Christian Advocate were widely circulated by the liquorites as a campaign document and did good service in creating antagonism to a measure which tends to the overthrow of rum rule and bum bossism. We hope the good but misguided Doctor will hasten to discard his unfortunate company, for we believe he will yet see where it all tends.

A MAINE Prohibitionist objects to our statement in the editorial on Mr. Woolley's address that we believe every Prohibitionist should have cast his vote with the Republican party in the recent state election in Maine. Our reason is not far to seek. It is simply that what we want to secure is the prohibition of the liquor traffic and to vote the Republican ticket in the election referred to, seemed the sure way of defending the Maine prohibitory law against the assaults of its enemies. In that election the chances of success lay almost certainly between two parties. If, as is usually the case elsewhere, both of those parties had stood with the whisky power, we should have voted, had we been voters, with neither of them, but this was not the case. The Democratic party of that state was, as always, the open, avowed foe of the prohibitory law; the Republican party has steadfastly stood by the Maine law, which it originated, putting prohibition in its platform year after year and, in this particular instance, it had fought its campaign upon this issue as truly as upon the tariff. The course of the Prohibitionist, therefore, seems to us very clear. We do not deny that in several towns in the Pine Tree state, Republican officials wink at the liquor traffic, but so long as the state Republican party indorses prohibition in its platform, we cannot decry it. As women who have set before ourselves the one object, the annihilation of the liquor traffic, we will oppose no party which stands squarely for prohibition, and if in any election two or more parties stand thus for prohibition, not equivocally, not on any such slim promise as "sympathy with wise and legitimate efforts" to prevent intemperance, but a straight declaration for prohibition, we shall throw our influence and would give our vote if we had it, with the one of the two or more prohibition parties which was most likely to win in the contest.

AN election will be held during the month of November in every Methodist Episcopal church in this country to express the sentiments of all members of said church, men and women over twenty-one years of age, on what is known as the Hamilton Amendment. This amendment is so constructed that to vote for it is to restrict the delegates to the general conference to men. To vote against it means that women should be delegates. The question to be decided is in reality this: Shall any lay electoral conference for any reason best known to itself elect a woman as its delegate, and shall the general conference admit said representative to a seat in that body? This vote is not final, but is for the purpose of securing an opinion from the membership at large. Let no one be deceived by the construction of the amendment. If for men only as delegates, vote FOR, but if you think women should have the liberty of being chosen by any lay electoral conference, vote AGAINST the amendment. We trust the negative vote will prevail in this great progressive church.

ONCE more history records a Republican victory for this country. In these stirring times nothing less than a "landslide" will satisfy the American voters' insane desire for "change." Of course the defeat of the Democratic party is attributed by its opponents to its free-trade policy. The voter, and especially the wage-earner, honestly believes that the industrial depression of the past two years is due mainly to Democratic tariff tinkering. Be that as it may, it is certain that the "hard times" have furnished the Republicans with an issue. Upon what basis they would have run the recent campaign without the hard times it is difficult to conjecture. Democrats on the other hand attribute the situation not to Democratic principles but to the failure of party leaders to live up to those principles—in short, to the lack of harmony between the legislative and executive branches of our national government, which has been such a marked feature of the present administration. The party being a house divided against itself was doomed to fall. But jubilant as Republicans have reason to be, to the far-seeing among them the political outlook reveals anything but paths of pleasantness and peace. The people of this country are in no mood for patience with parties, and woe be to the "grand old party" if it should again be weighed in the balance and found wanting. A most hopeful feature of the election was the deathblow to Tammany. It is a significant victory for good citizenship as against partisanship, and will doubtless be prolific of wholesome results throughout the entire country. The active part taken by women also augurs well for the future. Illinois women very generally made the most of their tiny bit of suffrage, and liked it so well that they are going to ask the legislature, Oliver Twist-like, for "more." The cities made a better record than the country, and this seems to be the common experience wherever women vote. In Denver, Col., half the votes polled were by women, and in Chicago twenty-four thousand cast a ballot for university trustees. Indeed, this election successfully refutes the oft-repeated assertion that women do not want the ballot and would not use it if they had it. An Associated Press report from Colorado says that "nothing since the adoption of the Australian ballot system has contributed more to quietness than the presence of women at the polls," and "their presence lent an air of refinement as novel as it was desirable." As far as heard from it appears that the strength of the women's vote was given to the Republican and Prohibition parties rather than to the Democratic and Populist. It may be said in summing up that the elections of '94 show that the masses, men and women, are in these days of adversity "considering," and there is hope that this growing thoughtfulness may be productive in the near future of a wiser and more righteous government and a purer and more faithful citizenship.

CONTRIBUTED

A NEW MADONNA.

BY KATHARINE LENTE STEVENSON.

It was just at a county convention,
And she stood with her face like a prayer,
By the side of the flower-decked pulpit,
To report her department there.

She was pleading for those who are Christless,
For those who are sinsick and lone,
That the followers of Jesus should seek them,
And bring back in love all Christ's own.

We felt the glad thrill of her message:
Our hearts gave swift, joyous assent,
When, out from the midst of her hearers,
With slow step, her little girl went;

A wee slip of a four-year-old maiden,
With eyes which had caught heav'n's own blue,
And hair like the sheen of the morning
When sunbeams are flickering through.

As they stood there,—the mother and daughter,—
In the grace of a love undefiled,
'Twas as if a new spirit-touched Raphael
Had limned a Madonna and child.

The same innocent look of child-wonder,
The same clinging touch of the hand
Which, forever, must open like magic,
The gates of the heart's glory-land.

The same sweep of a brow, consecrated
To highest and holiest good;
The same charm of a life which had tasted
The bliss of a glad motherhood.

The same glow of a holy devotion
Which spares not its best,—its most dear;
The same word of a quickened obedience:
"Behold, Lord, thy handmaid is here."

'Twas a scene which must glow on the canvas
Of memory all through the years;
'Twas a glimpse of life's deep inner meaning
Which we read through glad answering tears.

For it told us that each artist-master
Who had painted the group undefiled,
Must have caught his first blest inspiration
From some human mother and child.

So we learned once again the great lesson
Which the Father-heart taught through the Son,
That our each life is "also His offspring";
That heaven-love and earth-love are one.

THE GEM OF MONOOSNOCK.

A Massachusetts Legend.

BY S. D. N.

(Concluded.)

Granny Hayes was bending over her fire one morning some weeks later when her door opened and Deacon Strong was about to enter. The woman turned and fiercely faced the intruder with her stick hot from the porridge raised with an air of determination which gave force to her wrathful words of greeting. The deacon was a brave man, but he felt like a helpless culprit as he stood before this half wild being whom he had injured. Some instinctive power perhaps helped her to learn his errand before he stated it. Afterward she betrayed no sympathy although her anger seemed to pass away, as she listened, and then beckoned him to follow her to the place of his recent labors in the quarry. As he neared the spot his hopes grew strong again, and when the woman paused and bade him look in a certain direction, he gazed eagerly upward, and saw, not a gleaming jewel, but a feathered arrow with its head imbedded in the bark of a tree.

Instantly the deacon remembered its sound as it cut the air just over his head that eventful Saturday afternoon, and now for the first time he realized its purpose. He started as if it were aimed at him again. His companion's words did not reassure him, as pointing to the arrow she said sternly, "See, man, the thing that missed yer, an' giv yer a chance ter be a better man, an' ter make yer ter 'member ter treat poor creeters like me as if they's wuth somthin' ter somebody. Don't yer spend no more time sarchin' in these mountains. Arrers don't alluz miss their mark. Yer'll never find no jewels here, but yer gran'son will, an' more too, when yer a-done troublin'."

The woman's spiteful utterance checked the deacon's desire to question her, and he mutely listened and then watched her stride away. Once more he gazed on the cleft rock but only a pale, cold sunlight was spread evenly over it. He glanced up at the arrow. A bird serenely perched on its shaft swayed back and forth unconscious that it was bending to its own joy an instrument of human hate.

In succeeding years of peaceful industry Deacon Strong's frame house became one of many, and when he entered the soul's larger mansion his grandson's fearless courage and ready action directed or controlled the interests of the settlers as the need was.

Into their midst there came, however, one day news of a fresh outburst of Indian hostilities upon the northern border, and then came to Stephen Strong the longed for opportunity of avenging his parents' death. His grandmother bravely bore his departure, although it revived the agony of a past sorrow.

Granny Hayes came down from the mountain to see him march away with his comrades, and from that day forsook her hut for an untenanted cabin on the outskirts of the settlement. Rarely a morning or evening came that she did not bring to Mrs. Strong's kitchen a supply of wood and water for the day and night. Baskets of berries, dried herbs and strings of fish were silently set at her door while the giver passed quickly on.

It was early spring when the little band of heroes set off on their long march. A hot summer followed, parching the broken soil in the fields, scorching the young grain and withering the gardens with its blasting heat. The clearings grew brown, and the crisp grass crackled under the feet that trod it. Day after day was wafted in with a breath of flame that seemed to feed on every object it touched, and night brought no cooling dews.

Little children forgot their play, mothers fainted at their work, and men were stricken with fever. The clouds held back their rain, while wells became dry and springs ceased to flow. Anxiously the settlers watched the little stream in Mrs. Strong's wood-lot which afforded a common, but limited supply of water. Its source was said to be in the mountain but no one had ever traced it there, unless it was Granny Hayes or the scout.

One morning in this suffering time it was rumored that the latter had been seen with his sister, and later in the day the old woman brought the glad news to Mrs. Strong that Stephen and his comrades were on their way home.

That night Granny Hayes brought an extra supply of water to Mrs. Strong, and heaped her pile of fire wood higher. Her absence in the next day or two was unnoticed by those who anxiously waited, listening for the least sound which should indicate the approach of that little company so dear to them all. On the third day, into the stillness of its hot afternoon came a sound that at first sent a thrill of joy to the waiting ones, but when the earth trembled beneath them they questioned and feared.

Toward nightfall, however, the sharp report of musketry coming nearer and nearer announced the return of the soldiers. Much thankfulness was shown in their home coming, yet it could not be made a joyful time, for they came in weariness to minister to suffering. The buckets which Granny Hayes had filled stood empty on Mrs. Strong's table when bed-time came. Stephen took them, and went to the brook, softly whistling along the dark way, till he suddenly stopped, surprised to hear the water rippling so swiftly when he had heard such stories of the great drouth. He strode quickly to the edge of the brook and peered down through the darkness, wondering if his ears deceived him. Unable to solve the mystery, he left it for daylight to reveal, happy in easily filling his buckets to the brim.

The settlers were stirring early the next morning, but breakfasts were late, and the sick patiently waited, while neighbor met neighbor, and paused to wonder, or to claim as a miracle the remarkable change in the overflowing brook. A curious thought entered Stephen's mind in regard to it, when some one mentioned the strange sound and earth-trembling of the previous day. Learning from his mother that Granny Hayes had not been seen for several days, he proposed taking a basket of provisions and leaving it at her hut, as he, with Ezra Beaman and Jonas Colburn, traced the brook to its new supply.

They started soon after mid-day, ascending the stream that danced joyously by them on its life-saving mission. The heat was still intense, and when they reached Granny Hayes' abode they were glad to rest under a tree, expecting every moment the old woman would appear. No response, however, came to their voices, or to Stephen's knock upon her door. Entering, he found traces of her late presence, which confirmed his secret suspicions. Leaving the basket of food, he joined his companions, and in a few minutes they reached the spot where his grandfather's treasure had been discovered and so strangely lost.

They looked up at the ledge, but its old familiar face was changed by a gaping fissure, from which leaped and sparkled a stream of water. The same agency that had rent the rock had prostrated a tree at its foot, from whose branches extended a woman's crushed and broken arm its hand caressingly touched by the sparkling liquid jewels it had set free and sent on their way to swell the mountain brook.

Some empty powder horns which were found among the rocks helped the tale as it was afterward told. But when Granny Hayes was released from the imprisoning branches with her left arm a useless, shapeless thing she would answer no questions, though she humbly accepted for the rest of her life the bounty which the settlers freely gave.

In time it became known that Deacon Strong's treasure was maliciously secured by the scout in the early morning after its discovery, but it at once slipped from his fingers into a rocky crevice. Searching vainly for it with his sister they found the rockbound spring which she in time of need sent on its ministering way.

Still Monoosnock Brook flashes along in its liquid beauty, rippling under forest trees, sweeping in graceful curves through sunny meadows, leaping over many a dam and glittering over the mill wheels which stir the life in the heart of a fair village. Every autumn the trees glow again on the mountain side, and occasionally a beryl of fine quality is found in the quarries. Then this old-time tale is repeated, and the searcher among the town's old records may answer "Yes" when the children question, "Is it true?"

LIGHTHOUSES IN CHICAGO.

Armour Institute.

BY BERTHA DAMARIS KNOBE.

A well-known litterateur has incorporated this humanitarian thought in a passage of fiction: "No soul beating upward from maimed early years, with the common hounds of ancestry pursuing him along the road, but cries out against the social scheme which lent him no fair start at the commencement. To see to it that every man, woman and child shall receive their chance in the running, the little feet being directed straight from the starting point, is work for the statesman and the philosopher, and the man who is striving to raise the average of the common mass does more for his nation and his age than any other form of work can do."

This noble purpose—to give the masses a chance—may be said to be the underlying principle of the grand aggregation of brick and stone and marble that stands south of the great heart of Chicago, and which is known as Armour Institute, Armour Mission and Armour Flats.

In this way the modest, multi-millionaire of Chicago—Philip D. Armour—has indissolubly linked his name with the history of his own city and, what is greater still, with the intensely human hopes and aspirations of the youth of that city, whether they be the children of luxury or the offspring of poverty.

Armour Institute is broadly philanthropic. It is confessedly unique, in that it is the outgrowth of the Mission, the spirit of which pervades the whole institution. To be sure, there are innumerable technical colleges such as Armour Institute, but none other based on the same new and noble principle.

Armour Institute is intended to interest all classes of society, the rich and the poor. "There shall be no class distinctions" was the avowed determination of the promoters of the scheme, Mr. Armour and Dr. Frank W. Gunsaulus, the widely-known divine. And so the rather remarkable result is that highly cultivated young girls of million dollar parents study and work side by side with less favored mission girls who cannot even pay tuition. It is a great step toward the abridgement of the chasm between the favored rich and the downtrodden poor, as well as an effort to lift all classes into noble careers. It tends to that consummation devoutly to be wished, the brotherhood of man. It is one step nearer the Augustine age of life.

It will be necessary to give a brief resumé of the inception and exemplification of the guiding principle of Armour Institute, that its peculiar characteristics may be fully understood. To begin at the beginning: "Almost seventeen years ago in this same miserable, unpretentious district, was born a flourishing mission. Mr. Joseph Armour was greatly interested in the work from the start. At his death ten years ago, one of his bequests was that a commodious mission Sunday-school should be built. It was the privilege of Mr. Philip D. Armour to execute the wish by the construction of the magnificent building now known as Armour Mission. With an enrollment of twenty-five hundred pupils in the Sunday-school department and unsurpassed equipment for the carrying on of regular mission work in that district it is accomplishing a grand result for the elevation of humanity.

This mission was erected seven years ago. Soon after a pile—"pile" is the only word that will describe adequately the imposing quarters which fairly tower above the surrounding, mean looking cottages—of modern flats, equipped with all the newest appliances for home comforts and conveniences, was erected in proximity. There are two hundred and twenty-four flats all told, most of which are around a central court of green. The large income from these flats goes—not into the capacious pocket of Philip D. Armour—but to support the Mission. The rates, by the way, come within the reach of people of moderate means.

It is strange how the rich and poor fairly touch elbows in a great city. Two squares east from the Armour settlement live the plutocrats of Michigan avenue, while surrounding it are countless miserable, little frame cottages. In these homes, so-called, live people whom the Mission draws into its fold and for whose help the entire settlement was founded.

Said Wendell Phillips: "Education is the only interest worthy the deep, controlling anxiety of the thoughtful man." That the ambitious young person, who comes within the ennobling influence of the Mission, might by education, equip himself for a profession, the Armour Institute was finally evolved. Built at a cost of $1,000,000, furnished with $500,000 worth of unsurpassed equipments, and endowed with $1,500,000, this inviting edifice opened its door September, 1893.

The result was indeed gratifying. From homes of luxury and from humble cottages came trooping twelve hundred enthusiastic young men and women eager to drink at the fountain of learning. The capacity of the institute being but eight hundred, only the successful competitors in the entrance examinations were privileged to enter. Splendid as Armour Institute now is, an extension of facilities is the inevitable growth of the near future.

Back of Armour Institute are the heart and the fabulous fortune of Mr. Armour. From his ever-full purse are the dollars given freely, even lavishly, to meet the large, ever-recurring expenses. Back of Armour Institute is also the teacher and preacher, Dr. Frank W. Gunsaulus, president of the institution. These two great men—the millionaire philanthropist and the minister philanthropist—coöperate in this noble enterprise. Their mutual interest is what Mr. Armour pleases to call the "partnership of brains with money."

Armour Institute is not a free school, and thus it disdains the misused word charity. But tuition is reduced to a minimum, the rates being only fifteen dollars a term, while some technical colleges of the same equipment charge eighty dollars a term. It is, speaking broadly, a school founded to help those who want to help themselves.

Free scholarships are liberally provided so that a meager purse need not deter a deserving, knowledge-seeking young man or woman from enjoying the rare privileges of the college. The impecunious student not favored with a scholarship is given the alternative of working his way or giving his note payable at two per cent in after years.

It is the aim of Armour Institute to educate the head, the hand, the heart. It is not merely a manual training school, but an institution of the highest technology. And money has not been spared to make it of its unique kind unsurpassed.

It was Chapin who thus expressed a truism: "Do not ask if a man has been through college. Ask if a college has been through him." And so thorough is the present equipment and so perfect the future plans, that the graduate of Armour Institute will be able to feel that he has not merely browsed here and there in the court of learning, but that its animating principle and purpose have permeated his very being, making him in every sense a symmetrical, self-supporting man.

As to the studies pursued at Armour Institute, there is the Academic Department, which fits the student either for the technical departments, or for the regular courses at the leading colleges of the country. Subjoined is a list of instructors and their departments: Thomas C. Roney, A. M., Director and Professor of English; Victor C. Alderson, A. M., Professor of Mathematics; James C. Faye, A. M., Ph. D., Professor of Mining, Engineering and Metallurgy; Frank E. Hinckley, A. B., Instructor in American History and Civics; William H. Runyon, A. M., Instructor in Physics; Miss Margaret W. Morley, Instructor in Biology and Botany; Louis C. Monin, Ph. D., Instructor in Modern Languages; Miss Carrie Wright, A. B., Instructor in Latin.

Of the higher technical departments there is the Department of Mechanical Engineering, with Ernest W. Cooke, M. E., Director, and Edward D. Agle, Assistant. Wilber M. Stine, M. S., directs the Department of Electricity and Electrical Engineering. The Department of Mining, Engineering and Metallurgy is under the supervision of Herman Haupt, Jr., M. D., Ph. D. The Department of Domestic Arts is directed by Mrs. Mary H. Hull, assisted by Miss Lina Eppendorff, Chief Instructor in Needle Arts, and Miss Isabel Bullard, Chief Instructor in Cookery. Under the Department of Library Science comes Miss Katharine L. Sharp, Ph. M., B. L. S., Director and Librarian, and Miss May L. Bennett, Miss Jessie Van Vleit, Mrs. Julia Beveridge, Assistant Librarians. Mrs. Lucy F Perkins is secretary of the Department of Art. Of the Department of Kindergartens, Miss Eva B. Whitmore is Director and Instructor in Occupations with Miss Alice Temple, Assistant, while Mrs. Mary Boomer Page is principal of the Normal classes. The instructor in Natural Sciences and Physical Culture is Miss Margaret W. Morley and Miss Mari-Ruef Hofer is Instructor in Music. The Department of Commerce is directed by Isaac S. Dement.

Thus from the magnificent library on the first floor to the perfectly equipped gymnasium on the top floor, throughout the various departments, are all the appliances and training that money and brains can afford. There is that indescribable air of culture, ever found within that sacred precinct—the four walls of a college—which is heightened by the works of art that adorn the walls of rooms and hallways from basement to roof. The white marble stairways, the elegant furnishings, the unsurpassed equipments make it of its kind ideal. It is distinctively fin de siecle.

"Educate men without religion and you make them but clever devils," once said the illustrious Duke of Wellington. And Armour Institute is not merely a work-shop and class-room, but the third phase of this educational scheme concerns itself with ethics and æsthetics—whatever, in fact, will tend to Christian standards of culture.

Without denominational bias, in its unique way it is lifting the youth of Chicago, many of whom would not have "their chance in running" were it not that Armour Institute makes possible an entrance into a higher plane of life and thought and activity. The needy are not always the poor. And here the needy, whether they be white or black, rich or poor, are given "a chance."

Such a noble work is what Edmund Burke would call "the cheap defense of nations." It gives greater faith in mankind, greater hope for the future. What more can be said to the honor of Armour Institute?

GUN—OR GOSPEL?

BY GEORGE MILTON HAMMELL.

The Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives but to save them.—JESUS CHRIST.

The flag of the Republic better be placed by the hand of indisputed authority upon every car which a mob dares to detain or capture, and, when that flag is touched, let the iron lips speak the supremacy of the law.—DR. GUNSAULUS.

Dr. Gunsaulus is an orator of consummate eloquence, and a writer of splendid and picturesque style; he is, moreover, a minister, or, if you please, an apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is his function, as an apostle, to interpret and apply to current life and circumstance the authoritative utterances of Him whose words are "spirit and life"—and never "flesh" and "death." If he misinterpret or misapply those holy utterances he is false to his function, and vitiates his own vocation by missing his opportunity to report to fellowmen the fitting word of his Master. For, there is always a fitting word, even during a crisis! And we are now, in the United States, in an industrial crisis!

Dr. Gunsaulus' words were spoken before the crisis came—before the mob of July—and they embody his program of dealing with riot—"when that flag is touched let the iron lips speak the supremacy of the law."

What is the language of the iron lips?—death! What is the language of the Lord?—life! "The Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them." The gospel of Dr. Gunsaulus is—death; the gospel of Jesus is—life.

Well, the minister and the Master differ by quite wide diameters of method! Both cannot be right! But is the method of Jesus practicable? Is the gospel of Jesus as potent to disperse a mob as a Gatling gun? Perhaps not, but it has not yet been tried! Which is mightier—the truth or the troops? Of course, the dominant mercantilism and militarism of the day knows nothing of gospel, of truth, as practical forces, or possible elements in an ideal industrial, social or political life, and it now seems as if the ministry had no other resource when unrest culminates in riot than force, bullets, iron lips of merciless guns.

Grant that the mob is born of the social hells—an offspring of mire, disease and chaos; grant that in its delirium it becomes guilty of murder, arson and theft, and ought to be conquered and punished, is death the just penalty of insanity? Is it the just punishment of arson or robbery? Grant that the torch in the hands of a violent rabble is the symptom of social malady, is it not true that the gun in the hands of the military is also an indication of deranged relation between man and man, between state and citizen, between society and the individual? Why the gun? Why the regular troops? Why the militia maintained at an annual expense of a million dollars? The regular troops cost $24,000,000, and Congress appropriates the sum of $400,000 per annum for the support of the state militia, and the various states appropriate at least a million dollars per year for the maintenance of 110,718 citizen soldiers, organized as a National Guard. Colonel Dodge advocates the appropriation of a minimum $5,000,000—or maximum $7,000,000 per year for the protection of "the property and honor of the present generation," and, as a soldier, is of opinion that there could be no better use of the nation's funds. Editors are advocating the increase of the United States army to a force of 100,000 men, in readiness for the riots of the future—and, in the meantime, and for the crises of the future, the only argument of which our statesmen and the press have knowledge is—the gun! The mob is to be mowed down!—the rioters are to be slaughtered, the troops are to be called out, and the crime of the crowd is to be punished by the summary process of a discharge of rifle and other engines of death.

I make no apology for the mob, I have no sympathy with riot—there are better paths to industrial reform than through the flames of burning railway property; and there is a more cogent appeal to the people than the strike or boycott—but I am sure that the wage-worker has a grievance, and knows what it is, and I am also sure that the Lord Jesus Christ may confer grace sufficient to endure, or end the grievance; grace to endure with a noble patience, and grace to end by as noble an exercise of power and inherent rights.

There have been grievances, caused by abused powers of capital, by monopoly. The method of the mob in its fierce effort to obtain justice is wrong, but monopoly is also wrong. There is a crime of the crowd, of this the rabble is guilty; but there is also a crime of the "company"—and of this the corporation is guilty. One crime is as vicious as the other. The lawlessness of capitalism is as destructive as the lawlessness of laborism; but the mob loses its case; it is "mowed down," it is dispersed It does not cohere—it cannot organize. It has a torch and it burns; it has dynamite and it destroys, but the troops have guns, and the gun is mightier than the torch There is slime in the pit where the miners dig; but there is also a moral slime in the "office" where the operators scheme. The miners, working at fifty cents per ton, strike, and the militia is called out; the operators close the pit in order to "regulate the output"; but the militia is not needed at the mines; there is no emergency, no crisis. The operators, of course, violate no law. They are guilty of no crime; they are governed by the laws of supply and demand. Pullman reduces "wages," but the "salaries" are not diminished and the dividends are punctually paid in full. Under plea of business necessity "wages" are "cut," why not cut salaries and dividends? Or, brawn is treated as if it were brutish, and "hands" are "tagged," each man wearing his brass number, by which the company knows him. When these serfs demand to be known by their names they are accused of insolence—of not knowing their place! They dare not vote against the politics of the company! They dare not save too much money else the company will shut down the mines! The company (which is organized) destroys the life of the "hand," but there is no need of the troops! When the "hand" is organized, and strikes and burns a bridge the militia is ordered to the scene of disorder. Why does not the "hand" carry his case into court? He has not money!

But the American Railway Union, the Federation of Labor, the Brotherhood of Engineers and the Knights of Labor have money enough, and they have votes, why not combine to establish a National Industrial Union, which shall be as perfect an organism as that federation known as the United States of North America?

Dr. Gunsaulus demands that the flag of the Republic be placed upon every car which a mob dares to detain or capture. But, as I understand him, the car is private property. The flag is placed upon it when too late! It should float over it through all days and from sea to sea and gulf to lakes. National control of all means of transportation and people-ownership of all natural resources—this ought to constitute the program of united labor. Instead of capital class and labor class, employer class and wage earning class—let there be organized the true industrial army, the ideal commonwealth, with its gradation of place, according to gifts, and its pay, according to service, with its pride of duty recognized and done, and its certitude of compensation and care.

The supreme need is industrial organization—the overthrow of the pitiless system of competition, and the introduction of a mode of coöperation which shall banish the rivalry of men of a common trade or craft; and, over all, through all and in all, the spirit of Him who said, "The Son of man came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them."

Well has Leo XIII. said: "No practical solution of this question will ever be found without the assistance of religion and the church." "Every minister of holy religion must throw into the conflict all the energy of his mind and all the strength of his endurance."

But let him plead for "gospel" and not for "gun."

THE RED, WHITE AND BLUE.

BY UNCLE WILLIAM.

I was a-settin' an' a-listenin' to a Fourth uv July doin's the other day, some uv which pleased me first-rate.

It was a celebration got up by the wimmin—some sassiety called the "equil sufferers," er something like that, I believe. There was some mighty nice singin'—"Ameriky," "The Battle Him uv the Republick," an' etsetery, an' some speeches beside.

I liked the speeches first-rate.

One uv 'em was by a 'ooman, an' the way she whacked it to the polletishuns fer lettin' the ignunt furriners, what don't know nuthin' except to drink beer an' 40-rod an' to throw bums, dyenymite, an' etsetery—and also the poor, ornery niggrows vote, while the intelligent, patriotic wimmin, menny uv which hev the blood uv hull gennyrations uv Americanism a-coursin' through their vanes, air not aloud to hev a word to say about what they'll be taxed fer, ner nuthin', it was a pleasure to hear.

You see, my ol' mother was a 'ooman (God bless her!) an' as good an' brave an' true an' loyal a one as enny man you kin scare up in the hull country. An' Jane—that's my pardner (I think lots uv Jane, though I say it as shouldn't), I think is jest as well qualified to hev a say-so an' a vote as enny measly Dago or Bohemian or Belgian or Slave or niggrow as ever planted his brogan in the name uv annerky into the sacred presinks of the American polls. So you see I am somethin' uv a beleever in the "equil sufferin'" business myself.

An' then there was George Washington himself, the father uv his country (who was resserected fer the ocashun in the person uv a good Prohibishunist), who told 'em thet ef he'd knowed how his children would hev degennyrated he would hev ben almost tempted to throw up his situashun at Valley Forge an' retire from business to his own fireside and hev giv' up trym' to be the father uv his country.

This was all very good, and I set there an' sed "amen" to all thet was sed.

But when they cum to the closin' piece, a sweet-voiced young gal stood up an' sung the "Red, White an' Blue," the people jinin' in the chorus.

I hed never noticed pertickler jest what all them verses sed before. I hed always thought they was 'tarnal poor poetry, an' wondered why under the sun sum feller what could write poetry and loved his country didn't fix 'em up a little to make 'em sound right.

Fer instance, what does these words mean, anyhow:

> "Thy banners make tryanny tremble,
> When borne by the Red, White an' Blue?"

How under the sun could the "banners" be "borne by the red, white an' blue"?

It's absurd, an' I'll leave it to enny crittick from Boston to the Four Corners if it isn't.

But, as I was a-sayin', I hed never noticed before jest what all them verses did say. But as thet young gal's voice rose up sweet an' clear on the last verse—

> "The wine cup, the wine cup bring hither,
> An' fill it full, up to the brim," it dawned on me all uv a suddin thet there was the secret uv the hull thing.

Thet song, beautiful as it is in some ways, an' inspirin' as its pretty toon has ben to so many hearts fer so many years, must hev ben written by somebody who had ben a-lookin' at the wine when it was red an' his head was so full uv it thet he couldn't git his tongue er his pen to go straight.

An' then an' there I registered a solum vow thet I would never agin jine the chorus uv a drinkin' song, a-drinkin' the health uv "Old Glory" in that damnable stuff thet takes its color from the flames uv hell, thet is a-sendin' so menny uv our brightest American boys down to the bottomless pit, an' thet is a fairly disgracin' the old flag itself in so many ways.

No, siree!

There is a plenty uv good enough songs thet breathes the pure air an' spirit uv patriotism, without inspirin' enny sech a infernal sentimint as is to be found in a drinkin' song. Why, it seems to me like singin' a ode to the devil at a christenin', er a baptizin', er on Christmus, er some other sech solum ocashun. An' I would give more fer the pledge uv one solitary little American four year old boy, in a tin cup uv cold spring water, then fer a regiment uv soldiers a-drinkin' its health in shampane!

Ef we hevn't got enuff patriotic songs to inspire our hearts, let us pray God to raise up sum poet what will pour out his patriotic an' profetic soul into a song thet shell uplift the heart uv every American thet shell hear it, an' will inspire 'em with a patriotism thet will not have to depend on the bead on a glass uv wine er the foam on a can uv beer fer its enthusiasm!

Ol' Glory ferever, but pledged with wine—never!

A TRIBUTE FROM NANTUCKET.

BY REV. LOUISE S. BAKER.

Since the lamented Mary A. Woodbridge was a native of Nantucket, its seems fitting that a word from this old, historic place be added to the many loving tributes to her memory. Simple it may be, and, according to the Quaker reserve of her ancestry which, the more sparing it was of words, indicated a greater amount of unexpressed feeling, none the less hearty and true.

There is an almost clannish affection toward one another among the people born on this island, and the residents are very proud of those who make name and fame abroad. Especially glad are we to claim those whose ancestry is like that of Mrs. Woodbridge. I need not name the famous members of her family, already so widely mentioned by the press.

She was a tremendous worker, and doubtless snapped by too sharp tension the thread of life. On those occasions when I have heard her speak, her strength of argument and logical power impressed me vividly. She was very strong in her platform work, and of great dignity and presence. But it is not of these qualities, world-known, this imperfect tribute would speak, nor yet of her administrative force and systematic work, although the immense amount of writing she did cannot be estimated. It is rather of the courteous, kindly spirit she found time to manifest in the midst of busy hours. She was a woman of genius, but she did not think it necessary to be eccentric because she was superior in mental endowment. She had that sort of genius which counted indefatigable effort as a means of development.

Nearly opposite my house is the gem of a house in which Mrs. Woodbridge's only brother, Colonel Brayton, and his lovely wife reside about half of the year. She fully intended to visit this home and the place of her birth next summer, and had declared her firm intention to that end.

But she has taken another journey, unpremeditated and sudden, yet, also, according to her expressed desire, and there was none to say her nay.

The strong "right arm" of the National W. C. T. U. is broken, and there is sorrow in multitudes of hearts, where the name of Mary A. Woodbridge is indelibly engraved.

REPUBLICANISM IN MAINE.

EDITOR UNION SIGNAL:—An editorial in your issue of October 25, headed "Mr. Woolley's Address," contains this astonishing statement: "In Maine we believe every Prohibitionist should have cast his vote with the Republican party in the recent state election." Surely this is wounding prohibition in the house of its friends, and "giving aid and comfort to the enemy."

For fourteen years the Prohibitionists of Maine have borne aloft the banner of national prohibition, by a party loyal to it, as a principle and as the paramount political issue of our time. During all this time they have been subjected to all the forms of opposition known to modern politicians of the Blaine school of politics. Every effort has been made which the ingenuity of scheming political managers, coupled with an unscrupulous partisan press, could devise to break the organization, deplete its ranks or stay its growth.

Had one-tenth of the time and strength which the Republicans have devoted to suppressing the Prohibition party been devoted to suppressing the liquor traffic, it would have been destroyed instead of flourishing as it does in Portland, Bangor, Lewiston, Augusta, Biddeford, Bath, Rockland, Ellsworth, Calais, Belfast, all cities in Republican hands, and large towns in general throughout the state.

Against all opposition, abuse, misrepresentation, sophistry, the Prohibitionists have been steadfast, and year by year gaining, if not always in numbers, in respect and influence among all sincere temperance men, until thousands who continue to support the Republican party privately admit the Prohibition party to be right in principle and policy, the only fully consistent plan for a temperance man. They only attempt to justify their course on the ground that the Democratic party as a whole is worse, and "of two evils choose the least."

That "cordial sympathy" plank in the National Republican platform by our congressman, Boutelle, was just as honest and meant just as much proportionately, as the temperance planks in the state platforms. They are simply for effect, to keep temperance people quiet, and do not frighten the liquor element, whose support is retained by a policy of non-enforcement.

Under the action of the last Republican legislature, in reducing the penalties for transportation of intoxicating liquors for unlawful sale from five hundred to fifty dollars and amending Section 1 of Chapter 135, giving judges authority to omit the imprisonment penalty in liquor convictions, taking simply a fine of from fifty to two hundred dollars, nearly every county is now under practically low license. In several counties the plan of calling the regular liquor sellers up once a year and fining them one hundred dollars has been adopted.

In Waldo county the county attorney refused to thus disobey the constitution and subvert the law, and although entitled to renomination he was voted down and a "rummy" put in nomination and elected in September. This is the only county where a county official had become conspicuous in enforcement.

Ex-Governor Robie came out before the recent election in favor of resubmission and high license. Editor Patten, of the Bath Times, took the same position openly, boldly, and he was thereafter nominated and elected to the next legislature.

> "The mountain looks on Marathon
> And Marathon looks on the sea."

The Republican party in Maine sustains the National party, and the National party is opposed to Prohibition. Every ballot cast in Maine, in the recent election, for the Republican or Democratic party was an endorsement of a continuation of the liquor traffic in state and nation.

THE LABOR PROBLEM AGAIN.

EDITOR THE UNION SIGNAL:—In your issue of October 18, you have an article on "Arbitration, the Next Step in the Labor Problem," in which you say that while arbitration is not the final settlement of the labor problem, yet it is an invaluable if not indispensable means to that final settlement. Permit me to say that the final settlement of the labor problem can only come about by abolishing the legal restrictions that prevent those who so desire from employing themselves and by abolishing checks on the production of wealth at the same time.

In a new country there is no labor problem because all have access to the land and can supply all their wants by applying their labor thereto. As a result of this there is no extreme poverty in such a place and no unemployed, but when the land has all passed into private hands then large tracts of it are held out of use on speculation, and the man with only his labor to depend upon must first get permission to work from the holder of some opportunity, then men compete with each other to get this permission, and by underbidding each other force wages down to the least that a man can take and afford to live. To settle the labor question then, the barriers must be removed that prevent labor from obtaining access to land. This can best be done by appropriating the annual rental value of land by taxation for public uses and abolishing all taxes on industry or its products. This would be the only just means of taxation because rental values of land are created by the whole community, not by any individual, and therefore morally belong to the community.

By the adoption of this system of taxation it would become impossible for any one to be able to afford to hold valuable vacant land out of use and would either be compelled to improve it himself or dispose of it to some one else who would, or abandon it to the use of all. The demand for labor that would arise as the result of this would absorb the unemployed and so solve the labor question and solve it right. Besides forcing the use of unused land the adoption of the single tax would also stimulate industry by relieving it of the burdensome taxes now levied in the shape of taxes on personal property and improvements, and in the form of licenses, tariffs and internal revenue taxes. This is the only remedy founded on justice that can be devised for present unjust social conditions.

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—In an article in the August Century by the Rev. J. M. Buckley, entitled "The Wrongs and Perils of Woman Suffrage," some misleading statements were made. Speaking of the picture, "American Woman and Her Political Peers," Dr. Buckley says: "There would also be needed a portrait of one of the distinguished foreigners, who, after a study of the constitution of this country, have adopted it as their own, and yet after arriving are disfranchised for a term of years." Further: "Foreigners are disfranchised for a period of time assured to be long enough for men of average ability to comprehend the institutions and interests and to identify themselves therewith sufficiently to have a stake in the county."

The inference from these statements is, that there is a provision made by the general government, by which all foreigners are prevented from voting for a term of years after arriving here, and that this time is sufficient for a man of average ability to become acquainted with our institutions and methods, so that he can cast his ballot intelligently. The facts in the case are that the question of the qualifications for voters is left to the states, and that in nearly one-half of these aliens can vote in one year or less time by filing their intentions to become citizens at some future time. Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Indiana, Louisiana, Missouri, Oregon, North Dakota and Wisconsin thus give full privileges of citizenship, that is, the power of voting for every office, including presidential electors, in one year. In Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota and Colorado an alien can vote in six months by filing his intention. Michigan and Wyoming had the same qualification until recently, and Minnesota, hospitable, generous Minnesota, provided for the peasantry of Europe before they came by promising them the power of the ballot in four months after their arrival, only within the last year conditioning that they reside in the United States one year. We thus have fourteen commonwealths where aliens exercise the power of the ballot within one year—until recently we have had sixteen.

These qualifications of voters are certified to by the attorneys general of the states, and are up to date. It is a well-known fact that we have in the United States over a million voters who cannot read, write or speak the language in which their ballots are written, all males. Evidently we need a revival of patriotism, and it would seem well to begin this with the enfranchisement of American women.

IGNORING THE ISSUE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It seems to me the greatest foe to just and right government at the present time is not the liquor dealer nor the party boss, nor the ignorant foreigner, but the man who only a few years ago was ready to sacrifice his life for the preservation of the Union; the man whom we are wont to idealize and consider a hero; the man whom principle and patriotism once dominated, but who now, alas, is dominated by party and party bosses.

There is no man who clings more to party and party lines than the old soldier; even when he knows that principle and party have parted company he still clings to party.

One would suppose that the man who had been willing to risk life for principle once would be willing to stand up for it always. Strange that men will forget honor, principle, country, all, for the sake of party; yet so it is. It is not that men do not see, do not know. They do see; they do know, but party is the Juggernaut to which they sacrifice the very noblest elements of manhood.

The party boss can count more surely on the vote of the old soldier than he can on the vote of the ignorant foreigner, or on the vote of that creature who sells his vote to the highest bidder. Is there any hope of the redemption of our country from the thralldom of political bossism so long as intelligent and, so called, honorable men consent to be dominated by them?

I want to tell a little story right here in connection with this line of thought; a story of the last presidential election. When it was announced that Mr. Cleveland had been elected, a little boy, the son of a Democrat, said inquiringly to his father, "Is God for Cleveland, pa?" His father laughingly replied that he thought it must be that He was. "Then," said the little fellow exultantly, "we are all right, ain't we, pa?"

It would be well if every voter would take this question home to himself in regard to the party with whom he votes, and with regard to each man for whom he votes.

Can there be any righteous government so long as even Christian men ignore the question of whom God is for or against?

MORE ABOUT WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE IN WYOMING.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—In a recent issue of the Arena the governor of Nebraska makes the assertion that while Wyoming has had woman suffrage for twenty-four years, she has not as good laws on her statutes as Nebraska.

Now to many of our eastern friends this may sound strange, but let us investigate a little. I am not prepared to say anything about the laws of Nebraska, never having lived in that state, but I do know something about the situation in Wyoming. Notwithstanding there is a population of nineteen men to one woman, the women have been instrumental in securing some laws for the good of the state; if they are not enforced the women are not to blame.

First among these was a Sunday law. In the early days of Wyoming's settlement there was no way for a person to tell when Sunday came. Stores were open and the sound of the hammer, the blast of the whistle and the shout of the workman could be heard on every hand, but the mothers coming to this newly settled country with their little ones from eastern homes where the Sabbath was sacredly kept, began to inquire into this matter, and set about to have a better state of things. They circulated petitions and sent to their legislators, and as these women had votes they did not dare to disregard their petitions and thus a Sunday law was secured which for a time even closed the lawless saloon and the people of Wyoming were not longer classed with heathens.

Then, too, the mother-heart was stirred at the sight of the rapidly increasing habit among the boys of our land of cigarette and tobacco smoking, and again they come before the legislature with a bill to prohibit the sale of liquor and tobacco to minors. The bill was passed by a small majority, and boys under eighteen were protected by law from this temptation placed before them by unscrupulous men.

But any one traveling over the state must see how difficult is this field. We have a large class of coal miners, foreigners, who bring their wives with them and they are as ignorant as the men themselves. The women drink liquor and give it to their children. They know nothing of our laws and care less. Wyoming lacks the great middle class that goes to make up the communities in the eastern states and is the hope of the country.

Then, too, the distance is so great we cannot have the help of lecturers, and that they have in the East. Never to my knowledge have we had a speaker on woman suffrage, and yet we need it to arouse the women to see the privilege they enjoy and to use it rightly. We have had suffrage without having to fight for it, and consequently there are many among us who do not appreciate it, and there is great need of education along this line. And until we have help to educate the mass of women Wyoming will fail to come up to the high standard she might attain.

A SECOND "ARREST OF THOUGHT."

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—We have heard much of what Miss Willard so pointedly calls the "arrest of thought" which has come to women. It has been borne in upon me for several weeks as a thought that will not down, that we who are thanking God for this awakening, should pray more earnestly that this same arrest of thought might come to the men of our land, that they might in some way be shown the fearful responsibility of throwing a ballot which shall help, even to the degree of their limited individual influence, to perpetuate what they admit to be the curse of our country. I believe that only the direct influence of God's Spirit will awaken their consciences and lead them to carry Christian principle into politics. Our united prayers will surely bring it to pass that they shall see what a power for good they have in the right of franchise when exercised in behalf of the "enslaved brotherhood." If thought best, let us carry this into our conventions as a special subject of prayer, and "besiege the throne of grace." Should this seem extreme ground to any, let them look at it as coming from one who is feeling more and more the cruelty of this system which makes it so easy for humanity to fall.

Rochester, N. H. CAMERON.

ANOTHER RED-LETTER DAY?

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Is not the year long enough to give us another "red-letter day"? Can we not, out of its three hundred and sixty-five, give one day exclusively to securing subscribers for THE UNION SIGNAL and other W. C. T. U. publications? There is no reason why the subscription list of the official organ of the white ribbon host should not be doubled, if all the members made "a pull, a strong pull and a pull all together." Every white-ribboner ought to feel in duty bound to secure at least one new subscriber, even if it be herself. And if some day were set apart especially for that purpose no doubt the idea would be more generally carried into effect than it is at present.

No mightier weapon than the pen is found to-day in the battle for truth and justice. The orator may speak to thousands; the audiences of the journalist number tens and hundreds of thousands. Too often do we forget that we can do more effective work for the cause we hold so dear by distributing and putting into circulation suitable literature than by personally advocating our views from the platform. When the echo of the speaker's voice dies away perhaps the sentiments uttered are forgotten but the printed page is "a book of remembrance," in which noble minds have written their thoughts, expressed their hopes or sounded their notes of warning, and from which eloquent though silent voices continually speak.

How would it be to dedicate one day during Self-Denial Week to this work? Or what about the 3d of January? the birthday of that "great mother" who speaks now perchance more effectively through her memory than while among us? What say the powers that be?

Yours for advance all along the line,

Flemington, N. J. KATE LUNDEN.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Then came the disciples to Jesus apart, and said, Why could we not cast him out? And Jesus said unto them, Because of your unbelief; for verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you.—Matt. 17 :19, 20.

Our hearts have been gladdened by a gift of $100 from the twelfth district W. Virginia W. C. T. U., sent by Mrs. Mary L. Babb. The money has been given not alone to help the Temple, but to place the name of their honored and beloved district president, Mrs. Bell C. Harmison, on the W. Virginia tablet in Willard Hall. Mrs. Babb writes that the district was most anxious to send a hundred dollars to the Temple fund, but their finances were at a very low ebb. She says, "One of our most faithful sisters spoke of the matter to Mr. Aaron A. Baker, one of W. Virginia's loyal sons, who votes as he prays; his response was, 'Raise $75 and call on me for the last $25.'" We have no doubt there are many noble temperance men all over the land who would aid our white-ribboners if they would appeal to them in the above manner for the Temple. The Lord removes mountains for us when we coöperate with Him in the undertaking.

Mrs. Millie Andres, superintendent of Temple work for Iowa the past year, says: "Iowa has sent to the Temple this year $684.31, although, because of the stringent times, we fall below the amount paid last year, yet I think the interest and pride in the Temple, and the sense of responsibility for its financial success is growing. In another year if the clouds lift, Iowa will try hard not to fall behind any of her sister states in her offerings to our 'House Beautiful.'" In the Temple Items of October 18, we said the Shenandoah, Iowa, W. C. T. U. had pledged $100 and paid $5, it should have said, paid $50.51. The $100 which the white-ribboners of Iowa have been raising to place the name of their faithful and beloved president, Mrs. Marion H. Dunham on the Iowa tablet in Willard Hall, has been completed by the payment of $6 by Mrs. Sada S. Harrington. The Wooster, O., W. C. T. U., have paid $40 on their $100 pledge. Mrs. T. B. Southwell sends $5 from the W. C. T. U., eleventh district, Iowa, for the Shesler tablet. Ten dollars have been received from Mrs. M. A. Fellows towards the pledge of the Central W. C. T. U. of Wichita, Kan., making $90 this union has paid. Mrs. Certrude E. Jackson sends $2.57 on the $100 pledge of the Garden City, Kan., W. C. T. U. She writes: "I was in Chicago in July and visited the Temple. Attended the noontide prayer-meeting. Never till I reach heaven will I feel the joy that I experienced as I looked on the beautiful monument of woman's faith in God, and as I listened to the testimonies of men saved by the influence of the daily prayer-meeting, my heart sang a doxology of praise that I was permitted to enjoy the sight of what God had wrought by His handmaidens who trust Him."

A dear old saint, Mrs. E. A. Ransom, Lockport, N. Y., sends $4 and writes: "If the inclosed entitles me to a souvenir spoon it will be thankfully received. If not it will help pay interest on the Temple indebtedness all the same and tide over the hard times. Being in my eightieth year, and an outsider, I cannot do much, but hope to send my mite every year while life is spared. I hope to live to see the Temple free." If the "insiders" would do as much as our aged sister she would see her hope speedily realized. Mrs. C. A. Van Andre, Evanston, Ill., sends $10. "I have been putting nickels, dimes and larger pieces in my mite-box just as I could spare them," writes Mrs. C. L. Read, Union City, Pa., "as I wished to get the souvenir spoon by my birthday, and also to show it to others of our union and perhaps induce some of them to secure one before the year is up."

Alice Root, Chicago, came the other day with the contents of her mite-box, $3.75. She is but twelve years old, yet she has filled her mite-box four times; she has used the same one each year. It has now become very dear to her, for her sainted father came to the office and got the mite-box for her on her eighth birthday; since then an appalling accident deprived her of his love and care. In the twinkling of an eye he was called from the shadows of the earth to the glories of heaven, but Alice's gentle loving mother says her little daughter must continue the work for the Temple that her father started, so the old mite-box has to do service still another year. "I read in mamma's UNION SIGNAL about the House Beautiful," writes twelve-year-old Ralph Walker, East Arlington, Vt. "I earned some money selling papers, and send twenty-five cents of it for the Temple."

"Please accept my grateful acknowledgment of the beautiful Columbian souvenir," writes Mrs. Mary K. Sheldon, Montague, Mass. "I love to look at my treasure, and show it to my friends as a token of the magnificent work that has been accomplished by women in the building of the Temperance Temple."

All persons sending $1 to the Temple will receive the beautiful Columbian souvenir. Any individual who sends the contents of a mite-box, amounting to $3.65, by January 1, 1895, will receive a solid silver Temple souvenir tea-spoon. This, however, does not apply to persons filling boxes for unions; they receive the Columbian souvenir. All money orders and checks should be made out in the name of William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, the Temple, Chicago, Ill. All other matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, Ill.

GONE WITH THE PINS.

Where is the thrill of last night's fear?
Where is the stain of last week's tear?
Where is the tooth that ached last year?
Gone where the lost pins go to;
For last night's riddle is all made plain,
The sunshine laughs at the long past rain,
And the tooth that ached hath lost its pain,—
That's what our troubles grow to.

Where are the clothes that we used to wear?
Where are the burdens we used to bear?
Where is the bald head's curling hair?
Gone where the pins disappear to;
For the style has changed and the clothes are new,
The skies are wearing a brighter blue,
The hair doesn't snarl as it used to do,
And the parting has grown more clear, too.

Where are the bills that our peace distressed?
Where is the pin that the baby "blessed"?
Where are the doves in last year's nest?
Where have the pins all gone to?
On the old bills paid are the new ones thrown,
The baby's at school with her pins outgrown,
And the squabs are running a nest of their own,—
You can't bring 'em back if you want to.

We can stand the smart of yesterday,
To-day's worst ills we can drive away;
What was and is brings no dismay
For past and present sorrow;
But the burdens that make us groan and sweat,
The troubles that make us fume and fret,
Are the things that haven't happened yet,—
The pins that we'll find to-morrow.

SHE WAS LED.

BY MRS. A. H. BRONSON.

The W. C. T. U. could not be said to be in a flourishing condition, in a certain city in New York state. It was alive, to be sure, but the fact was, that while there were devoted and able women in its ranks there was no one in whom the requirements for a successful leader were united. Where there was talent, there was little or no leisure, and so the cause languished.

At last a worker from a neighboring town offered to come and help her almost discouraged sisters. Her heart-thrilling talks aroused some latent interest in ladies outside of the society, and the once lonely looking room became well filled with eager listeners.

Then a church was secured for her to speak in, and ministers, lawyers and merchants came out to hear the burning words which fell from the devoted woman's lips. This meeting was presided over by the wife of a prominent lawyer, who it was said had consented to act as county superintendent

"Has Mrs. B. been long in your society?" asked a newcomer, who had watched with deep interest the new order of things.

"No, only a short time," was the answer. "It was such an encouragement when she joined us."

Not long after, the lady who had made the inquiry received a call from the new superintendent, and in the course of conversation ventured to inquire how it was that she had come to give herself to this work, requiring so much sacrifice in the way of frequent absences from home and curtailing of former social engagements.

"How did I come to?" she repeated, her fine eyes lighting up, and her voice trembling a little; "I will tell you if you care to know—I was just led into it. I do not think that I was ever wholly indifferent to the matter; conscience had often spoken when I saw those few devoted women, most of them heavily burdened with cares, going regularly every week to their little meeting, and knew that they were straining every nerve trying to stem even a little the flood of evil in our city caused by drink. I had even a sense of shame at times, that I and others should turn the cold shoulder on their noble efforts, but I put these impressions from me, and 'went by on the other side.'

"Last summer outdoor temperance meetings were held on Sabbath evenings, and the ministers at last were aroused to extra effort. One evening your friend, Rev. Mr. C., conducted it, and my husband and I were deeply interested in his appeals, he was so earnest, yet nothing had as yet moved us very deeply as to our own personal responsibility.

"As we were about leaving the grounds, a young woman belonging to the W. C. T. U. came up to us. She was a dwarf, and in some respects lacking in mental poise, but able to earn her own living with the kindly oversight of the ladies of the society,—one of the Lord's 'little ones.' Her errand was to my husband, of whom she said, 'I hear he is an honest lawyer.' She wished him to write a letter for her on some small business matter, in which she felt herself wronged. He good-naturedly consented, making notes in his book. As we turned to leave, she held up a copy of THE UNION SIGNAL, saying, 'Won't you please take this for your wife? Only twenty-five cents for three months; please do, to help on our good cause.' My husband smiled, gave her the money, and we went home.

"How little did we think that we had come to a turning point in our lives! In due time one number of THE UNION SIGNAL arrived, but having just then some special engagements on hand, for some weeks it came and remained unread. One day, at last, I sat down, ashamed of my neglect, and looked them all carefully over. My soul was stirred. At last I was awake.

"I thought of the neglected W. C. T. U. meeting, and determined to attend the next. Mrs. Morse was there for the first time. My heart was won to her and to the cause she represented. I invited her home with me that night, and we had a long talk. The mists cleared away, and I gave myself to the work.

"At the next meeting she proposed forming a county association, and named me as president. 'Preposterous,' I said, 'I am only a young convert.'

"But you have said, 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?' was her answer. 'Your present circumstances, your past experiences prove that. You cannot refuse this work.'

"Of course, before consenting, I consulted my husband, and found him more than willing that I undertake it, knowing well that it would in a measure disturb our sweet home life and make a break in our society relations.'"

"Yet you are happy in it?" I asked.

"Happier than ever before," she said. "I feel that God is leading."

Providence, R. I.

HOW THEY "DID" IT.

"Ingenuity and the W. C. T. U." would be a title very rich in suggestions to any writer at all observant of the methods employed by white-ribboners in inserting the thin side of a temperance wedge into some knotty subject, or the ingenious ways they employ to present the "same old subject" in new and attractive shapes.

Miss Willard's appeal, written from Twilight Park last August, asking each worker to take the pledge to secure one new subscriber to THE UNION SIGNAL before the National Convention, has been heroically responded to. The following testimonies from a few of those who have redeemed their pledges bear out the truth of the old Yorkshire proverb quoted in her letter,—

IT'S DOGGED AS DOES IT.

You asked me for suggestions as to method. I do not know of any better way than to just get out and work.

MRS. L. E. WILHELM.

Kewanee, Ill.

On my way to the state convention I met a friend on the train and having two numbers of THE UNION SIGNAL with me I gave him John G. Woolley's speech to read, and breathed a silent prayer to our Father. Then I asked him if I could not take his subscription for the paper to be sent to his wife, and he consented. So "It's dogged as does it."

MRS. M. J. ELLIS.

Wellington, Kan.

I have sent you five new subscribers and one renewal. It was all done by personal soliciting. This is the better way, as public announcements do not amount to much in reaching people.

MRS. G. H. NORTON.

Bristol, O.

One of the faithful ones living in a stone quarry district on the shores of Lake Superior, where there is a large settlement of Finnish people, enslaved by the drink curse, writes:

There was one boy who often came to our house to ask about the temperance work. He had read of Miss Willard in his Finnish papers. We told him of some work he might do among his people. When Miss Willard's letter came I read it to him. "Well," he said, "here is a dollar. Tell them to send me the paper. I cannot read English but you will tell me what is in it and then I will take it to our society room and tell our people."

Jacobsville, Mich. MRS. FLORA BAUMGARTNER.

Did I do it? Yes. How? Simply by the asking.

Demorest, Ga. H. ELIZABETH SMITH.

Yes, I did it, getting my one new subscription as I regularly do three others, by tithing my income and setting aside four dollars of the tenth for UNION SIGNALS for others. If all our sisters, particularly those who have limited means, would practice the tithing system, they would be surprised how much more good the tenth would do than giving in the old unsystematic way; and also how the ninety cents would seem to go so much farther.

Oskaloosa, Pa. MRS. R. W. MARRIAGE.

SECURING NEW MEMBERS.

Another call from our President was for a grand membership canvass as one feature of Self-Denial week, the 28th of September, to be observed as "Crusade Membership Day." The work of winning new members seems to have been very general and a very few of the answers to the query, "How did you do it?" are given below.

After telling the Lord about it I called on three ladies on the afternoon of the 27th, and found the Lord had been there before me so that I had only to ask and receive.

Carthage, Mo. R. B. HALL.

I secured two new members—my mother and sister. They long ago signed the pledge but there is no union here. We are now going to call ourselves a regularly organized union from this on, and maybe "it will grow!

LILY REYNOLDS.

Lithia Springs, Ga.

This is how I did it. It was membership day and the ladies of our union were telling their experiences. I had given a graphic account of "A white-ribboner's struggle with her self-denial coffee-pot," when a lady present said, "Come up to F—— and talk to us like that." I went, and —well, the white ribbon is now worn over twelve hearts newly consecrated to our work, and twelve new voices have taken up the jubilant strain, "We all belong." I am not quite selfish enough to claim the round dozen as my own special fruits (God and the other women must have their share in the honor) but think I can honestly hold on to one. My new subscriber to THE UNION SIGNAL which I send along with this is a logical sequence of the above.

Somis, Cal. MARY G. TONGIER.

The Marinette, Wis., W. C. T. U. secured eleven new members on Membership Day by the following means: It was the day for our regular mothers' meeting, but instead of holding it in our room as usual, it was called at the home of one of our members, and fifty postal card invitations were sent out to ladies who we thought might become interested in our work. In addition to our regular order, Scripture reading, prayer and short mothers' meeting we had an attractive W. C. T. U. program, after which all were invited to remain to "tea." It was most successful in results. ELLA A. KEERL.

Marinette, Wis.

Twelve new members were reported at the meeting of our union on the afternoon of our leader's birthday. These were gained by a little effort through the September days preceding Crusade Day. Enrolling tablets in the hands of four or five, and a little personal effort on the part of others secured a number of valuable and helpful additions, among them the pastor of the Christian church and his wife. The first honorary member of the new official year was the first boy namesake of Miss Willard. L. C. SHEA.

LIQUOR RETAILING.

BY JAMES VILA BLAKE.

If we speak of the positive incitements which the community composts crime withal what shall be said of liquor retailing, that "rank offence" which "smells to heaven," the crime of society against sanity, adding mania to misery and spurring temptation with frenzy!

Who will argue this matter? Who will enter to debate it? Would not any one think it a strange thing if I should argue to him that he must love his little children? "We take some things for granted." What a monster were that man who should ply his boy with unclean sights, sounds, opportunities, thereupon to chain, torture or kill him for a bad act or fancy! But how otherwise acts society if it pour into the veins a liquid fire and then slay for arson? if it ply the wretched, discontented, untaught, the fierce, the diseased, with burning drink till the nerves will be ruined, character gone, reputation killed, want gnawing like a wolf, animosities turned to fury and the woe, anger, moral blindness and madness break out into robbery and murder, and then it tortures its victim in an iron cage or hang him from a gibbet?

How society may deal with that panderer of woe and sire of criminals, the liquor-seller, I am not wise to know. Sumptuary laws are very hard to apply. But until society be stirred by a sense of responsibility, by an unselfish fervor and a deeper religion, to learn how to sweep the liquor-seller from the earth, it is meet it should bow its head in ashes before the victims whom now it but gets out of its sight into the cages.

But alas! the liquor-seller is himself a criminal, an extra-legal criminal. I would deal no more harshly or scornfully with him than any other criminal. Society shares with him the responsibility of his being. Rather would I heap my judgment and scorn on myself if ever I helped support him by drinking anything at those tragical counters where the drunkard buries his sanity, where pass the funerals of domestic peace!—"More Than Kin."

WHAT THE BIRDS THINK.

BY ISABEL SHIRLEY.

On the highest branch of an oak tree,
Sir Robin sat one day,
And poured out his heart in a burst of song,
In the gayest kind of a way.

A bright little English Sparrow
Was busy building her nest,
When she heard the rollicking Robin,
And thought it would be best

To give him a bit of a lecture
On what she happened to think
Was the cause of all his mirthfulness—
For she laid it to the drink.

"Friend Robin, I've lived in the city
Where liquor-saloons abound,
And when men come out of those places,
They scarcely can walk around.

"They scream at the tops of their voice,
And frighten the folks with their noise,
And as for the birds—why they couldn't feel worse,
At sight of an army of boys.

"So I thought I'd move to the country,
Where people are said to be good;
And when I heard such a noise in the oak
In this beautiful, fragrant wood,

"It seemed to me I'd go frantic,
If the stuff they drink down there
Was used here too!—Now, excuse me, please,
I must my nest prepare."

Sir Robin laughed louder than ever!
Then seeing the Sparrow's alarm,
Suppressing his mirth he said gently,
"Pray, do not fear any harm!

"It's only the men who're so silly!
Not a bird in this whole country round
When he knew the result of such drinking
Would try it again, I'll be bound.

"I can't understand why men do it,
When water's so pure and so free.
Be assured, my dear little neighbor,
You've nothing to fear from me."

I DIDN'T THINK.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

I know a naughty little elf
Who never can behave himself;
He beats his drum when grandma's cap
Is nodding for a cozy nap.
And leaves his ball upon the floor
For Uncle Jack to stumble o'er.

'Twas he who tried to scratch his name
Upon a painted picture frame;
'Twas he who left the gate untied,
Which brindle cow pushed open wide;
'Twas he who nibbled Lucy's cake,
She took such pains to mix and bake.
And though we blamed the tricky mice,
'Twas he who cracked its fluted ice.

This little elf upset the milk,
He tangled aunty's broidery silk,
He went to school with muddy shoes,
Though credits very sure to lose.
Against his mamma's gentle wish
He took the sugar from the dish;
He lost the pen and spilled the ink,
This elf we call, "I didn't think."

Our house would be a nicer place
If he would never show his face;
We hope and hope some sunny day
The naughty elf will run away.
For oft he makes our spirits sink—
This troublesome "I didn't think."

THE PAPER PATSY FOUND.

"Mother! mother! come here; I've found a paper that I think is pretty nice," cried Patsy Gray.

Mrs. Gray left her ironing and came to the porch door.

Patsy had just come from school; his book and cap lay beside him, and he was spelling out the words on a clean, square, stiff paper.

"I found it in the street; it's clean and new, and no name on it."

"It is a temperance pledge," said his mother.

"And do you put your name here in the corner, to do as it reads, never to use wine, beer, cider or any intoxicating drink?"

"Yes; that is what it is for. I heard a gentleman was here to start a temperance society, and this must be one of his pledges."

"And folks sign it and belong to the society?"

"Yes; that is it. And when one signs such a pledge, one must keep it sacred, on honor, and that can be done by God's help only."

"Would you like me to sign?" said Patsy.

"Indeed I would," said his mother. "I am a widow and you are my only son, my hope and comfort. If you go wrong my heart will break. If you are a good, true man, it will sing for joy."

"I wouldn't want you to sit crying like Mrs. Green, because her boy drinks and went to jail."

"I hope not!" exclaimed Mrs. Gray.

"Suppose I sign this, and go hunt up the gentleman, and ask him to let me belong to his society?"

"That will be a good plan. He is at our preacher's house."

"Suppose I ask one or two boys to go with me? I hate to go alone, and maybe they will sign too."

"That will be fine. Perhaps there can be enough boys found to form a band. If some of you boys form a good strong band, and have meetings, and keep it up year after year, and become earnest temperance men, think how much good you can do; you may change the character of this village, and drive out all liquor-selling. Then our little village would grow into a rich, happy, safe town!"

"Can boys do all that?" shouted Patsy.

"Yes; the boys of now are the men of by and by. If all the boys thirty years ago had been real strong temperance boys I think the question of temperance would now be settled for this country."

"Well, now, mother, I'll sign this pledge, and take it to school, and tell teacher and the boys; and after school a lot of us will go to find the temperance man."

"Very good! Perhaps your teacher will be the president of the society, and you can have your meetings in the school-house."

"Whoop! ain't you the one to plan!" cried Patsy. "Here goes for signing, and I'll off to school as soon as I have a bite of dinner. When I get to be a man I'll see that you have a big dinner every day, and a hired girl to cook it for you!"—Mrs. Julia McNair Wright.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Come, let us make a closer circle and get our wits sharpened and ready to work—Puzzle Cornerers, I mean especially, for the subject now before us is of special interest to them. So prick up your ears and be ready with suggestion and help.

Let me see, our Soft-Shelled Nuts now number 356—that's nearly one a day for a year! I wonder how many of you have sent in these Nuts and how many have cracked them? The latter would be hard to tell. Yet I believe there are a great many Cornerers who would like to know more about puzzles, how to make them and how to guess them. And they would find the exercise of thought and the cultivation of their ingenuity most helpful to them.

Numerical Enigmas, the easiest puzzles for beginners, are best known and most frequently seen. Cozy Corner Nuts would be composed mostly of these just as almonds are most frequently found in mixed nuts, if all were used as they are supplied in ten times the quantity of the others.

To make a Numerical Enigma, select the name of some noted person or event; or a short, familiar text, temperance motto or quotation, and write it down numbering the letters thus:

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8

On another slip of paper write, "I am composed of eight letters." Looking at the word you find certain words can be formed from the letters, so you spell, "My 5, 2, 6, 4 is a beautiful flower (rose). My 1, 8, 7, 3 is that on which the flower grows (stem). My whole is the name of a great temperance leader." Be sure to use all the letters and not to use any one more than once. Send all your answers with the puzzle and write only on one side of the paper. To solve a puzzle of this sort put down as many numbers as the enigma calls for and as fast as you guess the definitions, fill in the blanks.

Enigmas not quite so common nor so easy to make and guess are those called Crossword in which the words containing the letters are compared with words of opposite or similar meaning which do not contain them. For instance:

My first is in woman but not in maid (W)
My second is in wither but not in fade (I)
My third is in labor but not in work (L)
My fourth is in lazy but not in shirk (L)
My fifth is in ailing but not in sick (A)
My sixth is in ready but not in quick (R)
My seventh is in verdant but not in green (D)
My whole has been called America's Queen.

These enigmas do not need to rhyme and words containing the same letters may also be compared as follows:

In widow and also in wife (W)
In quiet and also in strife (I)
In slumber and also in toil (L)
In pleasure and also in spoil (L)
In damage and also in gain (A)
In dewdrop and also in rain (R)
In gladness and also in dole (D)
A wonderful woman is whole.

Dear me, our time is up and I have but just begun. Two weeks from now we'll have more and shall look for some descriptions of new puzzles later from our puzzle contributors. Solon, Caroline Hawke, Helen Hendrix, Peter Brossard, Watt and many others ought to be able to tell us something about puzzle making and guessing.

BISHOP HAYGOOD ON LOCAL OPTION.

In the symposium published by the New York Independent on the drink evil is an article by Bishop Atticus G. Haygood of the M. E. Church South, which is important chiefly because of the influence and reputation of its author. The article is about equally divided between sounding the praises of local option and denouncing the fanaticism of third party Prohibitionists and woman's suffragists.

Bishop Haygood argues the superiority of local option as a means of throttling the saloons "because it does throttle them. It is known of all men that local option succeeds. It does close the saloons." We have comparatively little personal knowledge of the working of the local option laws in the eighty-eight counties of Georgia which do not license the liquor traffic but frankly accept Bishop Haygood's statement that this law is as well enforced as any other law. Nevertheless we do not hesitate to say that local option in Georgia is just as "local" and just as "optional" as anywhere else.

Inquiring of a resident of a county seat in Georgia concerning the working of the prohibitory law in his home, we were informed that it had "killed the place" because persons in the vicinity who wanted liquor went to a town in an adjoining wet county for it and of course took all of their trade with them. In addition to this, the residents of the dry town had not far to go to get liquor and consequently, while drinking might be and undoubtedly was less than when open saloons were running, it was by no means entirely stopped. Soon after the county in which this town was situated, after having been twelve years dry, went "wet," presumably because the inhabitants thought the drinking was not enough diminished to pay for the loss of trade which their town suffered under prohibition.

We believe that it is better to drive the liquor traffic out of even a small territory than to leave it in undisputed possession of the world, and white-ribboners have never failed to work heartily to secure all that can be secured under local option; nevertheless, we have proved by sad experience again and again that local option is "too local" and "too optional."

The difficulties illustrated above are insurmountable. The smaller the locality from which the traffic is driven, the greater are these difficulties, but they exist also in the case of states, ultimately it will be found that prohibition for the nation is "too local"; the W. C. T. U. has long foreseen this and has set up its banner "For God and Home and Every Land." In the nature of the case, local option will never bring prohibition to the large cities. The liquor men of the nation will not make a stand to resist prohibition when the question comes up in a county in which are situated only small towns, though even in such counties much outside help is furnished the liquor interests; but when a large and important city is at stake, they will muster all their forces at this one strategic point.

By some oversight the liquor men allowed Fulton county, in which Atlanta is situated, to go dry and for two years Atlanta was a city set on a hill, her prohibitory law was well enforced, and the results were the betterment of the poor, and the peace and prosperity of the city. But they speedily discovered their mistake, and lost no time in correcting it. As soon as the question could be again legally submitted to vote, another election was held, and this time the saloon power took care that the issue did not go by default. The most unscrupulous tricks were resorted to; money was poured into the city from all over the nation; on election day hundreds of voters were registered from vacant lots in the city, and in the closing hours numbers were marched to the polls who had been imported from Chattanooga and other places, and, by one of the most stupendous election frauds, Fulton county went "wet." The one poor little county was no match for the combined liquor dealers of the nation.

We doubt if Atlanta, or any other large city in Georgia or elsewhere, ever has prohibition again, except through state or national law. It may be urged that it is as well they should not, for when prohibition is thus voted upon large cities by the rural vote, it is never enforced. It is enforced in Maine, even in the large cities, as well as other laws, but it is unquestionably true that in many cases where there is state prohibition, the law is disregarded in the large cities, and it is exceedingly important that such men as Bishop Haygood investigate the cause of this. It is simply because the two great political parties control these cities, and neither one of them dare allow a prohibitory law to be enforced any more than it dare permit a prohibitory plank in its platform. To do so would be to lose its saloon constituency.

Bishop Haygood makes the common mistake of people who seem never to have carefully studied the situation when he accuses third party Prohibitionists of "attempting to bring prohibition into national politics." They are not the guilty party. The difficulty is the liquor traffic is already in national politics. Can Bishop Haygood tell us how we are to get it out except by getting prohibition in? No one deplores the size of the fight that we have on our hands more than the W. C. T. U. and third party Prohibitionists. It would be a comparatively simple thing if we were called upon only to oppose single, detached saloons. At first we began the fight that way; "we made the saloon our objective point. But we soon found that the saloon was only the picket line of the enemy, and that back of the saloon lay the liquor traffic entrenched behind the solid walls of legislation." We have yet to learn of but one kind of engine with which to batter down "walls of legislation."

It is unfortunate that Bishop Haygood should have thought it necessary to indulge in sneers and flings at the leaders of the National Prohibition party and of the W. C. T. U. It is natural, of course, to think that people who differ radically with us may be "well-meaning but are incapable, being without common sense; zealous to a degree, but intolerant of opinions not echoing their own," but usually it is better not to say such things, for there is really no argument in it, and it quite often appears that there is quite as much intolerance on one side as the other.

In his statement of the "hurt" done Prohibition by the "heat and intolerance of doctrinaires," Bishop Haygood makes a most misleading statement of facts and does a gross injustice to a noble woman. He says: "The most able and eloquent advocate of Prohibition in Georgia, the president of a leading college, was within a few weeks denounced as standing in with the whisky power because he is accustomed to vote the Democratic ticket, although he has fought in the forefront of every prohibition fight since the beginning of his ministerial life. This, in a daily paper by one high in the councils of the W. C. T. U."

From that statement any one must suppose that an unprovoked attack was made upon this noble Prohibitionist and simply for the one cause. The facts are that the college president in question has been for several years a bitter and intolerant enemy of the W. C. T. U. because of the attitude of the National upon woman's suffrage. Two years ago he defeated a resolution to endorse the W. C. T. U. in the North Georgia Conference of the M. E. church South, and called upon all Methodist ministers to close their churches to us. At the time, the lady in question wrote a most gentle and Christian letter in which there was not one bitter word.

Lately a professor in the college of which the above gentleman is president, a fine scholar and a man of high standing, was dismissed. He says that he had been previously threatened by the president with dismissal in case he did not withdraw from the Prohibition party and cease to endorse the W. C. T. U. He refused to do either, and his dismissal followed, though not ostensibly for these reasons. At his request the lady in question made a statement of his case in a daily paper. Incidentally she remarks that the president "thus attempts to throttle the professor's political action while reserving to himself free course as a Democrat and supporter of the liquor traffic." We think it will be very hard for Bishop Haygood to disprove her statement, for however earnestly a man may work for Prohibition in his own state, whenever he casts his vote for a party which explicitly declares against "sumptuary legislation," by just so much is he a "supporter of the liquor traffic." There may be weighty reasons, sufficient reasons, for his vote, there may be other issues at stake paramount to Prohibition; it may be the right and the best thing he can do to vote that ticket, but the fact remains unchanged,—by his vote he supports the liquor traffic.

MAN PROPOSES; GOD DISPOSES.

Who would have predicted when the Prohibition party held its great convention in Indianapolis in 1888, at which occurred the great debate on retaining the woman suffrage plank in the platform which had always been there since the organization of the party in 1869, that this bone of contention would become the backbone of progressive movements in this country?

But no one will deny that not even the labor question has forged forward more rapidly in these last years than the question of woman's active participation in the affairs of government. Both have outstripped that prohibition movement, which, as loyal temperance workers, we have from the first placed in the van, and which we keep there still so far as we are able. Doubtless this irrepressible development is due to the clarified perception of good men and the slowly multiplying numbers of awakened women who are making the discovery that neither the prohibition army nor the labor army have as yet recruited a sufficient number of soldiers to make their battle other than a losing one. It is felt that if instead of fighting with her bare hands woman were weaponed with the ballot she would use it to close saloons, to reduce a day's work to eight hours, to put the working man in power. For none has suffered from the saloon as she has done; none has learned so thoroughly the curse of working hours without a limit; none knows better by hard experience that the wage-worker has more sympathy with the weaker sex than any other can have, because of their mutual subjection in the past to the strong arm of the political and money power.

The innings of the woman question are so many that we have left off trying to keep up our count. Yesterday it was the legislature in New South Wales that voted to give women the ballot; to-day it is the delegates to the American board of commissioners of foreign missions that recommend the addition of women to the solemn and revered prudential committee of that great society; to-morrow it will be the most high-stepping women of New York city arrayed in an organization that antagonizes the Tammany ring, and some day, although it has failed this time, we believe it will be Kansas giving full enfranchisement to women. The fact is, we are breathing a new atmosphere, and the best men are beginning to wonder why they ever hesitated to call their mothers to the rescue in great emergencies; why they could not put this and that together so as to double, nay, to quadruple the home vote in our demoralized municipalities.

History tends evermore to the repetition of itself. It is not an accident that has called Mrs. Josephine Shaw

Lowell to the front as Dr. Parkhurst's chief ally among the women folk. She is to-day the woman of destiny in Gotham, because two generations back her father was in the forefront of the reform in methods of living that crystallized into the world-famous Brook Farm, where Emerson and Lowell, George William Curtis and Margaret Fuller, with others like minded, set themselves to the problem of a simpler and more reasonable life, in which every member of the community should engage in manual labor as well as brain work. They were all abolitionists, and in a sense temperance reformers, for their habits were most abstemious, plain living and high thinking having been their cogent watchword. Francis Shaw, of Roxbury (Boston), was one of the chief movers in this enterprise. One of his daughters married George William Curtis; another married Robert Minturn, and Mrs. Josephine Shaw Lowell is a third. Her husband was a colonel in the army, and gave his life in the war for liberty. Mrs. Lowell is a woman of the highest character, has enjoyed the best advantages, educational and social, has a good property, and has for many years devoted herself in the most intelligent way to reform and philanthropic work in New York city. Probably no woman in America understands the science of charity better than she. In the recent coatmakers' strike Mrs. Shaw Lowell was the central figure, encouraging the sweated wageworkers and helping them by her strong influence until they won the day.

It is the intention of these new women in government to influence by every honorable means the votes of men and to organize the working women for the same purpose. All of this is to be heartily applauded, but far beyond the significance of the movement in its local aspect is the education of women to a sense of their civic duties which the work involves. It seems the irony of destiny that our good friends, the men and women who worked so hard to defeat an amendment to the pending constitution of the state of New York giving women the ballot, should now turn to them for help in a great crisis, and we predict that the outcome of it all will be such a quickened perception on the part of all thoughtful persons as shall convince them that if women can do so much by indirection to save the city from the slough of despond in which it is sunk, how much more might they do if, panoplied with the weapon of the freeman, they went forth to cast their ballots on election day.

It is not because women are so much better than men that we seek to utilize their power at the point where an opinion passes into a law, but it is because we believe that they are forever separated from the more exterior view that men take of public questions; the more materialistic considerations that weigh with men; by reason of their capacity for the sacred estate of motherhood. That nature must be more mellow which knows that life is for it an uncertain heritage, that the plain that breaks off suddenly is the one on which it treads. She who descends into the valley of unutterable pain and with the breath of eternity upon her forehead gives birth and being to mankind, must in the nature of the case be more impressionable to spiritual influence and voices that speak to the inner ear alone. The cradle is the altar of the home; the trusting face of babyhood and childhood must forever make countless ethical impressions upon her who shares their sacred influence in daily life, which impressions translated into the language of custom and law would give a sanctity to public affairs not in any other way to be obtained. For these and a thousand other reasons that we believe to be founded in natural and spiritual law as the exponents of the purposes of God, we intend to build in what little force we have to help rear the spotless column of woman in the government of the land we love the best.

A NEW APPLIANCE OF ALTRUISM.

We desire to call especial attention to two contributed articles in our current issue: "Some of Chicago's Lighthouses" and "Gun—or Gospel?" Each is, of its kind, uniqae, and the placing of them in immediate juxtaposition emphasizes to our thought the points of similarity as well as of contrast.

If there be one principle more than another which the reformer of to-day needs to emphasize in his own mind and keep constantly before him in his work, it is the essential harmony of apparent discords. In other words, we need to remember that all minds are not constituted alike; that men see truth from varying angles of vision and interpret truth according to widely different standards. The lesson of a broad charity toward another's views, even when most forcibly colliding with one's own pet theory, is one which the reformer, perhaps more than most other men, needs again and again to learn.

The underlying thought of that greatest novel of the day, "Marcella," is clearly this. With a splendid enthusiasm and with the noblest of purposes—that of giving her life to the uplifting of others—she combines an intolerance of all views not coinciding with her own which would be amusing if it were not so pathetic a picture of the attitude of youth in its relation to the great untried world of thought and life. Through the discipline of sorrow and by the failure of her own plans she comes at last to learn that God fulfills Himself in many ways, and that it needs all the diverging rays of the prism of human thought to converge into the white light of truth; that each true effort for the weal of humanity, however mistaken it may seem to one moving in another orbit, nevertheless contains some essential element of thought and life which cannot be ignored in the ultimate result.

The appearance of "Marcella" was most timely. The trite saying that it "meets a felt need" can well be used concerning this—Mrs. Ward's only great book. The time was surely ripe for an authoritative word of unification to be uttered in the midst of the contending voices—each claiming itself to be the only right way of settling existing wrongs. The new school of social ethics which is pouring such floods of light upon man's relation to man that we are almost inclined to say at times that the nineteenth century has discovered altruism, is, from its very splendor, in danger of blinding our eyes to the fact that there was light in the world before Christian socialism evolved; that that also is only another ray of "the light which lighteneth every man."

The nineteenth century did not discover altruism; it may be said to have re-discovered it, or rather discovered its new application along old lines; but altruism itself dates back to Bethlehem's manger and Calvary's cross and the disciples of the new school of thought cannot afford to look with contempt or even condescension upon those whose hope for the world and ideal of work for humanity have lain in keeping ever before humanity the personality of the man who "went about doing good"; who "came not to be ministered unto but to minister."

It is true He has been kept before humanity too much from the standpoint of theology and not enough from the standpoint of practical life, but it is the glory of this age and of the latest thought of Christianity that it really goes back to its first thought and unifies the two. We are heartily glad, therefore, to note that Armour Institute and Armour Flats are the outgrowth of Armour Mission; that the old gospel of life through Jesus Christ is made the underlying principle of one of the grandest social reforms of the new age.

We are glad, too, that the name of the same well-known "minister philanthropist" appears in both articles. The implied criticism of the one is balanced by the well-merited praise of the other. Clearly, the author of "Gun or Gospel," speaks for the outcome of the latest, best thought along lines of social reform; but clearly, also, Armour Institute is working out that best thought in practical deeds. We may well pardon a divergence of head where there is such absolute unanimity of heart and hand.

No system of thought contains all truth. All systems of thought contain some truth. All serve in their turn the great end,—the building up of human character, the making of each individual man, in reality what he is potentially, the child of God.

SOME startling facts come from Arizona regarding the special phase of the drink problem as presented to this territory. They are gleaned from the annual report of Gov. L. C. Hughes, whose wife is president of the territorial W. C. T. U. Drink, Indebtedness, Indians, are the three knots in the problem. The situation in brief is as follows: The Federal law known as the "Harrison Act of 1889," limits the indebtedness of all territories to a per centum upon certain taxable properties. Notwithstanding the above prohibition, several counties have exceeded the limit, and the Territory on the first of June last had a floating indebtedness of $170,523.60, issued in direct violation of the law. It is estimated that fifty per cent of the cost of maintaining the county and territorial governments comes from intemperance. As a result the territory finds itself in this dilemma: crime must be punished, and the insane cared for at the expense of violating the law which limits the indebtedness of the territory, or the courts must close, the inmates of the jails, the penitentiaries, and insane asylums be set at large or the cause of this extraordinary expense must be removed. Attention is also called to the policy being adopted of withdrawing the federal troops from Arizona, one result of such movement being that thirty-five thousand Indians and a legalized liquor traffic form an alarming combination of evil against safety and peace. The report states that during the last thirty years there has not been a single Apache Indian outbreak in Arizona which was not the result of intoxicating drink. If the government withdraws the troops, it should also protect these Indians from strong drink, thus insuring the people immunity from Indian outbreaks, consequent massacres and wanton destruction of property. While it is not in the power of the Federal Government to legislate against the traffic in the states, in the territories it has the power to say, "Thus far shalt thou come and no farther."

Did you ever watch the little birds toward sunset? All day long they have been hopping between nest and earth, happy anywhere. By and by the shadows begin to creep up. The ground is chilly and the birds seek the branches and the housetops. Higher the shadows climb. Higher flies the bird until at last he may be seen on the topmost branch where the good-night smile of the sun is resting, singing away as cheerily as ever. The sun sinks away and birdie's head is under his wing and he is off in sleepland till another sun-up. It makes me think of the Christian who, as the shadows rise, rises ever nearer to Christ, always above them, trustfully singing because he is in the light. When the great night of death comes he is "asleep in Jesus" and all is well.

If the human soul is unspeakably sacred, then all that lures that soul into brutality, all that cripples its progress toward God, all that cripples the state that would protect it from wrong and that robs and demoralizes the church that would instruct and inspire it, is the common enemy of God and man. This enemy I find in the drinking habits of society and in the despotism of the saloon power.—Dr. John Henry Barrows.

We stagger at the Word which says, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin," believing it to be impossible that the human heart can live and be sinless. Sin is the willful, intentional transgression of what a man believes to be the will of God, and when the soul has been born again, born into the love of God, its purpose is never again to willfully, intentionally transgress what it believes to be God's will for it. It is easy to follow the will of a human friend whom we love deeply, how much easier the will of Him who first loved us and who furnishes the power whereby we are to do His will.

I believe we are set in the midst of selfish people sometimes, for two lessons: 1. To learn thereby somewhat of our spirit, since our selfishness would be revealed to us because of theirs. 2. To learn how much human lives depend on each other and how careful we must be to hurt none as we may have been hurt. Indeed, the latter disposition is the only one I can make of most of the trials that meet me through others; I learn how not to do to others.

The following letter will interest many readers:

"DEAR WHITE RIBBON COMRADES:—As I hear it is reported in America that I have joined the Unitarian church or the Universalist church, I desire to say through these columns that I am a member of the Society of Friends, in which society I was born and in which society I expect to die. My faith can be summed up in 1 Tim. 3:16,—'And, without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness. God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory.' Yours faithfully,

"HANNAH WHITALL SMITH."

One of the most pitiful revelations of human nature was made by a great-hearted woman of wealth, who, on being asked to lend a thousand dollars to another lady who wished to use it in an enterprise for her own benefit, said, "Do you think if I lend her the money and she is unable to pay it, she will become my enemy?" This wealthy lady then went on to say that she had lent a great deal of money to good men and women, and when some of them were not able to return it at once, they began to be "out with her" as if she had done evil to them and not good. Could anything be a more painful commentary on human frailty?

In Nebraska a woman owns and personally operates a traveling steam threshing machine outfit. She goes about the country with it and makes her own contracts. There are three women pilots on the Mississippi river, all holding licenses. In Chicago a woman is an engineer of a steam laundry plant, having control of the large engine and considerable machinery. Another Chicago woman is engineer of the entire plant, engine, steam heat, elevator power and water system, in one of the sky-scraper buildings, and in Chicago a woman runs an elevator in a hotel. A woman is captain of a steamer on Puget Sound, and there are two women captains on steamboats on the Mississippi river, each holding a United States marine license as captain.

ON DUTY.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

THE TWENTY-FIRST ANNUAL CONVENTION

of the New Hampshire W. C. T. U. was held in Manchester, October 16, 17 and 18. The weather was delightful. There were one hundred and ten officers, superintendents and delegates present, besides many visitors.

The convention was called to order by our president, Miss C. R. Wendell, of Dover. Devotional exercises were led by Mrs. C. C. Fellows, of Center Sandwich. Much time was taken by the reading of papers by the superintendents, all reporting earnest work and full of helpful suggestions. Scientific temperance instruction by Miss Wendell, temperance literature, by Mrs. Bowers, purity in literature and art, by Mrs. Fellows, work among lumbermen, by Mrs. Loyne, hygiene, by Dr. Ellen Wallace.

Tuesday afternoon a service was held in memory of Mrs. C. E. Alber, recalling noble loving acts for the weak and homeless of Mercy Home, at the close of which our treasurer, Miss A. E. McIntire, announced the gift of four thousand dollars to the Home by William R. Putnam, executor of the estate of Mr. Jotham Hildreth, of Lyndeboro, N. H. The good news was unexpected, and all sang the doxology with hearts full of joy.

Tuesday evening after devotional exercises led by Rev. Mr. Sargent, of Claremont, and a warm address of welcome by our noble pioneer, Mrs. B. F. Kinsley, we listened to the annual address of our president, always uplifting, and report of the corresponding secretary, Miss C. E. Rowell, cheering as to gain of members and new unions, with faithful work all through the state.

Wednesday morning the convention, with all visitors, were furnished conveyance to Mercy Home and found it indeed the sheltering home for which we had worked and prayed so earnestly. The healthy, happy, bright faces of the inmates, the neat, orderly and skillful work in the laundry, kitchen and dining room were sufficient testimony to the patient, faithful instruction of the matrons, Mrs. Hatch and Miss Hurd, who have been in charge since the dedication of the Home nearly five years ago.

Wednesday afternoon we were cheered and entertained by a visit from members of the Wallace Juvenile Temple and L. T. L., of Manchester. The first is a Good Templars' organization that has had fifteen hundred children connected with it since its beginning.

Wednesday evening Mrs. Jeannette G. Hauser gave a delightful lecture on India, illustrated by living pictures in costumes representing twenty classes of the people. All declared it a most instructive lecture, and wished we could have this gifted lady (who has been a resident in India fifteen years) lecture in every county in the state.

Thursday morning twenty ladies (two from each county), were invited by Superintendent J. C. Ray to visit the State Industrial School. The perfect discipline, the homelike influence of Mr. and Mrs. Ray, and the teacher, Miss Ray, make it easy to believe what is stated as a fact, that eighty per cent of the inmates make good citizens. We saw over a hundred children in their labors, and heard them raise their voices in praise in the school-room. Mrs. Ellen Keith, of Worcester, Mass., gave a spirited talk in the interest of railroad men, and so enthused the audience that much more will be done in this department of work.

The election of officers brought a disappointment, as our faithful corresponding secretary, Miss Rowell, declined reëlection on account of overwork. Miss Clara Brown, of Manchester, was chosen to fill her place. Our efficient president, Miss C. R. Wendell, Mrs. C. M. Abbott, recording secretary, and Miss A. E. McIntire, were reëlected, for which blessings we returned thanks most heartily to our heavenly Father.

Mrs. H. B. L. Perkins was chosen delegate-at-large for the National Convention; other delegates are Mrs. H. D. Jones, Manchester; Mrs. J. W. Scribner, Concord; Mrs. G. W. Richardson, East Haverhill; Mrs. W. A. Loyne, Jefferson; Mrs. C. S. Mooes, Marlborough.

Thursday evening the state flag was presented to the New Hampton union for the largest per cent of gain in membership for the year, and Henniker L. T. L., the banner.

The address by that famous orator, Mrs. Clara Hoffman, state president of Missouri, "Our Legacies for the Future," was powerful and convincing, a fitting close to a convention unsurpassed for genial, hospitable entertainment, intellectual feasts and harmonious action.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

ANNUAL CONVENTION REPORTS.

The annual convention was held in the Sunday-school house (a large and beautiful new building) of the Calvary Baptist church, October 4 and 5; the weather was good, and the attendance large. The convention was called to order by the president, Mrs. M. E. Griffith. Devotional exercises followed, and the roll-call revealed the fact that fifty-one officers and delegates were present. Reports of superintendents were then called for:

Work Among Foreigners: Distributed six thousand pieces of reading matter.

Mothers' Meetings: Visits were made by district superintendent to various local unions, and to temperance tent; meetings held by unions, one hundred and sixty-three.

Rev. Dr. Greene, pastor of Calvary Baptist church, then delivered a decidedly interesting, instructive and eloquent address of welcome. In the opinion of Dr. Greene no one can overestimate the work of women in the church. In her response to the address of welcome Mrs. M. B. Platt expressed the thanks of the union for the welcome, and in the course of her remarks characterized the W. C. T. U. as God's weapon, brought forward for the destruction of the liquor traffic.

Juvenile Work then reported fifteen L. T. L's; membership, 8,787; money expended, $75.95. One Legion held an open air meeting in one of the parks, at which UNION SIGNALS were distributed.

At this juncture the president called for five minute addresses from the presidents of the unions. Mrs. M. E. Cohen, president of the Chapin union, Mrs. S. M. Wescott, president of West End union, and Mrs. T. A. Williams, president of Northwest union, all spoke briefly.

Rev. Mr. Foulk of the church of the United Brethren, spoke in commendation of the work of the union, and pledged his aid. "Nearer, My God, To Thee" was then sung, after which noonday prayer was conducted by Rev. Dr. Luther Wilson. Mrs. Jennie Bartlett, president of Capitol Hill union, spoke, the doxology was sung, and the meeting adjourned for luncheon.

At the afternoon session Mrs. S. D. La Fetra conducted a short devotional meeting, and the president's annual address was delivered. Mrs. Griffith then spoke at some length on the state of the union's affairs, defining the work of the past and outlining plans for the future. The reception to the city pastors, which followed, was a most pleasing event in the program.

The district corresponding secretary (Mrs. Hartsock) gave her report. Red-letter days and anniversaries have been observed; one of special mention was the Dow celebration, the largest, most successful and enthusiastic temperance meeting ever held in the District. We have had addresses from Dr. Beiler, vice chancellor of the American University; Miss De Broen, president W. C. T. U. of France; Mrs. Holbrook Smith, Mrs. Marian Baxter, Mrs. Matthews, of England; Mrs. Angie Newman, Mrs. Rice, Mrs. M. E. Griffith, Mrs. S. D. La Fetra, Mr. Luther Benson, Revs. Muir, Powers, Eldredge; Hon. Hiram Price, Dr. Dorman, Rev. Wm. Hubbard, Miss Pauline Leavens, Mrs. Sophia Grubb and Miss Frances Ensign.

One of the great needs of our work is permanent headquarters; we have commenced to raise a fund for the purpose. A committee of six gentlemen was appointed to aid us in this enterprise. There are twenty unions, membership, 670; departments of work, 17. The death angel has claimed a number of our members.

Our treasurer's report showed receipts to be $2,486.43; expended, $2,352.91.

Legislation and Petition: Although the Fifty-third Congress has not assisted the temperance reform by passing any of the bills before it, calculated to embarrass the liquor traffic in this District, it has not deprived us of any good already possessed. Many bills lie silent and unknown upon the shelves of the various committees to which they were referred; one of these was introduced by Mr. Kyle, and called for the exclusion of persons of intemperate habits from holding official position under the government. Could this bill be passed it would be a blessing to the whole country, especially to this District. We watched the bill faithfully, and even went so far as to engage ladies to speak in its favor as soon as it should be passed to the sub-committee; it never went any farther; the reason given in the committee-room was, "that it was obnoxious in military circles." We trust Senator Kyle will continue to introduce the bill until it becomes a law.

Bills for the abolition of the liquor traffic in this District were presented to the Senate by Mr. Peffer, of Kansas, and to the House by Mr. Morse, of Massachusetts. Similar bills have been introduced year after year, and our organization has labored ceaselessly for their passage. In congressional records petitions are now on file bearing more than ninety thousand names gathered by our rank and file, pleading for them. An amendment to the late tariff act extends the time that spirits may remain in bond to eight years, with a right to withhold taxes till the product is sold or the bonding period expires. This change is stated by the liquor trade to be worth to them one dollar and sixty-seven cents for every gallon they put in bond. A handsome compensation to the trade for the increased tax of twenty cents (from ninety cents to one dollar and ten cents per gallon).

Mrs. Woodbridge, National corresponding secretary, forwarded a document signed by the four general officers of every state union. It was a remonstrance against the government taxing whisky or receiving any revenue therefrom; this was presented to the Senate by Mr. Frye, of Maine, on the 14th of February, and may be called our valentine, as it was a beautiful document, handsomely engrossed upon satin. We have assisted the work of the National Reform Association by securing the signatures of our general officers in their petition for the acknowledgment of God in the Constitution of the United States; have circulated a petition addressed to the Senate Committee in charge of the Babcock amendment to the District Liquor Laws; went before committee on appropriations, who had spoken of an increase of wages for government charwomen, and a petition to which effect had been previously signed.

We assisted the press committee of the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends at Baltimore, by procuring the signatures of our general officers to their petition for the purity of the press of our land. To individual members of both House and Senate committees, arguments have been presented against statehood for Utah, and the free introduction of opium into the United States. Our petition to seat shop girls and female clerks in stores when not waiting on customers, went before both houses of Congress; have added to the value of the World's Petition by obtaining the official signatures of representatives of two organizations of women, namely the "Pythian Sisterhood" and the "Pythian Sisters." Thirty thousand women are represented by these signatures. Supreme Chancellor Blackwell of the Knights of Pythias, signed his name as an endorser.

High license now prevails in this District, the fee for keeping a bar-room is $400 per year: any two commissioners can do business as an excise board. We were present one day when the board was at its work; in an hour and fifteen minutes seventy-eight licenses were granted and five rejected. One clause in the law excludes liquor selling within four hundred feet of a school-house or church, yet this city presents the spectacle of scores of saloons within these limits, running in defiance of law. The liquor traffic refuses to be regulated as stoutly as it does to be prohibited.

Prison and Jail Work: Jail, almshouse, hospitals, woman's workhouse have been visited; papers distributed; magazines, bulletins and leaflets, Testaments, picture cards, books and papers were given at the almshouse to those who could not read; envelopes with paper given at the jail; crackers, fruit and sugar to inmates in almshouse and hospitals; cards written, Bible read to the blind and families visited; visited the attorney-general, seeking to have women prisoners sent to a woman's reformatory, either at Sherborn, Mass., or to Indianapolis, feeling confident that there would be better results from their incarceration in these homes than at Albany, where there are both men and women; received no encouragement, several reasons being given why it could not be done. The warden of the jail coincided with our view of the case. Many of the prisoners, as well as the inmates of the almshouse and hospitals, express their gratitude for the Christian help and uplift they have received; for the broader outlook and that life now means more than it ever did before. They look eagerly for the visits and wish there could be more. One spoke of the prayers of a Christian mother for him, another, that he had learned to love his Bible and asked for the prayers of Christians.

On the second day of the convention, Mrs. M. E. Griffith in the chair, Mrs. S. L. Beiler led the devotional exercises. The following superintendents reported:

Unfermented Wine: About seventy churches use the fermented wine at the Lord's table, about fifty the unfermented; six visits made, a number of letters and postals written; distributed about 170 pages of literature.

Temperance Literature: 173,788 pages distributed in barber shops, engine houses, to railroad gatemen and other employés, at public meetings, in Sunday-schools, churches, from house to house and by mail; in almost every imaginable way, we have sought to reach the people with our printed pages. The West End Union distributed the most during the year, Mrs. R. W. Fernandez, superintendent. Over fifty dollars were distributed for district work, much in local unions which has not been reported. More systematic work has been done than ever before; over five thousand pages were distributed at Dow meeting.

Flower Missions: Sick visited in homes and hospitals; money expended, $110.57; bouquets, 1,469; literature, 7,564; flowers for funerals, 7 pieces; 20 signed the pledge; Bibles given, 16; Testaments, 1; have distributed fruit and delicacies; homes for the aged visited, also jail; clothing given to the poor, large number of visits made to the same; pulpits supplied with flowers, and potted plants taken to hospitals.

The Rev. Oliver Brown, pastor Foundry M. E. church, was introduced and made an interesting congratulatory address.

The recommendation of the committee on the revision of the constitution that in article 5 of the constitution the word "women" be used in place of the word "ladies" was agreed to. A proposition to change the annual dues from one dollar to sixty cents was unanimously defeated. A new article was added to the constitution, providing for a contingent fund.

The election of officers and delegates to the National Convention was as follows: President, Mrs. M. E. Griffith; corresponding secretary, Miss L. S. Wrightman; recording secretary, Mrs. Emma Shelton; treasurer, Mrs. S. M. Westcott; delegates, Mrs. S. A. Williams; alternate, Mrs. S. L. Beiler; Mrs. S. D. La Fetra, alternate, Mrs. Alfred Wood. Rev. J. J. Muir led the noontide hour of prayer.

Mrs. J. H. Robinson conducted the afternoon devotional exercises; Master Ernest Fisher gave a most excellent recitation, after which the report of

Y. W. C. T. U. was given; active membership, 131, and honorary, 83; Crusader Y has devoted itself to flower mission work and prayer-meetings. First Baptist has been pledging the young men, have obtained thirty-eight signatures to same, also working as the temperance committee for the Christian Endeavor Society. In Vermont avenue Y, flower mission work is prosecuted vigorously. West End Y has done largely social work.

Evangelistic: One hundred and eighty Bible readings given, including prayer services; 2,000 pages literature distributed; $119 beside the $60, "citizens' relief fund" given to the poor; provision and clothing given to Willow Tree Alley Mission," "Central Union Mission" and "Deaconess Home"; twenty-five pounds groceries given to "Central Union Mission" for a Sunday morning breakfast; many sick ministered to; souls pointed to the Lamb of God; the half cannot be told. Mrs. R. F. Brown, missionary for Chapin union, has done a noble and self-sacrificing work in Willow Tree Alley, among both colored and white; the mission house in that locality is leaven that is constantly telling for the betterment of humanity.

THE ANNUAL GATHERING.

Five years ago the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of this territory came into existence in Guthrie, then a town of tents and shacks; this year the union gathered in the place of its birth. The changes wrought were marvelous: Comfortable homes, many of them surrounded by all the luxuries of modern life; large and commodious school-houses, handsome churches, and the people hospitable, intelligent and courteous. It seemed wonderful that a bleak prairie could so soon be made to "blossom as the rose." The first session was called to order by the president, Mrs. M. H. Switzer. Mrs. Nellie Sheplar led in devotional reading and singing. Governor Renfrow's name was upon the program to give an address of welcome in behalf of the territory, but like the governor of Massachusetts when invited to welcome the National to the Hub, went hunting. We wondered if the governor was hunting stronger temperance principles than the W. C. T. U. could furnish!

Judge Foster took the Governor's place, saying he had welcomed the representatives of five other societies to the city within a year, but it was "more honor to say welcome to this little Spartan band of temperance women than all the others." Mrs. Jennie S. Platt, president of Guthrie union, welcomed us in verse to the homes of Guthrie. Mrs. Bogers spoke in behalf of the churches, especially the Christian church, in which we were holding our sessions. The pastor of this church, and husband of Mrs. Bogers, always wears the white ribbon. Mrs. S. F. Grubb and your correspondent replied to these welcomes.

During the sessions able and thoughtful papers were read upon the following subjects: "Hindrances to Reform," Mrs. O. P. Light; "Social Purity," Mrs. Clara L. Kens; "Parliamentary Drill," Mrs. M. L. Storm; "Peace and Arbitration," Mrs. Irene B. Hester. The audiences were charmed with two recitations, one by Mrs. Baker, and one by Miss Lonoko, both of Guthrie. Mrs. Grubb gave a Bible reading that lifted souls to a higher spiritual plane. She also gave a parliamentary drill; after taking us through various steps, she asked some one to make a motion that we could lay it upon the table. A quick-witted member moved "that Missouri continue to send us good Grubb." One evening session was given to Mrs. Grubb to deliver her lecture, "The Gate Keepers of our Nation." The church was packed and the hearty applause and warm encoring told that sentiment was made for the temperance reform.

The reports of district presidents were very encouraging. The superintendents that reported work done showed an aggressive spirit in their departments. The report of the corresponding secretary was very acceptable to the convention. Though we had not had a plethoric purse during the year the treasurer was able to settle all bills with a small balance in the treasury.

The last evening the church was filled with listeners to the reading of the president's annual message, a straight, well-balanced compendium of suggestions and information, showing her heart all aglow with zeal for the cause, that kindled a new interest in other souls. The same evening Mrs. Jennie S. Platt gave an original poem on "Prohibition." Leading pastors attended almost every session of the convention.

The result of the election of officers was the reëlection of the old officers, Mrs. M. H. Switzer, president; Mrs. M. L. Storm, secretary; Mrs. O. P. Light, treasurer.

A summary of the resolutions passed shows an indorsement of the new department of Y. P. S. C. E., called Christian Citizenship, and that the franchise department be pushed with renewed energy, and women be urged to use the school franchise, which they already possessed; that the members feel more responsibility in paying dues and wearing the white ribbon; that our work become more widely known through the press, also as an organization of Christian workers we deprecate and strongly condemn lynch law and that offenders against law ought to be punished by due process of law and not by mob violence. We adopted a resolution to circulate a petition asking the legislature to pass a law forbidding the sale of cigarettes in the territory. Our thanks to the good people of Guthrie were sincere, but to none did we feel that we owed a greater debt of gratitude than the Mozart Club, which rendered choice music at the evening sessions.

The crowning act of the convention was that a petition be circulated throughout the territory asking the incoming legislature to pass a prohibitory law. The hearts of the members of the convention danced with joy when a telegram was read from the W. C. T. U. of Massachusetts, assembled in convention at the same dates as Oklahoma. The telegram read as follows: "Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid; neither be thou dismayed; for the Lord thy God is with thee, whithersoever thou goest." The reply sent was taken from Isaiah 54: 17. A letter was received from the corresponding secretary of the National W. C. T. U., Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge.

NEW MEXICO.

TEMPERANCE STRAWS.

The women of Hillsborough, N. M., in turning the temperance field-glass upon their immediate environments, decided that a W. C. T. U. was needed; accordingly they organized themselves into a local auxiliary, with Mrs. T. R. Fisk president, and Mrs. Story secretary. Mrs. Borden sent them literature, advices, etc., and every indication is that the ladies of Hillsborough will make a success of their chosen line of effort—work among the young people.

The Albuquerque union, wide awake as usual, opened an attractive booth at the local fair, where they provided ice water in abundance for the thirsty, "hot shot" temperance literature for the uninformed on temperance topics, buttonhole bouquets for the æsthetic, and those inclined to invest small sums in flowers for the sake of the temperance cause, and easy chairs for the weary, who were very glad to remain awhile in the genial presence of Mrs. Granger, the superintendent of fair work. Two more little waifs have been taken from the Children's Home and placed in permanent Christian homes.

Mrs. M. P. Stamm, of Albuquerque, while visiting in Santa Fé last summer, found it impossible to give herself up entirely to recreation. Finding the work in a languishing condition, she rolled up her temperance sleeves and reorganized the women into a union which promises well for the future of that historic little city.

A large number of strangers are moving into the railroad and mining towns to take the place of employés who leave on account of the late strike. This will necessitate the complete reorganization of many unions. While this breaking up of organizations retards the work in New Mexico, we can but hope that those who go to other sections of the country will not only carry the temperance sentiment with them, but be the means of spreading the glad news that temperance is the strong Samson which sometime will pull down the temple of unrighteousness.

Our never-tiring president, Mrs. Borden, recently lectured in the northern part of the territory. In her audience were several young men (six, I believe) who came at the close of the address, for pledge-cards, saying, "We never before saw the temperance question in that light." The influence of this temperance lecture will, doubtless, in its far-reaching results, bring many back to lives of sobriety, and these in turn rescue other lost ones who, too often, in this territory, are

"Away on the mountains so bleak and bare Away from the tender Shepherd's care."

CONNECTICUT.

NOTES OF THE GOOD WORK.

The encouraging word comes from the Loyal Temperance Legion of Pawcatuck that five members of the L. T. L. have been present at every weekly meeting of the Legion since its organization October 1, 1892. When we consider that this means eighty weeks without a single absence, through storm and shine, the fact becomes a very impressive one. The average attendance of the pupils of this Legion for the month of March was ninety-one, which shows a continued and growing interest, it being a little higher average than that of any other month.

The Rockfall union, feeling the need of better police protection at the railroad station, sent a petition to the proper authorities asking for the same. It in no way reflected on the order in the station, which is attended to by the agent in an excellent manner. They have also issued a petition to manufacturers asking them not to employ in their factories any men who are addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors.

Meriden sent a letter to your reporter soon after the time of the state fair, and from it these interesting items are gleaned: As usual the W. C. T. U. had a tent on the grounds and served meals at fair rates, offering good food and pleasant entertainment for all. The president prepared some special program of a temperance nature to attract the people on Children's Day. Mrs. C. H. Fitz Gerald gave one of her interesting talks. Rev. J. H. James also spoke, giving an illustrated address, showing the danger of alcoholic drinks on the system. Thursday there was a grand rally of all the unions, and the speakers were Hon. DeWitt C. Pond, the Prohibition candidate for governor of Connecticut, Rev. Kerr, of Yale University, Rev. Fennell, and Mr. and Mrs. Beveridge sang throughout the day. It was temperance day and attractions were of sufficient interest to draw large crowds.

The union is working to erect a fine drinking fountain which would have been in position before this only that the many repairs upon the roadways have hindered the progress of the work, and it is probable that it will not be placed until spring. It will be not only useful, but a benefit to the city as well. It is to cost a thousand dollars, and will be beautiful in finish; there is to be an iron canopy to inclose the fountain which is to be the gift of the ex-mayors of the city. Miss Willard passed through the city en route for Boston, when she first returned from England, and was given quite an ovation. The local president and secretary met her in New Haven, and when the train arrived at the Meriden depot quite a delegation was in waiting. W. C. T. U. ladies, members of the L. T. L., representatives of the local Salvation Army, the T. A. B. society and others were prepared to greet the distinguished and beloved leader of the temperance women. Before the train came to a standstill the assembled company united in singing the grand old national hymn, America, with an accompaniment on the cornet. Miss Willard with her secretary and Mrs. Holmes stood on the platform of the car and Mrs. Holmes called for three cheers, which were given with enthusiasm; a basket of flowers was presented to Miss Willard and one to Miss Gordon.

The union in Terryville was organized April 1, 1893, and it now has superintendents of press work, Sabbath observance, social purity, scientific temperance instruction, distribution of literature and juvenile work. A flourishing L. T. L. meeting every two weeks, with a very active, earnest leader, has done much charity work; has held several public meetings and is much interested.

The law for temperance teaching in the schools is being faithfully carried out and the union has subscribed for copies of a monthly paper for each teacher. A rack is placed in the railway station and kept filled. Tracts have been distributed relating to Sabbath observance, tobacco and other subjects. Two public meetings in the town hall addressed by Mrs. J. K. Barney and Miss Elizabeth Yates, and a public reception have been held. The union is filling a mite-box to be sent to the Temple. It numbered ten at first and has doubled the membership since.

The annual convention of the NEW LONDON COUNTY W. C. T. U. was held at Colchester. In spite of a heavy rainstorm there were thirty-eight delegates and forty visitors present. The meetings were held in the Congregational church, which was beautifully decorated with flowers, banners and the portrait of our chieftain, Frances E. Willard. Our state president, Mrs. Forbes, and Mrs. Partridge, state recording secretary, were present. After the devotional exercises, conducted by Mrs. H. N. Brown, of Norwich, county president, Mrs. S. E. Dennison, briefly addressed the convention, and Mrs. J. S. Bell, president of the Colchester union, made the address of welcome in the most hospitable manner.

The response was ably made by Mrs. S. E. Gates, of the Stonington union. A message of greeting was sent to the Litchfield county convention. The roll call showed that eleven W's and one Y union were represented. There were reports from twelve unions, which showed a good degree of interest all along the line, notably in those unions where weekly meetings were regularly held. Especial mention might be made of the New London and Pawcatuck unions. The noontide hour of prayer was led by Mrs. Forbes. A collation was bountifully served by the ladies of Colchester in the chapel adjoining the church.

At the opening of the afternoon meeting Mrs. J. K. Barney, National superintendent of prison and jail work, gave a Bible reading from the 116th Psalm. Mrs. S. E. Gates gave an excellent address on "Relation of the W. C. T. U. to the Church," heartily indorsed by all. Mrs. Fenner made an able and forcible address on suffrage. The treasurer, Miss C. B. Watson, of New London, showed a balance on hand after all bills were paid. Mrs. C. B. Forbes spoke in the interest of the white ribbon banner and of scientific temperance instruction, urging the women to avail themselves of the privilege to attend and vote in the coming school elections. A telegram of greeting was received from the Litchfield county convention. Ten minute speeches were made by the resident pastors. The meeting adjourned at five o'clock and supper was served in the chapel.

Mrs. Barney made the evening address, which was deeply impressive. The Beveridges furnished the music for the evening and as usual delighted every one. Before adjourning the convention accepted the invitation to hold its next semi-annual meeting in the city of New London.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

THE first public lecture of Miss Ackermann in Chicago will be given at the Young Men's Christian Association Auditorium, Wednesday evening, November 21. During its delivery, six young ladies and six young gentlemen will appear on the platform attired in the beautiful and curious costumes of the far East, to illustrate the lecturer's discourse.

AT the recent state convention an adjourned session of Missouri legislature was held (members all women) to consider a bill giving school franchise to the men of Missouri. Mrs. Hoffman eloquently pleaded the cause of the men. After much debate the bill carried. The entertainment was most unique, brimful of good points, and netted the state union a good sum, for which thanks must be given Mrs. E. B. Ingalls, National superintendent of the department of narcotics, who worked the whole thing up and made it a perfect success.

"ECHOES of the White City—the Midway," is the title of the gigantic public entertainment now taking place in Battery D and 2d Regiment Armory, Chicago, under the auspices of the Chicago Central W. C. T. U. and the managers of the Chicago Foundlings' Home. Mrs. Matilda B. Carse is chairman of the executive committee, Mrs. Lyman J. Gage, treasurer, and two hundred of Chicago's leading women are on the list of patronesses. Mrs. Cora Scott Pond-Pope is the manager; the electrical effects are in charge of Mr. R. H. Pierce, chief electrical engineer of the World's Columbian Exposition; a notable scenic artist is employed and every means utilized to make the affair, which will continue a fortnight, one of the finest ever given in the World's Fair city.

Treasurer's Corner.

The self-denial funds are still coming in and will be acknowledged and receipted for in due time. These very busy days of preparation for Convention, and the death of our dear Mrs. Woodbridge have delayed correspondence somewhat, but we hope to catch up before Convention.

LECTURE BUREAU.

An open letter to the delegates:

I was much grieved that the speakers' lecture bureau of our society was abolished at the last convention when it was just getting fairly under way. In England the speakers' bureau is a great success, and I asked Mrs. H. J. Osborn, its capable manager, to give me some points, which are embodied in the following interview. I commend a careful study of every point made by this thoroughly practical business woman to each country in which our society is organized, feeling that great good will result from the establishment of such a bureau not only in each nation, but, if practicable, with subdivisions in each state and province.

Yours for the spoken word,
FRANCES E. WILLARD.

INTERVIEW.

'How did your speakers' bureau originate?"

"It was one of the 'new departures' which followed the adoption by the National British Women's Temperance Association of Lady Henry Somerset's wider policy. I undertook to organize this part of the work at Lady Henry's request, soon after the council meeting last year, in connection with the organization department, of which she was then the superintendent. The Bureau has since grown so much that it has now been made a department of itself."

"How did you begin?"

"The idea was to bring branches needing speakers, and those able and willing to speak, into contact, and also to supply the right speaker according to the needs of each case. The first step was to obtain lists of speakers. This was done in the first instance from amongst the members of the National Executive, and others were drawn in from time to time, additions being made whenever the opportunity occurred."

"How many speakers have you?"

"Our lists now contain the names of nearly one hundred speakers, resident in London and all parts of the country."

"Are any fees paid?"

"We have both voluntary and paid speakers. The voluntary ones speak in the interests of the department, and for their services a money contribution, in addition to traveling expenses, is generally asked. Some of these are as well or better worth payment than those who take a fee, so that our system is fair to the paid speakers."

"What about the rates of payment?"

"Those who take payment themselves decide the amount of their fees, and they return to the bureau a percentage towards working expenses. The speakers' charges vary a good deal, and we are thus able to suit the needs of all."

"Do you ever send out speakers free?"

"Yes, of course, in some cases of new or weak branches we provide speakers quite free."

"You select the speaker according to the requirements of particular cases?"

"Yes. By means of forms filled up by the speakers we are in possession of particulars as to subjects, kind of meetings for which speakers are suited, and other points which the branches could not ascertain for themselves."

"And how has the work progressed?"

"Last year (that is, in ten months ending at the annual council in May), the bureau correspondence in and out totalled 5,490 communications. In the same period 350 meetings were addressed by the speakers independent of the president's meetings."

"What have been the monetary results?"

"The ten months' working gave the association a profit of £101 14s. 9d., which helped the work of forming new branches. The most rigid economy is necessary, however, to do this, even in regard to the use of postage stamps."

"And apart from the question of money?"

"The result of the work has been most encouraging, and many letters have been received showing that it has been a great help to the branches."

"What do you consider the secret of success?"

"The secret of the success is METHOD. The first necessity for such a work is to have it in the hands of a practical, business-like woman."

CONVENTION ECHOES.

DELEGATES' seats were well filled at the opening session.

EXTRA copies of the program can be procured for ten cents each from Mrs. Barker.

DUES to the amount of $14,637.65 were received from State W. C. T. Unions in 1894, a slight increase over last year.

THIS is our ninth volume of the DAILY UNION SIGNAL. It is the first daily ever published at a convention in this city.

ABOUT 100 old Crusaders and notable visitors occupied the raised seats reserved for them at the rear of the platform this morning.

OUR president's annual address, a neat pamphlet of over 100 pages is presented to the delegates as her birthday gift to the majority convention.

TWENTY-NINE States have increased their membership this year; eighteen of them, Western States. We are "growing up with the country."

MISS WILLARD'S address was both delivered and received with marked tokens of emotion. This rose to its highest pitch in her reference to Mrs. Woodbridge and her quotation of Tennyson's matchless lines: "Follow the gleam."

Y CONFERENCES, in charge of Mrs. Frances Barnes, General Secretary, are held each day from 6:15 to 7:15 p. m., in the rear basement room of the Hall. Everybody interested in the advancement of our work among young women is earnestly invited.

MRS. ALICE J. HARRIS, the White Ribbon prima donna, is at her post as in other years. The swing of her ribbon-tipped baton and the splendid sweep of her marvelous voice could not fail to inspire anybody; but to White Ribboners, who count her "one of us," the inspiration is doubly assured.

OUR National treasurer's accounts show that while there has been a slight falling off in the dues of three of our largest States, New York, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, another large State, Illinois, shows an increase of $64, and the increased amounts sent by other states bring the total $32 above last year.

NEW State presidents whom we greet at the majority Convention are: Mrs. Mary E. Cartland, North Carolina; Mrs. Margaret A. Watts, Kentucky; Mrs. Mary Halsup, Maryland; Mrs. Susanna M. D. Fry, Minnesota; Mrs. Wheeler, Montana; Mrs. S. M. Walker, Nebraska; Mrs. Delle C. H. Cox, East Washington.

W. T. P. A. publications, a fine array, and presided over by Misses Addie Austin, Clara Stephens and Nannie Thomas, are to be found in room B, at the right of the platform. We are proud of the products of our publishing association, and the leaves that are for "the healing of the nations" will always be provided while our presses run.

DURING her visit to the recent South Dakota State Convention, our late National Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. Woodbridge, gave three addresses, besides conducting a question box and aiding the workers at their many conferences. Within a month, the eloquent tongue, the active brain and kindly heart were still in the eternal sleep.

SOUTH DAKOTA has widened its boundaries by resolving during the coming year to advance the organization of Y unions, "as our young women are greatly needed in our work, both as present aid and future reinforcement."

DURING two years of earnest labor in prosecution of the work of the Ship Loan Libraries in New York and Brooklyn, Mrs. Sarah A. McClees, national superintendent of work among soldiers and sailors, has placed temperance books on board thirty ships, including several war cruisers and Lieutenant Peary's Arctic vessel.

NOON lunches are served in the front basement room of Music Hall immediately at close of convention. The catering has been placed in the efficient hands of the Ladies' Aid Society, Jennings Avenue M. E. Church, of which Mrs. Lewis Walter is president. The charge is 10 cents to the delegates and the menu includes two kinds each of meat, bread and cake, pickles, tea and coffee, fruit. The proceeds are for the benefit of the society.

FOR the first time in 13 years, the Daniel Webster, of the W. C. T. U., Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, president of Michigan., is absent from Convention on account of ill-health. The executive committee thoughtfully sent telegram and flowers, and provided our shut-in leader with a case containing Convention programs and copies of the reports in order that she may closely follow the Convention numbers and be with us in spirit.

A LARGE attendance was present at the opening prayer service in the chapel of the M. E. Church, corner Euclid avenue and Erie street. Mrs. Anna Hammer, president of Pennsylvania, led in the devotional services, taking for the Scripture lesson, the 23d Psalm. Mrs. W. T. Smith, Cleveland's oldest Crusader, led in earnest prayer as did Mrs. Mary Ingham, of Cleveland, Mrs. Denman, of New Jersey, and many others, for the overthrow of the liquor traffic and blessings upon this convention.

THE young white-ribboners of the country were more than rejoiced at the success of the initial social gathering of the Convention—the reception last evening. So great was the crowd that many could not obtain admittance. The large basement room in Music Hall looked very inviting with its bright decorations of white and yellow, its furniture, shaded lamps, palms, and more than all, the myriads of bright upturned faces of old and young. Honorary members were out in full force. Bright addresses, music, refreshment, and sociability made the occasion a most happy introduction to the events of the week.

THE Board of Superintendents held very interesting sessions in Room A, The Hollenden, both morning and afternoon of Thursday, Nov. 15, while an evening session was held in the room occupied during the day by the Executive Board.

A larger proportion of the superintendents was present at roll call than on the first day of any previous convention. The time was chiefly occupied by the consideration and discussion of an able paper presented by the chairman of the board, Mrs. M. F. Lovell, on The Status of the National Superintendent. This paper, by vote of the superintendents and consent of the executive, is to be presented before a joint meeting of the two bodies at the close of to-day's session.

OUR beautiful convention program is worthy more than passing notice. The cover page is a significant illustration of our work, and especially befits the location of this year's gathering and our "majority convention." The group of "first Crusaders" kneeling before the dram shop amid the jeers of the men and the Crusade church are contrasted with the central view of Willard Hall, and woven into the design is our national motto: "For God, and Home and Native Land." The program is interleaved with fine portraits of our leaders, the three "Mothers" and of the departed one to whose careful thought and painstaking, every page is a memorial. The texts are selected with peculiar aptness, but most beautiful of all is the added quotation from Mrs. Lathrap on the memorial page, placed there after the busy brain which planned the pages was forever at rest.

CLEVELAND.

ITS GROWTH AND COMMERCE.

The story of the growth of the City of Cleveland, a review of the incidents and causes which have brought into existence the noble Ohio metropolis would be but a repetition of those which have led to the peopling of the entire United States. From the wildernesses of a continent, the century has brought by magic, thousands of populous towns and villages, cultivated areas and teeming great cities, and Cleveland stands among the fairest of the new world's metropolitan monuments to man's energy, foresight and courage.

It is nearly one hundred years (a centennial which the Forest City will celebrate in '96) since General Moses Cleaveland followed a party of fifty surveyors who under contract with the Connecticut Land Company were surveying the immense tract of land, three and one-half million of acres in extent, which had been ceded by the government to that State as its portion of the public domain—the Western Reserve.

A New Hampshire farmer, afterward Judge James Kingsbury, with wife and family, whose experiences read like a story of adventure, was induced by General Cleaveland to locate on the spot (which afterwards bore the name of the latter) and thus became the first white settler in Cleveland. It is related of him that when Commodore Perry put in at the village of Cleveland to purchase stores for his fleet, just before the "famous victory" in Lake Erie that Judge Kingsbury, then an old man of 80, went aboard the Commodore's vessel. "Oh, Judge, said the commander," "what would you do if the enemy should heave in sight while you are aboard?" "Do, sir?" exclaimed the venerable pioneer, all afire, "I'd stand here and fight with the best of you!"

The same staunchness of purpose, fidelity to the public interest, and a long-minded and large-hearted liberality have characterized the later citizens of Cleveland, scores of whom have never failed to respond when questions concerning the public weal were to be acted upon, and who have counted no expenditure too great which would benefit their city.

Obedience to the apostolic injunction to "hold fast that which is good" is a civic characteristic manifested in the fact that Cleveland street names and locations are identical with those on the first map issued in October, 1796. Public Square, the well known park in the heart of the city, was laid out by the original surveyors. Superior street, surveyed when land was one dollar an acre, is 132 feet wide.

"There is a tide in the affairs of men, which taken at the flood leads on to fortune." It was the foresight and sagacity of Cleveland's own citizens which turned the tide of commerce in their favor, and the many miles of busy river and lake front testify to their diligence and industry. The city's importance as a great manufacturing center was established forty years ago, when these far-seeing, thoughtful citizens studying the map were struck with the strategic position of their city—midway between the coal fields of Ohio and Pennsylvania, and the iron mines of Lake Superior, they brought the two together by vessel and rail, turned them into the finished products, thus establishing Cleveland as an iron center and its commercial importance for all time.

Ship and lumber yards, planing and flouring mills iron foundries and factories, oil and chemical works, brick yards, etc., are some of the industries with which Cleveland teems to-day, which accrue to its wealth and importance, and have grown with the city's growth. The Standard Oil Company's great works, covering several acres at the mouth of Kingsbury Run, started with a capital of $20,000, now supplies the refined oil market of the world. The Cleveland Rolling Mill has an output of twenty-five million dollars' worth of products each year. The city's shipbuilding interests are second only to those of the famous ship yards at Clyde, Scotland. Its manufactures give it fourth place in the Union.

It is claimed that not only wealthy men own their homes, but that more workingmen are their own landlords here than in any other city of the Union.

Summing up the history of Cleveland and reviewing its splendid growth as a municipality, a discerning writer has said: "Many other places have had the same natural advantages but very few have had such men." Which, of course, means women, too!

NATIONAL WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

TWENTY-FIRST ANNUAL CONVENTION.

DOAN'S MUSIC HALL, CLEVELAND, O., Nov. 16, 1894.

"We are twenty-one to-day," sang the old Crusaders in their hearts as they wended their way to the conventional hall and took their seats one hundred strong upon the capacious platform. It was clearly evident that this was to be a crusader's anniversary throughout. Every delegate felt strengthened and uplifted as she gazed into the white crowned faces of the "women who dared" in 1873.

The hall had been effectively embelished with decorations emblematic of our work. In the rear of the extensive platform the white flutings and yellow draperies blended most pleasingly the significant colors of temperance and equal suffrage. Above the organ on a background of white gleamed the national W. C. T. U. banner, and just below were the letters W. C. T. U. in white on a yellow background. The same colors graced the lower balcony while the upper was arrayed in the national hues. Banners of every sort hung from pillar and post, prominent among the quaint World's Fair gonfalons illustrative of the World's and National W. C. T. U. and our departments of work. A fine picture of our late secretary, Mrs. Woodbridge, stood upon the platform, and over it was placed a beautiful wreath of ivy leaves from vines planted by herself at her Ravenna home.

The Convention was called to order a few minutes after half past nine o'clock by the President, Miss Willard.

THE CHAIRMAN: Seven raps, (of the gavel) the golden number of gratitude and love and hope. Will the convention come to order as soon as possible, please. You will say that it was not called to order on the moment; that was only because there were so many in the aisles. Please get your seats as soon as you can and we will proceed with the opening exercises.

I take in my hand reverently the Crusade Bible and ask our blessed Mothers Thompson and Stewart and our dear Mrs. Monroe, President of Ohio, and Rev. Henrietta Moore, one of the leaders of the Crusade to come forward and we will read the Crusade Psalm and you will give the responses.

The Crusade Psalm was then read most effectively by the president and the two beloved Ohio "mothers."

One of our Crusade hymns, "Rock of Ages," was sung by the audience, Mrs. Alice J. Harris leading.

Prayer was offered by Rev. Francis E. Townsley.

THE CHAIRMAN: "And, oh for the touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still." For fifteen years when we came to the next item of the programme that gracious, matronly motherly presence, was just here, ready, cheery, smiling, resourceful. How she did look forward to this time; how she worked for it; how happy she was over it! I used to get a letter from her every day and sometimes two and sometimes three, and no expression was more frequent on her lips than the one that is most frequent in the Crusade Psalm, "Praise the Lord." She would tell me that such a woman was going to come; she would tell me that such a plan we had made to enrich the convention had promised completion; she would tell me how earnestly and capably the women were working in Cleveland and thee she would put at the end of the sentence, "Praise the Lord." She is not with us.

Our Mary Woodbridge. There is her genial pictured face, and those sweet emblems (the wreath over her picture) of nature were first planted by her hand, the ivy and the myrtle from her home not far from here brought by loved ones nearest her at our request, that something of the old life and the old happy times might bind us to that honored friend. I can but think she is with us in spirit. You know it says in the old hymn, "Unperceived they mix with the throng." There is a great W. C. T. U. that has passed up into heaven. It can but be they know about us and are glad.

Closely associated with Mary Woodbridge was her dear friend and dear yoke-fellow, our pioneer present from the old prohibition State of Maine. I know it is a pitiful duty that comes to her this morning to call the roll of officers, vice-presidents, superintendents, organizers, evangelists and ex officio members.

Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens then called the roll of officers and delegates.

The minutes of the Executive Committee of Wednesday, November 14th, were read by Mrs. Stevens. Consent was given that action be taken upon the minutes of the several sessions separately. A vote was then taken on the adoption of the minutes of Wednesday and the same were then adopted. The minutes of the Thursday morning session were then read and adopted as read.

The minutes of the Thursday afternoon session were then read, and the same were accepted with the exception of a clause relating to the appointment of a vice-president at large, the consideration of which was made a special order for ten o'clock, Saturday morning.

The following resolution was adopted on motion of Mrs. Lovell, of Pennsylvania:

That the presentation of department work shall, as printed on the programme, immediately follow the reports of the general officers without interruption, except such ordinary routine business as accompanies the opening and closing of the sessions of the convention and also with the exception of the special order for ten o'clock tomorrow morning, and that the same order including the cessation of the passing of pages is to be continued as during the reading of the president's address. This was followed by a motion to the effect that all business be suspended and perfect quiet maintained during the reading of the president's address.

Mrs. Alice Harris asked the convention to join in singing the following song, written for the occasion, which was done with great heartiness.

WELCOME, CHIEFTAIN, WELCOME.

(Tune; "Onward, Christain Soldiers.")

BY KATHARINE LENTE STEVENSON.

Welcome, Chieftain, welcome,
Welcome home once more;
Welcome to our hearth-fires,
To Columbia's shore;
Welcome to our gladness,
Welcome to our grief;
Welcome to Convention;
Hail, beloved Chief.

CHORUS: Welcome, Chieftain, welcome,
Welcome home once more;
All hearts bid you welcome
To your native shore.

Oh, the days were lonely
With you far away,
Brighter gleams this morning—
Fairer smiles to-day;
Though one chair is vacant,
Hushed one voice so dear,
Still, our faith triumphant
Sees her with us here.

CHORUS: Welcome, Chieftain, welcome,
Saints gone on before
Join us in your welcome
To your native shore.

Onward, Chieftain, onward,
God's voice calls today;
Faint we not nor falter,
But that voice obey;
Greater heights gleam o'er us,
Deeper depths beneath;
Onward, we will follow
Where thou lead'st, our Chief.

CHORUS: Welcome, Chieftain, welcome,
Welcome home today;
Onward, God's voice calls us,
Onward, to the fray.

THE CHAIRMAN:—Dear ones, I did not expect that. I did not know about it. I am a hard woman to surprise, because so many kind things have been done, but I was surprised and very much touched. I had asked that we sing before I spoke, to give me a little send off of inspiration, "Bands of Ribbons White Around the World, Around the World." I thank you very much, that you have welcomed and cheered me so kindly, and I hope you will lift up your hearts to God for me while I try to speak.

My annual address will be in the hands of every delegate before we adjourn, just as the report of every superintendent is already in print, and of the corresponding secretary and of the treasurer, because we think our delegates look over things more intelligently when they have the printed page, and I wish to give as a little token to every delegate a copy of this address. I shall read some things from it, and some things that are not in it, just as it happens to strike me.

As we came along this morning I wonder if it did not seem a marvel to you as you saw the quiet gentle footsteps, as you noticed the womanly figures and they were all filing—filing in that wonderfully significant procession that began with the crusades, and I did not wonder as I looked at them that the liquor dealers of Ohio who ought to know what they are talking about concerning the crusaders—that liquor dealers of Ohio in their recent annual meeting in Cincinnati. passed a resolution, saying: "Our only enemy is the W. C. T. U." And as we passed along I said in my heart: "Here they go, the sober, second thought of the crusade, and the procession to our twenty-first convention is a part of the funeral procession of the liquor traffic that will never cease to move.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL ADDRESS.

BELOVED COMRADES: Twenty-one years ago a band of consecrated women went forth to measure off with their own steps the distance between the home and the saloon. Alas! they found it all too short, and from that day to this they have been a self-constituted Committee of Public Safety, constantly making their report to the continent wide Committee of the Whole, and this is its conclusion—saloons must go. As if by magic, similar processions began to move throughout the West, until in the fifty days of their heroic and unexampled faith and works, the liquor traffic was banished from two hundred and fifty towns and villages. We date our origin from that red-letter day set, like another Christmas, in the drear December, to show that dawn is sure to follow darkness. In the bright Summer following (August, 1874), in Chautauqua—that Summer camp which is the paradise of women—a committee of the faithful decreed that this movement should be systematized, and put forth to their comrades everywhere a call to come to Cleveland in November, and form a national society.

To that convention we rallied from mountain and prairie, sea-side and river, cottage and hall; but the cottagers were chief, for in every great on-moving of humanity it is not the sediment of the wave, nor yet its foaming whitecap that carries the momentum, but it is the solid, resistless wave itself, and where the wave goes the whitecaps follow.

Since we were here at first the world has grown wider for women and happier for humanity. The two terms are doubtless interchangeable, and when the world has learned this (but not till then) the sporadic work that we are doing will be merged in the great comradeship of men and women for the upbuilding of every good cause.

Since we were here, the Red Ribbon movement, originated by Dr. Henry A. Reynolds, the Blue Ribbon Movement, originated by Francis Murphy—two stalwart sons of the pioneer Prohibition State of Maine—and the Keeley Cure, discovered by Dr. Leslie Keeley, of Illinois, have strongly re-enforced the cause of "moral suasion for the man who drinks."

And twice since we were here, groups of our sisters —in one instance 17 and in the other 13—have felt called upon to go out from us, the first in 1881, because we had avowed our desire for the enfranchisement of women, the last in 1889, because they did not like our politics.

We send them friendly greeting to-day, and are glad that so much of sisterly good feeling has survived the strong differences of opinion that drove us apart, to come together again, we hope, "some sweet day, by-and-by."

Since we were here the cause of temperance and purity, the woman and the labor movements, have all gone forward by leaps and bounds; the habit of total abstinence is thoroughly respected everywhere; thanks to the leadership of Mary H. Hunt, the effects of the use of alcoholics and tobacco are being systematically taught from the standpoint of science to the children in the public school of all the fifty states and territories except five, and thanks to that of Lucia Kimball, the International Sunday School Association provides a quarterly temperance lesson regularly for all the children in the Sunday School.

Since we were here the Home Protection movement, which means the woman's ballot as the weapon of defense, has spread from Illinois and become a basis of potential unity between the two new parties of the nation. Since we were here the people of the State of Maine, after more than 30 years' trial of statutory Prohibition, have voted it into their Constitution by a majority of nearly 50,000. The people of Iowa have voted for Constitutional Prohibition and been cheated out of it by politicians on a technicality. The people of Kansas have voted Prohibition into their Constitution; the people of Rhode Island have voted for Constitutional Prohibition, but been cheated out of it by the politicians of their dominant party through the enfranchisement of transient aliens. The people of North and South Dakota have placed Prohibition in their respective Constitutions, and as we believe, if the vote had been honestly counted, the same result would have been witnessed in the crusade State of Ohio, and the progressive State that Mary Lathrap loves to call "Michigan, my Michigan."

Since we were here the municipal ballot has been given to women in Kansas, and has proved the right arm of the enforcement of prohibitory law. The Territory of Wyoming has become a State in which under an educational test the governmental rights and privileges of men and women are exactly equal, and women delegates have been welcomed from that State to the Republican National Convention, and for the first time in the history of the world have cast their ballot in the election of a national ruler. In 22 States women now vote on the school question, and following the lead of their brothers in Wyoming, the men of Colorado have placed the women of their State beside them on the throne of popular government. In the South, under local option laws, the prohibition of the dram shop prevails over a larger area than in the North; the recent plebiscites in Canada prove that the prevailing sentiment is in favor of the prohibitory law, while in Great Britain the question of license or no license will soon be placed in people's hands for settlement. In New Zealand, men have given the full ballot to women and the dominant issue is the Prohibition cause.

Since we were here to combine, influence of women expressed by man has banished a Breckenridge from the circle of legislators; but if woman's vote could have been counted, the majority would have been such as to bury him forever, instead of a margin so narrow that he now announces himself a candidate for the United States Senate. Since we were here, the devotion of women to a clean city and clean politics has throttled the Tammany Tiger, and the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Parkhurst, Mrs. Shaw-Lowell, Recorder Goff and Mrs. Pomeroy are the heroines and heroes of the hour.

Since we were here the age of consent has been raised in English speaking countries until its average is now 15 years instead of 10.

Since we were here a mighty impulse has been given to the physical development of women by means of out-door exercise, until there is no ennobling form of recreation which she does not now enjoy.

Since we were here the baker's dozen of professions and employment then open to women have so increased that there is now no reputable employment closed to them unless it be the running of locomotives or the breaking of stones on the road.

Since we were here the working men and women have become thoroughly organized, and the principle of the living "wage"—which means a wage the worker's family can live under civilized conditions—has been established, and the new testament has become the foremost text-book of the new political economy.

Since we were here the prayer of the Crusade has become the plan of the noblest political party in the nation; Protestantism has proclaimed Prohibition as the only remedy; the Christian voter is less purblind and begins to perceive that the paramount duty of the hour is that every man should feel that he must be a good citizen in order to be a good Christian.

Since we were here the Pope's representative in this country has indorsed the right of any bishop to exclude from the sacraments those who belong to the liquor dealer's camp. Prohibition by law, by politics, by woman's ballot — these are to-day the watchwords of the temperance army in all nations.

Since we were here the white life for two—that equal standard of purity for men and women which alone can make home happy—has become the dominant note in the orchestra in public opinion, and peace and arbitration have lifted their banners on the battlements of the world's greatest nations.

Since we were here the sixteen states then represented have grown to fifty, and the single National W. C. T. U. of the United States has been multiplied by national temperance societies of women organized under the Crusade impulse in nearly fifty provinces and nations, so that the White Ribbon Crusaders, their Polyglot Petition, and their noon-tide hour of prayer, now belt the world.

That was mass convention; this is delegated, and aside from the officers, represents a woman to each thousand who have this year paid their dues.

Since we were here the great, warm-hearted South—not one of whose representatives was present then—has joined our movement solidly in the persons of its most progressive women.

Since we were here Mary Clement Leavitt, of Massachusetts, during a nine years' pilgrimage, unequalled in the annals of woman's achievement as a traveller, has carried the Crusade fire to every nation under the sun. Jessie Ackerman, of California, has created and presided over the Australian W. C. T. U., and in her seven years' journeying traversed a distance well-nigh equal to seven times round the globe. Doctor Kate A. Bushnell and Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew, of Illinois, have revolutionized public opinion in England so that Parliament has exacted the enforcement of laws for the prevention of vice in the British Army, and they have borne such testimony concerning opium as bids fair to work on equal change in favor of the prohibition of that nefarious trade throughout the British Colonies, while Alice Palmer, of Indiana, has sown the seed of the White Ribbon movement throughout the great rising Republic of South Africa; Mesdames Hauser and Phillips have given a local habitation to the W. C. T. U. in the mighty empire of India; and Mary Allen West, of Illinois, has illumined the hearts of the gentle women of Japan from the torch of that heroic enthusiasm which carried her away from us in the midst of her most radiant years.

Since we were here God has raised up for us in the mother country a leader worthy to have walked step by step with Mother Thompson, Mother Stewart, and Mother Wallace from the home threshold to the sanded floor of the saloon—that English noble woman whose ancestors during four hundred years have been associated with the upbuilding of the most historic Anglo-Saxon nation, and who, unspoiled by wealth, rank, or social prestige, has laid the gift of her great brain and greater heart on the altar of the Crusade cause. Every one here cherishes toward her sentiments of gratitude and blessing, our beautiful brave comrade, Lady Henry Somerset.

Since those glad days of consecration we have marched by a long and narrow way, through a different country, building the road as we advance, fording the streams, and sometimes we have traversed the desert of contention and jungles of defeat. Some of us have been gibbetted at the cross-road of public opinion, and all have been wounded by the hurtling arrows from the enemies' camp and the galling cross fire of harsh criticisms from our own. But we have seen great victories, camped on beautiful heights, refreshed ourselves at many a pure spring, and rejoiced always in the wide and open sky of an unfailing faith. We have seen the movement that drew together a handful in Cleveland send out its roots and branches until it is a women's banyan tree whose pleasant shelter is in all nations.

These wonderful results of the years since we were here at first, by which the spirit has struggled steadfastly against the flesh, did not come about by chance. Nothing happens in the world. They were the definite results of works definitely planned and faithfully pursued by women who prayed as if there were no work and worked as if there were no prayer.

Our National Treasurer assures me that in membership fees paid in, and in gifts from our local unions and loyal friends, the figures of her report will reveal a large increase over those of 1893. Surely if this could be done under the conditions of the past year it can be done always, so we take heart and hope, fling out our sails to happier breezes, and set out once again on our voyage of search after the happy country of protected homes.

The Ohio Liquor Dealers' Association, at its last annual meeting, declared that "it had no enemy to fear but the W. C. T. U." This is especially significant, as the "hidings of power" of the women who flocked into its saloons to pray and plead are better understood by the Ohio liquor dealers than by any other class of men. It is to these thoughtful groups that we look to stand on the picket line of duty, and "having done all to stand." Other excellent women will form groups for their own mental development or enfranchisement, will work in the various denominations which have enlisted their loyalty or will occupy themselves with the local charity which depends upon their intelligence and zeal. But to have in well-nigh every locality a group of women who are really cosmopolitans, who by inheritance and cultivation, and, as we believe, by the special call of God for this special time have reached the wider development that leads them to associate without regard to sectional or denominational affiliation, seeking only to combine with other women like-minded with themselves; who include religion as a part of their patriotism, and work for humanity as a large part of their religion, who see in the use and sale of alcoholics life's greatest menace against the integrity of the organ of thought, and who believe in the movement involving not only laws, but politics, not only men but women, for the overflow of this malign power, this is a token of the times more inspiring to the Christian than any other of which we have cognizance; this is the basis of our gratitude to God.

A vandal can destroy in a day a temple that it took Phidias his life-time to rear. Destructive criticism is always easy. The decadent philosophy popular in certain fin de siecle circles is cheap, but the builders and not the destroyers are the true benefactors of men, and in the nature of things they and their work are fit to survive, while the name of the destroyer is fit only to perish. As we march forward, not on the smooth sidewalk of civilization achieved, but keeping in the middle of the dusty road, where better civilization is on the move, let us lift a flag at the front bearing this legend: "The Lord hath not given me a spirit of fear, but of power and of love and of sound mind."

TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

If I were asked what was the most salient feature of the temperance movement at this time, I should answer, it is the position to which the theory and practice of total abstinence has attained in the opinion and conviction not of the Anglo-Saxon race alone, but of all civilized nations. The emphatic point of all has been stated in these words: Scientists say that it took three hundred million of years to get a brain upright on the spine, and then three hundred millions more of years to produce in that brain a thinking will. But a man in five years use of alcoholic liquors can undo this mighty work, and the statement applies to tobacco and impurity as well as alcohol. Some of our friends think that we pay less attention than we should to this branch of work; but it is apparent to all who study the face of these times that this face is not so florid, its nose not so deeply dyed, its eyes clearer and more bright, its gaze more uplifting, and its lips firmer set with the purpose of knowing what is to be known about the universe and the obeying the laws that it discovers. Even as the Quakers have diffused their light until its influence is felt throughout the world, while as a sect they are not growing so the total abstinence doctrine has been caught up by the breezes of commerce and invention, and penetrates in the sunbeams of scientific light the whole round earth. As proof of this, take the dinner given to President Cleveland by Secretary Carlisle, at which there was not a drop of intoxicating liquor. It is safe to say that no similar instance is recorded in the history of a great ruler.

Take the fact that Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson, the most pronounced teetotaler among the scientific men of a century who has done so much to antagonize liquor trade, proving the falsity of its pretenses and the danger of its existence, has within a few months been knighted by the Queen. Take the fact that our great teetotal champion, Canon Wilberforce, has this year been made a canon of Westminster Abbey.

Perhaps nothing evidences the advance you have made in the solidifying of public opinion in favor of steady habits, and the re-creation of a new atmosphere with more of moral ozone in it, than such a headline as that in the Chicago Times of October 6th:

"The Chicago Public Schools will Adjourn for Temperance Day."

UNFERMENTED DRINKS.

It is a good thing to go from home, and for a two-fold reason. First, "Absence makes the heart grow fonder." Secondly, The perspective of distance makes proportions truer. The home coming, with its tender welcome touches the heart with a deeper sense of patriotism, with brotherly and sisterly love; and on the other hand, the experience of life in foreign countries, of which I have now enjoyed between four and five years (two of them in the dear old mother country), reveals the great mass of nations that have behind them tradition and history, literature and art, culture and refinement, to a degree only to be attained by the slow process that makes the English voice so musical, and the English turf so soft. It is good to learn how much greater is humanity than any single country, and how truly God hath made of one blood all nations that dwell on the face of the whole earth. It is good to learn by contrast as well as comparison, and if somewhat of humility develops in the Yankee bosom, that is the rarest, finest flower that blooms in any air, and alone can give to any character the flavor of a cosmopolitan. That I attain this excellence let me not for a moment profess; but it was much to learn that it might be attainable. To one statement, however, I must always hold; whatever our faults and shortcomings in the younger land, we have been able, not by any superior virtue, but by means of our escape from stereotyped conventionalities that relate to creed, class, and clan, to realize the beginning of that better brotherhood in the relations of man to man, the every day exchange of the small, sweet courtesies of life, that is as yet little more than a prophecy among the finer and more kindly spirits of the elder world.

GUM-CHEWING.

My observation of the tendency of our young people to chew upon substances, glutinous or saccharine, has also led me to feel that we ought to make a special crusade among the children against this habit of forever having something between one's jaws. It would be most interesting to trace the origin of such a tendency even as it is most grievous to observe at a steamer landing or a railway station, every youth and maiden uselessly using the levers of the jaw upon some mouth-filling lump that the stomach wishes to see about as much as a busy reformer desires to welcome a curiosity-hunting gossip. Is there no remedy? Can we not invent some form of disgust? Is it impossible to rouse a wholesome pride? Can we not by an electrical contrivance illustrate the loss of power, or if this jaw-working must continue, might we not utilize it as a motor for a hand-printing press, or sewing machine, or other witty invention? I hereby offer a prize to any young American, who has not passed beyond his (or her) teens, who will prepare for us a thesis involving any or all of the points I have herein tried to make, and as many more as their ingenious minds may bring to light.

THE PROHIBITION PARTY.

The Prohibition party—that pointed plowshare breaking the way for the ballasted track of the future dominant party—has held its own in a year when the turbulence of conflicting interests has stirred our country like a California earthquake and a South Carolina inundation combined.

With women's vote behind it, combined with that of men, the liquor traffic will speedily find itself a wandering Jew of every clime, cast out as evil, smitten with the righteous malediction of those forces that mean health, healing and happiness for the homes of the people in this and every clime.

None of our leaders has put the position of the Prohibition party more clearly for the people than Rev. Doctor Funk, of The Voice, in a paper read at the temperance parliament in Prohibition Park, Staten Island, N. Y., on the fourth of last July. He said a determined temperance organization means agitation, and agitation is education, and education is bearing even now everywhere its fruits. Those fruits we claim rightly as part of our great harvest. The Abolition party vote never reached three hundred thousand, but its harvest was the enlightenment of reason, the awakening of the public conscience, the organization of the Republican party, the election of Abraham Lincoln to the presidency of the United States, and the emancipation and enfranchisement of 4,000,000 slaves.

THE CANADIAN PLEBISCITES.

The brightest spot on the earth's surface in 1894 for prohibition is the Dominion of Canada, in which four provinces declared by plebiscite for the utter prohibition of the liquor traffic by conclusive majorities.

POLITICS AS A DEPARTMENT.

And now I come to what I deem the most important utterance possible to this convention in its relation of loyal allies to the Prohibition Party. I ask you to create a new department, to be called the Department of Politics, and were I ten years younger I should ask to be placed at its head; but it is my painful duty to urge instead that you choose the most unwearied brain, the most rapid hand, and the most enthusiastic Prohibitionist among us to take this superintendency, and that you give her among others the following instruction, and the money to execute her order: A letter is to be prepared by the general officers in consultation with the new Superintendent, and should be sent to every local union in the United States. This letter will ask that as the first work on which its members enter after this Convention, they call personally upon at least a dozen of the men in their own community, who shall be Prohibitionists and Populists, in equal number, and invite them, with their wives and daughters, to the home of a white ribboner, for the purpose of endeavoring to unite in a pledge, which will seek to bring about a better understanding between these two branches of the great new party of the future.

The members of this Conference should be then and there invited to form a Home Protection Union, composed of men and women whose object it should be to secure joint meetings of voters from the two parties in which they should agree upon a platform to be brought before a joint session of the county, district and state conventions of the two parties. We have tried in vain to unite the national leaders; we have learned by that failure that not until the rank and file have been attuned to greater harmony can we hope to achieve anything in the National Conventions. We have no time to lose—'96 will soon be here; but if the work here outlined is done with intelligent persistence by our local Unions, under the lead of a devoted superintendent, we may help to bring Wellington and Blucher together in time for a Waterloo that shall banish the liquor Napoleon to a Prohibition St. Helena early in that twentieth century, we shall not be Man's nor Woman's, but the century of the Home, the People and of God.

THE NEW POLITICS.

The temperance people threw into the pool of public opinion the pebble of Prohibition; we made a point for better law, and from that point has widened the circle of conviction until it has taken in the purification of municipal parties. We did not expect so great results, but we have helped to make them possible. Tammany ring shows the full outcome of what men alone can do to denaturalize politics. The Breckenridge, and now the Anti-Tammany campaigns, furnish the antithesis of Tammany, and show what men and women could do together to make a city clean, a state reputable, a nation noble.

While we deplore the high license policy of the Republican party, we must in common honesty admit that in localities where it has dared to do so, that party has many times helped us toward prohibition and the enfranchisement of women and in some of the states its far-seeing leaders have flung down the gauntlet against the saloon, and have in times more recent girded on the sword in favor of the ballot for women.

We know already that the prohibition party in Colorado rose this year from $1,700 to over $7,000—an unprecedented increase; we know that the presence of women at the poles caused a much larger number of men to vote than usual; and by the admission of the Associated Press "nothing since the adoption of the Australian ballot system has more contributed to quietness than the presence of women at the poles. Men who shrank from the bustle and uproar of the contending partisans at the poles came with their wives to-day, so that the male vote is larger than was expected." But we cannot yet know what we confidently predict, viz.:—That the next legislature will do more for Colorado along the lines of prohibition of the saloon and other centers of iniquity than any previous legislature ever has done in the history of that state.

Women and the saloon represent the top and bottom of the nation. The saloon is the home of gambling, the twin brother of the house of shame, the manufactory of political chaos. Women and the saloon have got to meet; they must have one square stand-up encounter; everything waits for it. All other attempts to overcome the alcohol dominion are sporadic; they are but plasters where the knife is needed; they are but curtains where the search light should explore. That knife and that search light are the women's ballot.

There are many reasons for the present corruption in municipal politics, but there is one which goes to the core of the subject. In every municipality as a rule the educated, philanthropic and religious class of men vote locally the ticket that they think will benefit their party in state and nation; while the uneducated, unphilanthropic, and irreligious vote in a solid mass for their own business interests, and control the election of officers for the purpose of protecting those centers of sin in which they make their living, or with which it is important to them to be in league for purposes of patronage. The reason of all this is not far to seek. The best class in the community has wide interests; it is patriotic and wishes to make its voting power felt in the highest councils of the nation; while the lowest class has a single eye to getting the largest amount of "living" with the least amount of work, for the largest margin of profit on the smallest investment of capital. For this purpose no business in the world that is open for men of their calibre equals the saloon business. The brewer and distiller will furnish to any man who "opens out" a door and window to advertise their wares, a sufficient stock of liquors on which to begin. All he has to do is to deal out the crazy drinks at the immensely advanced price, of the retail trade, and to encourage games of chance, associations with degraded women, and any other methods that will bring conscienceless men into saloons as customers. But in order to do this, saloonkeepers must control the local politics, must be sure that such public officers are chosen as will not even seek to enforce the prohibitory clauses of the license law. This is the situation: it is based on the fact that human nature is as yet, in a majority of instances, more inclined to "get a living" than to do anything else whatever, and the men who get that living as parasites on the body politic form themselves into closer groups and get in their work with a better understanding of the way to do it than that more highly developed class of men with whom a sense of other-hood has to some degree at least replaced the sense of self-hood as the supreme controling element in all their acts.

Under the pressure of personal interest, motive solidifies and its outcome is the mercenary vote; but the pressure of philanthropic sentiment is less potent, and we have the scattered vote of the well meaning. This is the solution of our present degraded municipal politics, and proves that the first thing to be done is to disrupt the saloon.

If I were asked what would best advance every good cause in this country to-day, I would reply, "Organize as thoroughly and in the same method except so far as the 'communism of self' is concerned, as Tammany has organized."

The notorious Silver Dollar Smith—a New York saloonkeeper, whose floor is paved with silver dollars—has given the method: "Politics with us," he says, "are personal; if you know a man and have done him a favor he will vote for you, and if you don't know him you must get to know him." But to "get to know" those whose votes we want is not an easy thing. It has thus far required the supreme impulse of absolute selfishness. The woman's movement in Kentucky against Breckenridge, and in New York against Tammany, demonstrates that for the purification of their home environment women are willing to take the trouble to get to know their neighbors and to secure their votes for noble purposes. From the beginning a saloon has been made the club house and center of management for the sub-divisions of the Tammany ring, and each saloon has had a definite number of voters "to look after." Tammany has done more than this; it has helped families of men out of work; it has "got a job" for many a poor fellow who did not know which way to turn for his next meal. And most sedulously of all it has put money in its purse by means of an ingenious and well systematized classification of bribes. But the bribe of a friendly hand-clasp, a pure woman's smile, a neighborly recognition, a combined effort to help those who are in need—all these and a thousand more uplifting influences can be brought to bear on the very same people who to-day vote for Tammany, because Tammany "stands in" with them, and helps to meet their need. In this world we are pretty sure to have what we take the most pains for; and the trouble with good people is that they have not taken pains to win for good causes the votes by which alone those causes can be incorporated in the custom and law of a city, great or small.

The Liberty Party has not more surely staked its existence on Home Rule than it has on local prohibition, and as we believe, by these means it has saved its future. The Republican Party in America is in a position strikingly analogous to that of the Liberal Party in England, and we cannot doubt that its leaders who are careful students of political history have not read the open page of English Liberalism in vain; but if they have, then the New Party, buoyant with the hopes of the Populist and Prohibitionist, is as sure to shunt them on the side track, and to advance along the main line within the next few years, as dawn is sure to follow darkness.

"Get together" is the constant cry of the leaders. "Fall apart" is the equally constant watch-word of the enemy, and, alas, the devices are apt to out-rank harmonious councils. Human selfishness is at the root of all this, and only as it is eradicated, neutralized, destroyed by the indwelling of the spirit of God, can humanity progress. We know these things so well that we have hardly the patience to hear them once more reiterated; but unless each one of us is steadily at work building up in his own heart a kingdom of peace, all his cheap words and unruly activities are like so much crackling of thorns under a pot. Many request have been received by leaders of the W. C. T. U. in the last year to call a convocation of reformers. The point has been made that as a society made up of non-voting material, and as representatives of the home and the motherly and sisterly qualities, we were in a strategic position in reference to calling a congress of societies for the purpose of forming a national federation for good citizenship. All organizations willing to pronounce against the saloon, in favor of total abstinence and the citizenship of women were to be admitted on equal terms, and the invitation to be issued with equal cordiality to Protestants and Catholics, Labor Unions and Christian Endeavor Societies, the Grand Army of the Republic, Suffrage Societies, the Sugar Trust, the Oil Trust, and the Knights of Pythias! I tell the tale as it was told to me. This national congress was to meet at Washington next winter, each society accepting this invitation to send two delegates. How, I should be glad to see a coming together of these ends of the earth and would willingly co-operate to bring about such a result, if in the judgment of this convention the movement is believed to be at once practical and wise; but "a burnt child dreads the fire" and having made an earnest effort to help "unite the reformers," in 1890, 1891, and 1892, having sat up all night with the resolutions committee of the People's party, only to see the suffrage plank eliminated next day, and the Prohibition plank thrown over altogether, I deem it better to submit the entire question to the powers that be in this representative convention of the Crusade veterans and their associates. But I confess that upon me personally there steadily grows the conviction that since ballot in the hand of women is dreaded more than all things else by the men who conduct the three institutions whose existence is the most unrelenting foe of home, we ought now to unite our forces to remove the handicap that holds back the mother's hand from the ballot box of the Republic. In this cause, I am willing to spend and be spent, and while loyal to all the principles stated in the platform of the younger political parties, I am most of all loyal and devoted to the plank that says: "We will work to win the woman's ballot for the protection of our homes."

THE WAGE WORKERS' WAR.

For the first time there has been established in industrial history the principle of the minimum wage; namely, that the selling price of anything must be regulated on the basis of a living wage being paid to those who produce that thing, just as the selling price of anything would necessarily be regulated by the cost of any other ingredient in its production. A living wage, of course, will differ with the different conditions of living, and with the nature of the work—a miner, because of higher rents, dearer food, and more dangerous work, requiring a much higher living wage than an agricultural laborer. But once the principal is established that the laborer has a right to a living wage, it will be comparatively easy to decide what this shall be in any given case.

Labor has no capital except itself; hence in common honesty this labor should be regarded as a fixed factor in the cost of a product, and should be taken into account in determining the exchange value of that product. It is but recently that any system stood condemned which by means of economic law consigned a large section of the population to existence under conditions in which they could not live as good men should.

When they meet for purposes of conciliation, employer and employed must be on an equal footing, must be represented in equal numbers, and the same weight must attach to the opinions of both. I do not think that these boards of conciliation will ever reach their utmost usefulness, until women as well as men are elected to membership. It has long been my belief that the finest qualities of diplomacy are lodged in the brain and heart of the sex which for unnumbered centuries has been the chief member of a perpetual board of conciliation in the home, hearing complaints, adjusting differences, forming treaties of peace, administering justice, anointing the machinery with patience and good-will. I hope this Convention will pass a resolution urging the national as well as State and local governments to place women on their boards of conciliation. It will be a long step away from anarchy and towards "peace and honor."

THE INDUSTRIAL LIFE OF WOMAN.

Mr. Wright is our best authority on the industrial life of woman. He thinks that this is the core of the whole woman question, and that while the training of her hand has, in the nature of the case, led on to her mental development and discipline, and involves as its largest outcome her complete participation in the government, the chief and most vital change that can come to woman's lot is involved in the independent possession of sovereignty over her own person, and that nothing will so surely affect this as the power of wife and mother to procure bread and raiment for herself and for her children. No writer has more pointedly anathematized the social system by which, instead of bestowing the possession of herself for a brief period upon him who will in exchange give her the money to supply immediate wants, woman in a conventional and loveless marriage makes this exchange, not for an hour, but for a life time. I am glad that a man so honored has said these things for us, and keeps them before the public by voice and pen.

He affirms that those who take the view that the morals of wage earning women are not up to the standard of women under the domestic system, have put forth a statement that is absolutely false, and he insists that the exact opposite is true; that there is no higher plane of purity among any class of women in the nation than among those who have the self-respect to maintain their independence by earning their bread. And no man between the two oceans is a better informed expert; he adds that which is a most important statement, that the co-occupation of men and women has the same result upon character as their co-education, namely, it is carried on with great advantage and without any of the evil consequences which its enemies predicted. He affirms that the mingling of the sexes, either in industry or education, does not work harm to society, but on the contrary, brings great good and secures that mutual respect which is essential to honorable, social and family life.

THE PEOPLE MUST OWN THE NEWSPAPERS.

Much as we desire the ownership by the people of the great plants now in the hands of individual or associated capitalists, there is to my mind, no one thing that would so serve the liberties and rights of the people as that they should own the newspapers.

That the people should themselves be the proprietors of the means of locomotion and communication is by no means so important as that they should be the purveyors of their own ideas instead of taking them at second hand. The time is as certain to come when the people will own the newspapers as the world is certain to advance out of a sheep-like docility to a dignified individuality, and it is a part of the mission of the W. C. T. U. to stir up a question like this, to put it before the people, and to keep it there by speech and hand.

"THE EVER-FEMININE DRAWETH ON."

A little girl was asked by her mother, "who made you?" She gave the correct answer. Then followed the question, "Who made Adam?" She gave the correct answer; and then "Who made Eve?" Who shall say she did not give the correct answer? The moral backbone of this nation is its womanhood; and we humbly believe the pith of that womanhood is the W. C. T. U.

I wish that instead of using the term "Woman's Rights Woman," which is drastic and aggressive, we might employ the more descriptive and teaching phrase, "The Awakened Woman." She is to-day the leader of her sex, because she has answered to the call that said, "Arise, wake out of sleep, hear my voice, ye careless daughters!" A leading thinker with whom I was conversing on this subject recently—a man of strong character and wide observation—said to me: "Whatever you do not attempt, try to get women to think, get them to be less frivolous, less occupied with trivial subjects, more earnest, larger minded, more devoted to general than specific ideas." And I thought, what must be the weariness of life, to such a man, if, on returning to his home, he found that the rim of a teacup or the circumference of a thimble were emblems of the circuit of talk to which he had to listen! We women have not thought enough about the dwarfing of mind and character that has come to men throughout the ages from the pitiable narrow converse of the fireside. Going my way in life alone, as far as the natural companionship to which we are all born is concerned, the concept of the human question comes to me perhaps most naturally under the thought of a true comradeship in which reciprocity of thought, affection, and purpose should be combined into that triple cord that holds two human beings more strongly than bands of steel or sanctities of church or State. But the awakened woman, who begins to see that the whole realm of thought is her heritage, and the entire world of power her kingdom, as much as it is that of any other human being, and as much as her capacities render it possible to be, can only hope to see her ideals realized through the enlistment of the average woman. For this average woman is the key to the position. For the abstract principle of justice on which the Woman Question is really based, the average woman does not care a farthing; while, for the sake of justice in the concrete, she often plays the part of heroine, in that if she thought she ought to want the ballot, she would seek it with persevering zeal; but she honestly believes that it is more womanly to cry out against than for it. She has been told this from press and pulpit since her earliest recollection, and she has learned the same doctrine from "her husband at home." The average woman is often-times a member of the church, and, like the rest of us, falls into the error of confounding the husks of Christ's gospel embodied in theology with its kernel embodied in the Golden Rule; she is devoted and good and conventional; she usually has a home of her own, and her favorite end of all controversy is, "I have all the rights I want."

She is attractive, kindly and well-meaning, but dreads "the speech of people" more than she does all the speechifying of the speaking sisterhood, even though their tireless tintinnabulations should tinkle on until the crack of doom. She is not clear concerning the relations of cause and effect in politics and law, but she must be, if women are to win the ballot.

In America, Australia, and New Zealand, the average woman has rallied to the polls to vote against the saloon, agaist the gambling-house and den of vice. In the nature of the case she can be counted on to stand with practical solidarity against this trinity of evils that forms the fortress of temptation to children. She is perfectly "clear in her mind" that no one has a right to set these institutions along the streets in neighborly nearness to her home, and if the power is given her she will remorselessly drive them off the pathways frequented by herself and little ones. There is no lever so long by which to lift the average woman above her prejudices as that of the reforms that tend to safeguard those to whom she has given birth and being. Here we have solid ground to stand upon. With the slogan, "down with the dram shop", we can win the adhesion to the woman's vote of the average woman, and that means the average man in whose ballot lies the promise and potency of all things governmental that we seek.

No better statement of the "Woman Question" has been made than that of the Rev. Dr. Hamilton, one of the chief champions of our admission to the General Conference of the Methodist Church, who says: "In the new era, woman is to be nothing higher and nothing lower than the sister of man, and man is to be nothing higher and nothing lower than the brother of woman."

The holy estate of motherhood must always make the moral influence of the mother-sex a stronger conserving power than any other of which humanity is cognizant. By nature and by nurture women will, as a class, illustrate those virtues of gentleness, mercy, and peace upon which so largely depends their power to fulfill the functions inseparably belonging to their organization, constitution and destiny. If this were a world of men, and men only, the provision made for helpless infancy, with all the tender sentiments that it involves, would be unknown. The sense of other-worldiness can never be so strong among men as a class as among women, since the latter, during the most active period of their existence, walk along the edge of a plain that breaks off so suddenly for so many of them that the others must feel the more uncertain tenure of their thread of life. The breath of eternity touches the forehead of woman whenever a little child is born, and this great fact relates her differently to life, its prizes, its ambitions, its unceasing warefare; nor can women as a class fail to be mellowed in their nature by the contemplation of that mystery of dawning life with which they are more closely associated than any other thinking beings of which we know. The companionship of helpless infancy must modify the moral nature and deepen the religious hopes and aspirations of those who throughout the generations have kept a watch beside the cradle.

THE COLORED PEOPLE.

Much misapprehension has arisen in the last year concerning the attitude of our unions towards the colored people, and an official explanation is in order.

The World's and National W. C. T. U. take no cognizance of color, either in their social customs or their legislation, and have never done so. It would have been impossible for me to be interested in a movement that made any such distinction, for my ancestors on both sides, were, without exception, devotedly loyal to the colored race, and my earliest recollections are of an abolition home, and an abolition college town of which my parents and all my relatives, who enjoyed the higher education, were at one time or another either students or graduates. In the fifty states and territories that make up the National W. C. T. U., we were obliged, in order to form such a society at all, to leave the details of organization under the control of the said states and territories, and it is my understanding that in several of those at the South it was arranged by mutual and entirely amicable agreement between white and colored women, that there should be two State unions, whose delegates should come to the National on a plane of equality, but who should conduct their work separately within their own borders. In accepting this decision we followed the precedent we had established years before in the recognition of "State rights," and with the exception of a few extremists we have found no criticism resulting from this action, which was taken with intelligence and deliberation, and by which we are ready to stand.

It is needless to say that in all Northern and Western States, colored women join the same local unions as white women, and that they have always been among our national superintendents. The President of a colored State W. C. T. U. is a full voting member of our Executive Committee, just the same as the president of the white W. C. T. U. who comes from the same state; and I do not hesitate to claim that whenever a colored woman has shown zeal and intellinence she has been as frankly and fully recognized in our councils. Mrs. Frances Harper, of Philadelphia, and Mrs. Early, of Nashville, have been officers in our National W. C. T. U. In Michigan, a gifted Afro-American woman is president of a district union, and her white comrades are proud of her, as are we all, and as we ought to be.

I hope this whole subject will be carefully considered, and such action taken by this convention as shall give no uncertain sound concerning our warm interest and fellowship with the colored people in all their aspirations toward Christian conduct, character and education. There are 25,000 schools in the Southern States for the colored people, and at least two millions have learned to read and write. It is also estimated that real and personal property to the amount of $250,000,000 is owned by them in the United States. I hope that strenuous efforts will be made to secure the organization of W. C. T. Unions in the colored churches. As the outcome of much thought and observation, it seems to me that we cannot as yet hope for that larger development of interest and work that results from undenominational action; we must have the pastor of each church favorable to the formation of a group of white ribbon women; we must go to him and ask for this, we must adapt ourselves to the conditions more carefully than we have done; we must put colored women in the field, and I feel sure that they will join with us heartily when they understand our purpose and intention.

"I will to will the will of God."

If this is the rippling song of life at the centre of being, the quest of circumstance makes as little difference as to the flowing brook which under the ice still sings on, seeking the sea, its source of life and its illimitable home.

A pedestrian heated and tired entered a village in the byways of Cornwall, and began at once to look for a tap room or some place where he could get strong drink; but finding none he called out impatiently to a passerby: "You Cornish people are very good, are you not?" Whereupon the aged villager reverently uncovered his gray locks and answered: "A hundred years ago a man came into these parts; his name was John Wesley."

This reply illustrates the beneficent action on a great scale of one Christian's beneficent will.

Not until the Church of Christ when "it comes into these parts," puts down the liquor traffic, can it regain its hold on tempted men, or continue its hold upon the affectionate loyalty of women cursed by the power of the saloon.

THE WOMAN'S TEMPERANCE PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION.

New occasions teach new duties. Ve have just passed through such a year of financial constriction as this generous and prosperous iand never expected to confront or to survive. The wonder is that with such a crashing of great enterprises as could not fail to deafen ears and to break hearts, our W. T. P. A. is solvent and successful, our hospital has rounded the year with a balance to its credit in the bank, and the Woman's Temperance Temple still holds its own. Nor has any signal disaster overtaken any one of the innumerable state and local enterprises in which our indomitable White Ribbon women are engaged for the building up of the temperance reform; but we should be most unwise did we not face the fact that we must set our sails to suit the storm. Retrenchment is the order of the day. The Women's Temperance Publishing Association declares no dividend; it could not do so honestly; but the wonder is, that in a year conceded by business men to be the worst in the history of the country, its deficit for the entire year is less than $600. This is a result for which, under the circumstances, we are as much entitled to sing the Doxology as we did in former years when we had declared a dividend; for it shows the tenacious vitality of the movement, and that its recuperative powers ensure to the stockholders the safety of their capital and a return of dividends when business returns to its normal conditions. If their money had been invested in most other enterprises, they would have been likely to lose it altogether. It is our purpose to buy up the stock of the few needy stockholders who have expressed a desire to sell, and measures have already been taken to that end. The job printing business has been greatly enlarged and will no doubt continue to afford a solid business basis, as it is well known that the publishing house of a philanthropic society has not a clientele who as a rule are prompt in paying bills. It is my belief that our Heavenly Father has given us in our business manager, Mrs. Caroline F. Grow, the woman for the hour, the providential guardian of our most important enterprise; for if our publishing house fails, then, and not till then, have we failed indeed. I may not tell the story of her ingenious adaptation of means to ends, and the womanly bearing and business sagacity which have given her the good-will of the most trusty bankers in Chicago, and the sacrifice which has almost worn out her health, while with a firm hand on the helm she held the good ship W. C. T. U. steady while the billows rolled and the breakers were dangerously near. But here we are to-day, our credit good, our publishing interests secure, and a broadening path of financial success opened before us, when if a woman of less faith in God, less integrity, sagacity, and persistence had been at the center of our business affairs, we should have gone down into the irretrievable wreck and ruin that has overtaken thousands of business firms in this most disastrous year within the memory of man.

Our bookkeeper, Miss Ruby Gilbert, who has been with us for so many years, deserves honorable mention in this same connection. Although they call her Ruby, I claim she is "all gold," and with her faithful associate, Miss Austin, and the band of loyal employes who have rallied around these women as they never could have done had they not known them to be as sturdy as they were true—the fort has been firmly held. Nor do I think it would be fair to pass over the name of Mr. Christophel, our superintendent of the department of printing. Perhaps it is enough to say of him that he is the only man in our counsels, and that he lives up to his high reputation, not only as an invaluable expert in his work, but equally as a Christian gentleman.

Our publishing house is the child of the Crusade, whose potent voice has rung out over all nations, carrying its winsome invitation to come with us, its prophecy that the liquor traffic "shall be turned upside down," and its cogent facts and figures to prove that unless this result is brought about the nations will be turned upside down. The one unresting problem is to secure the willing and intelligent hands that shall place the product of our publishing house in the hands of the people. Unless this is voluntarily done by our own members, this product must remain on our shelves, and several tons of it are there, which ought to be under the eyes of the ignorant and indifferent. I have thought that if this year we turn to the children in the L. T. L.'s, and offer them some small inducement to distribute what we have on hand, that plan would perhaps result in clearing our shelves; while such a piece of work would be most helpful in forming on right lines the character of our boys and girls. This suggestion I pass along to our managers for what it may be worth. I feel that it is not invidious to say that in my judgment a special vote of thanks should be given to Mrs. Carse, founder and president of the W. T. P. A., to Mrs. Grow, Miss Ruby Gilbert, and Mr. Christophel; for upon these four has rested most heavily the burden of providing for the daily necessities of our great publishing enterprise. I also think that Lady Henry Somerset, Mrs. Hannah Bailey, of Maine, and Mrs. Hagans, of Chicago, deserve our thanks for the practical manner in which they have come to our rescue to enable us to tide over our most difficult emergencies.

THE UNION SIGNAL.

I do not know of another paper that deals with such a vast variety of women spread over so great an extent of territory, that holds itself so steady, and seems so like a reasonable and cultivated lady in her own home, as does our UNION SIGNAL, and be it well understood I take very little credit of this to myself, for whatever I undertake for the paper is done at arms' length, while Miss Margaret Sudduth, our managing editor, is at the very storm centre of conflicting interests, opinions, and purposes, and I think that she has made so few mistakes and has held so steadily to the golden mean that she ought to receive from this convention a special token that we appreciate not only her loyalty, which is of the purest and highest order, but her level headedness. Nor would

I forget our Southern comrade, the literary editor, Mrs. Kells, whose golden pen has won so many that at first did not think well of us, and who has held the friends she won. Her wide sympathies and tenderness greatly endear her to us all, while the bright executive force of our young woman, Miss Jennie Stewart, has wrought a marvel in improving the organ of the "Y's," and Ada Melville seems like the ingenious minded and sympathetic sister of every little child. In Mrs. Kate Lente Stevenson, we have an editor of publications upon whom there is no discount. I wish personally to express my gratitude not only for the devotion, but the skill, with which she edited and brought out what I always lovingly think of as "Mother's Book." But for her aid and the cooperation of my gifted and lamented kinswoman, Mrs. Minerva B. Norton, I could not have placed before our constituency the picture of that beloved life, which I really believe will be a harbinger of blessing and benignity to the mothers and children in whatever home it finds a place.

THE WOMEN'S NATIONAL TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL.

In 1883, preliminary steps were taken that have resulted in the foundation of this institution, which from small beginnings has grown, through the patient and intelligent care of its officers and trustees, until in the last year one hundred and sixty-five patients were received. A group of hospital nurses is graduated each year, and the large and eligibly located building now in use is to be superseded by a permanent structure, with all the modern improvements, the building to be erected on ground of our own, and the already successful enterprise greatly enlarged and strengthened. It is a gratifying fact that, notwithstanding the pressure of financial difficulties in the last year, our hospital comes out free of debt and with cash in hand. We learn that this record is not equaled by that of any other hospital in Chicago this year. All honor to Mrs. M. E. Kline, Mrs. M. M. Hobbs, Mrs. W. Thatcher, Mrs. Ralph Greenly, and Mrs. C. E. Bigelow, the indefatigable officers of the society, to the good physicians, especially Dr. Boynton and Dr. Sarah Hackett Stevenson, and to Mrs. Sarah Hornby, so long the efficient matron of the hospital. "Overcome evil with good," is stated as the motto of the hospital, and it could not have a better one. While the plan of erecting a building for its accommodation must wait until the times are better, in its present headquarters it has a location, appurtenances, and outfit that have won for it the esteem and good word of the best physicians in Chicago.

THE TEMPLE.

And what shall I say of the Temple—that enormous enterprise, the very mention of which has caused so many of our hearts to quail—an enterprise which has survived the enmity of its foes and the indifference of its friends, because "they that were for it have always been more than they that were against it," and because of some brave hearts it has been and will be always the centre of unflinching purpose and unceasing endeavor. How many enterprises could have stood up in the face of a broadside statement from high prohibition authority, contributed to the most unbending opponent of prohibition that the city press of Chicago contains? How many thus "wounded in the house of its friends" would have pursued the even tenor of its way? To my mind, the fact that the Temple stands completed in its majestic beauty on one of the most desirable street-corners in the business heart of Chicago affords an object-lesson of woman's faith and fervor, such as is not paralleled on the face of the globe. But whoever thinks that the founder of the Temple and that great majority of our members who have stood by her from the first, and who stand by her more strongly than ever to-day, have not given the most earnest prayer and most ingenious thought of which they were capable to the devising of a plan that should meet the trying conditions of the present time, has failed to gauge the level-headedness and good sense of the women who dare.

Our Japanese delegate to the World's W. C. T. U. Convention, arriving at Chicago, and not knowing where to go, found out, without the slightest difficulty, where the Woman's Temple was located, and felt then that she "had got to headquarters." This is a figure of the feeling in White Ribbon women's minds the world over, and that feeling and opinion stand for an immense deal in the total strength of the cause. Indeed, it is doubtful if there is a building standing on the earth's curve anywhere toward which more prayers of sisterly love and faith have flown like doves to their windows than the Woman's Temple in Chicago. Whatever it may not accomplish, it has, within the last eight years, inspired a million mellow sympathies, bright hopes and aspirations, and has set faithful and willing hands at work in all parts of the world to secure a local habitation for groups of faithful women whom God has called. These results are assured, and have passed into character and destiny. The money raised by White Ribbon women is a monument of devotion unequalled in the history of philanthropic enterprises originated by the sex that has no purse. Those who are not friendly to the enterprise have created the impression that this money has been raised by the sacrifice of things actually needed by those who gave it; but this was never either counselled or desired, and, while I would not impeach the motives of those who have said so, I do not believe that a single human being has ever relinquished any necessary of life on account of the Temple. Whoever gives from motives of love and devotion has enriched himself by that action far more than he could ever be enriched by gold. If coins have been searched out from sacred places where they were preserved because of their association with some pathetic experience in life, that was in itself a worthy and helpful action to the one by whom it was performed, and has already borne its fruit of sweetness and of healing. One thing is certain: the Temple stands four-square to every wind that blows, and in it have been the headquarters of the W. C. T. U. for two years, and more; office rent, which before the panic would have been duly paid, must be subtracted from the Temple receipts of 1894. This one statement tells the tale of an anxiety under which our brave founder of the Temple, Mrs. Carse, has staggered, but by no means fallen. Her uncompromising faith in the ultimate success of the enterprise has in it no small element of the sublime. She has been in council with the best business heads of Chicago, and will suggest a plan of action in which we shall all be profoundly interested. I should like to see this convention appoint a commission consisting in equal numbers of those who have always been friends of the Temple enterprise and of those who cannot be considered such. I should like not only to have that lawyer of high standing in Chicago who is conversant with all the details of the enterprise, but another selected by the commission who has not been thus conversant, and after an exhaustive examination and consideration of the whole subject, I should like to see a report made by this commission to our constituency and to the public. Nothing could be fairer than this, or more certain to bring every phase of the movement to the surface. For my own part I believe that the situation is well understood already by our women; but as some have felt that they ought to know still more about it, they should be furnished the most complete possible opportunity of learning all that they desire, and I think that if such a commission as I suggest should be appointed our temperance friends, both men and women, throughout the country should be invited to send in any questions that occur to them, and all should be fully and freely answered.

It is due to our Temple trustees, who have stood in the gap as our representatives, that we should in all our estimates and judgments of them and of their action endeavor to "put ourselves in their places," and think what it would have been to meet the storm, and whether we should have met it as bravely, or at as much personal self-sacrifice, as they have done. It is well known to all that neither the W. T. P. A. nor the Temple are enterprises for which the National W. C. T. U. has been made legally responsible. We have wished them well; we have indorsed their leaders, and have helped so far as we were able; but there has been no double dealing with the public on our part as a national society. These enterprises, like the Women's National Temperance Hospital, are "affiliated;" that is, they are related to us as adjuncts that have from the first received our moral support, but each one of them has its own board of directors on a wholly separate foundation from us and from all other enterprises. The hospital went through its "baptism of fire" in the winter of 1889, and no enterprise inaugurated by us was ever more fiercely assailed, but it has gained an assured and successful position in the teeth of opposition and financial crises o the country. Let us, then, take heart of hope, remembering that all success is relative, and that in such a period of darkness and decadence as the present, so far as money is concerned, the wonder is that the devoted women who have stood at the head of these great undertakings can still come forward, saying, "Here am I, and the trust that God and the white ribbon sisterhood have given me."

The temple plan is no chimera, and ought never to be thus characterized. Office buildings have been most successful, and have brought in fortunes for the private use of men who have founded them. It was our thought and hope, and is still, that these revenues might be turned into channels of public beneficence so far as the Temple was concerned. I have been rejoiced by the efficient help she has had for three years past from her young secretary, Miss Sarah Johnson, and by the outpourings of sympathy and good-will toward Mrs. Carse. It is one of the compensations of life that the more fircely we are attacked the more sturdily our friends stand by us, and I know that the resolutions forwarded to her from States, districts, and counties, and the innumerable letters of sisterly confidence have been like balm upon the wounds she has received. May God bless her and grant, as He surely will, that the very best results for all shall attend this enterprise, founded in so much of faith and prayer and love.

PERSONAL.

Search thine own heart; what paineth thee
In others, in thyself may be;
All dust is frail, all flesh is weak,
Be thou the true (woman) thou dost seek.
—Whittier.

I cannot express to you the pleasure I feel in returning to my duties with a sense of restoration. Having now entered my 56th year I cannot hope to regain the tireless enthusiasm of an earlier period, for any long-continued mental or physical strain is sure to force upon my attention reminders that the garment of the flesh like any other wears thinner with the use of years. Once there never came any physical pain and now but little; still its sure recurrence sets my metes and bounds, and makes me think with joy of that swift coming vision of a country where our activities will never be followed by weariness. It is a pathetic reflection that if one had always seduously insisted on a certain amount of wisely adapted exercise, these symptoms might have been delayed some decades longer. It was this consideration with others that led me to learn the bicycle, and I wish to put on record my testimony that this exercise, warmly encouraged by Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson, has been to me, perhaps, next to the quiet of the life that I have lately led, a prime factor in that equalizing and warming of the blood which we know to be the vital prerequisite of all equilibriated feeling, thinking, and action. The more we can study our physical organism as a great continent with a system of springs, rivulets, and rivers of blood that must be kept in motion, the more we shall understand why exercise is to us the breath of life. Let the flow of this current be clogged and as a penalty one's thinking is clogged, one's moral perception blurred, one's spiritually dimmed. The blood is the life, and whatever keeps it in tranquil rhythmic motion enriches life and increases the happiness of all with whom we have to do. Therefore, no matter who may criticise (and I am aware that I have been taken to task both by friends and foes), I propose to sound the tocsin in favor of this innocent, inspiriting, and healthful exercise so long as I have breath with which to do so; and my championship is because of my desire that the home-life of the nation should be more cheery, bright, and blessed to all concerned, both men and women, for I think that any scheme of improvement that omits an equally devoted and motherly interest in both sections of the human race is no less selfish than it is unenlightened.

In view of the fact that thousands of photographs have been sold representing either Rest Cottage or some of its inhabitants, and that in this world imputations are made by friend and foe concerning every means by which money is acquired, it seems best to make the statement once for all that neither the owners of Rest Cottage, nor any one associated with them, have ever received a penny from the sale of any photograph, and I may add that I have never had a salary as editor of the UNION SIGNAL, though of this crime (?) I have been accused. The problem is not an easy one, to reconcile the duties of editor with those of president and, at the same time, with one's own self-respect. In "A Great Mother" there are also allusions which would be most unbecoming from my pen, and for which I am in no wise responsible, as they seemed fitting to my collaborator and to our editor of publications.

There are two opinions as to the propriety of answering the false statements that constantly appear concerning reform workers, and perhaps especially concerning workers in the temperance reform, as no others so bitterly antagonizes capital and political ambition. Some of our wise ones urge that a dignified silence should be maintained, because if one's character and life do not speak for him there is little value in his declarations; but on the other hand so many good and earnest hearts are grieved by these constant falsities, and continuallly appeal to me for explanations, that I feel it better as a rule to reply briefly to misleading allegations. But in these later years they have multiplied so steadily and are so outrageously without foundation, that I should like to ask my comrades in this convention to express themselves as to whether it is best to take notice of them. If you should request your leaders not to do so, this would be a help to us in refraining from the public statements which we so much deplore. But let me say as a general statement that when any person or paper comes out with the declaration that any of our leaders have ceased to be total abstainers from alcoholic liquors, that they have deserted the principles which they have so long avowed and consistently supported, it is safe for any member of the White Ribbon army to avow her absolute confidence that these misrepresentations have been made through ignorance or bad faith, and to leave the subject there. Do not, beloved, be disquieted; indeed, I know you are not, for twenty years of faith solidly kept between us have built up a fortress of affection and confidence against which even Gehenna's gates shall not prevail.

The leaders in all societies must always feel that a certain number of their associates oppose them, partly from misapprehension, partly from conscientious motives, partly from jealousy. This friction seems inevitable, and must be taken into account as a partial offset to the momentum of the movement. I have never known the organization in which it is not said that the president has her favorites; that the same old set are always put forward; that the president has too large a salary or too many helpers; that she does not work enough; that she lacks judgment; that she is given over to fads; that she makes the society a background for her own exploits, or some other specification of like character. The criticisms, whatever their merit, entirely lack that of originality. Doubtless, much that is said is true, but it must be remembered that the angles of vision under which a leader is seen are many and varied. It is impossible to please all, and whoever tries to do so ends by making a spectacle of himself and an enemy of his own conscience. It is forgotten by excellent women with exceptional talent that in the nature of the case those who have become prominent will be at the front just as the leaders of an army are, but that time is apt to regulate and equalize the standing of workers, so that in the long run our specific gravity carries us to the spot where we belong. The greatest compensation enjoyed by those who have the happiness and the misfortune to be at the front, is that the rank and file are generally their friends, and they are a solid phalanx of sympathy, strength, and co-operation, so that the naggings received do not dishearten, but may be, as they ought to be, turned to account as aids to self-examination.

I am firmly resolved to place securities amounting to five thousand dollars to the credit of the National W. C. T. U. as a partial financial offset for what it paid out during the nearly two years when, although doing much work for it, I was not in my own country; and I have also come to be of the opinion that it will give better satisfaction to our societies as a whole if the salaries of the president and corresponding secretary are made the same. This will save several hundred dollars which can be used to excellent advantage by our national superintendents in their departmental work, and I urge this suggestion earnestly upon the consideration of the Committee on Appropriations.

IN MEMORIAM.

And they heard a great voice from heaven saying unto them, Come up hither. And they ascended up to heaven in a cloud.—Revelation i. 12.

It has been admirably said that "Death is the sovereign alchemist who assays the value of the coin struck in the mint of life."

Such a valuation we were called to put upon the life and character of the second officer in our national society when, by a stroke that bewildered our eyes and smote our hearts, Mary A. Woodbridge was removed beyond the mystic boundaries of the life that is. "All narrow jealousies are silent now, and we see her as she moved—how kindly, modest, all accomplished, wise, with what serene repression of herself, bearing through the long tract of years the white flower of a blameless life." She was here with us at the first national convention, coming from her sweet and happy home in Ravenna, less than forty miles away; for she was one of the original crusaders, her eloquent lips having been first unsealed by the touch of that pentecostal baptism. She is the first of our national officers whom we have lost in all these years, and for that reason some brief account of her life and work may be fittingly given on this occasion.

Mary A. Brayton was born April 21, 1830, in the goodly old town of Nantucket, Mass. Her ancestry was all that could be desired from the most critical New England standpoint; her Quaker mother was a sister of Mitchell, an astronomer, whose own daughter, Maria Mitchell, became in after years equally famous. Her father, Isaac Brayton, was a Nantucket sea captain until his genius for leadership and rare powers of eloquence made themselves so strongly felt that his townspeople sent him to the Massachusetts Legislature. When Mary was six years old the family removed to Ohio, where her father served in the State Senate and was a stalwart abolitionist, associated in that work with such men as Joshua Giddings, Salmon P. Chase, and Benjamin Wade. Mary A. Woodbridge inherited her father's gifts as a leader and and reformer; she had his quick intellect, insatiable love of books and learning, well-rounded mind, and graceful, gracious dignity. At the early age of seventeen she married Mr. Frederick W. Woodbridge, a young business man, and for forty-seven years theirs was an ideal home. We have all heard her say many a time, in that deep, pleasant voice, "My husband is without a question the best man in the world." One son and two daughters came to bless this union, and the benediction of her home has from the first rested on the manifold public labors of our beloved comrade. In 1877 she was elected assistant recording secretary of the National W. C. T. U., and in 1878 recording secretary. Her presence at the great conventions was as regular as were the conventions themselves, and was a never-failing inspiration. Her voice, of singular depth and sweetness, with a marvelously distinct articulation, was always a clarion note which aroused and held attention. In 1889 she was appointed American secretary for the World's W. C. T. U., and in 1891 she was chosen secretary of the World's W. C. T. U. In the same year she was sent to England as a fraternal delegate from our association to the National British Women's Temperance Association, of which Lady Henry Somerset is president.

In 1893, at the Chicago convention, she was chosen corresponding secretary of the National W. C. T. U. She thus held for eleven months the three-fold position of responsibility, honor and laborious toil, as secretary of the World's and National unions and of the W.T.P.A.

So well has the story been told in the UNION SIGNAL that I have felt no better representation could be made than to repeat the account given in its Memorial number. The summing up of our comrade's character is especially complete. First ranks her many-sided ability and strength; next her singular unspoiledness and self-effacement in the midst of her many honors; third, the cheerful, quiet, dignified, brightness and joy of her personal bearing, and last the deep piety which was the bed-rock of her nature and revealed itself not so much in word as in the supreme test of love-obedience.

Her executive ability was of the highest order, and her patience and power in the mastery of detail were unsurpassed. With all this she had absolutely none of the self-consciousness that so often mars the symmetry of a great nature upon the heights of success. In the stress of these working years most of us have been too serious, and it was a perpetual refreshment to note the smile, and hear the ringing laugh that accompanied the perpetual witticisms and drollieries of recital and commentary that brightened all our intercourse with this genial comrade; but her lightning did not strike, it was the shimmer on the summer cloud.

I have been profoundly impressed with the utterances of that great leader and keen thinker, Mary T. Lathrap, at the Memorial Service in her own State, and we cannot do better than to consider them here. She spoke feelingly of her own illness, and gratefully of the flowers of nature and of speech that had been given her. She said, "Don't think of me as sick, think I am well—thoughts are things. No life comes to perfect fulness that does not pass under the ministry of pain. No single orator comes to his best until he himself has passed under the rod of which he has oftentimes spoken to others. Back of pain lie laws; back of laws lies love. One of our great poets sang, 'Into each life some rain must fall, some days must be dark and dreary.' A greater than any poet said, 'In the world ye shall have tribulation.' The way is not so very long. Flowers of hope fade, but flowers of memory never. There is no death—what seems so is transition." And then she prayed, "God help us to lift our eyes from the beautiful grasses as we go out from here, and to think not of death but of immortality. The way lies only a little longer for some of us. We thank Thee for eternal boundless life. Comfort those who remain! We feel that the morning lingers just over the hill. Thou wilt not let this evil against which we contend go on much longer. Make us holy women with a higher ideal than we ever had before. Make our local unions centres of spiritual power."

How we miss this foremost champion from the National Convention! In all the twenty years previous to this she has never once been absent. She has been the central figure in our great debates, uniting the grasp of a man's mind with the electric intuition of a woman; indeed she is herself one of the most vivid illustrations this age has witnessed that in intellect there is no sex. To me her absence is particularly painful. It was she who, when we were here before, named me for corresponding secretary of the new national society, thus opening a broad path for me to the plains and highways of reform. I had learned to lean on her; to love her I had no need to learn. No woman among us was less self-seeking, none had retained more of that fresh, girlish enthusiasm which made her company delightful in the rare hours off duty that we knew. None had more radiant eloquence, nor had any a wing so swift and white in the realm of poesy. We miss our great comrade more than we can tell, and I know that in these words of tender loyalty that do my own heart good I am but expressing what every heart among these delegates confesses. She has written to several of us during the last few months, that she is still "shut up in her prison of pain," but she has coupled this pitiful expression with the dauntless words we should expect from her great soul, counselling us to stand firm for prohibition, and expressing that unswerving faith which from the first flamed up in all her words, and forms the substance of her character.

There can be no wiser or sweeter words sent as the message of this Cleveland convention to Mary T. Lathrap than those that Phillips Brooks addressed to Whittier, not long before both poet and preacher passed away: "I thank God that you have lived, that you are living still, and that you will live forever." I strongly feel that we cannot say or do too much to show our love and gratitude to her who is thinking of us all with a longing heart to-day, Mary T. Lathrap, our Daniel Webster of prohibition. God bless her now and evermore!

Twenty-one years from now the National W. C. T. U. will doubtless meet for the third time in Cleveland. It will then celebrate victories as much greater than those we chronicle as these are greater than any of which we had knowledge when we were here at first. The World's W. C. T. U. will then be as thoroughly acclimated in all civilized countries as our own blessed "National" is in America to-day. The equal pace of man and woman will have been established. The temporary insanity of stimulation will be discountenanced in custom and discredited in law; the wage-worker will have his rightful place in the front rank of government; invention will have winged the air with ships and sent not only human thought, but human voices in a chorus of brotherhood, around the world.

But twenty-one years from now most of us will be gone "past night, past day, over the hills and far away." The good gray heads that all good women know, of Mother Thompson, Mother Stewart, Mother Wallace, will have been laid under the clods of the valley. Some of us will hear the bugles of immortality summoning us away while we are struggling in the thick of the fight, even as our brave Mary Woodbridge heard them, but to most of us the call will be less sudden, and we may have to rust out the strength she was so happy as to wear out. So intense has been the pressure in these formative years of the mightiest movement to which women have as yet been called, that we who are veterans have lived already far beyond the appointed span, having mortgaged our future and discounted our stock of notes on the bank of constitution. "Our company before has gone," and we move forward often with weary steps, but always with the same tender love and unconquerable faith. "Not as though we had attained" shall we pass onward, but by God's grace we shall have "fought a good fight," and when we have "finished our course" the best outcome of our lives will not have been the building up in systematic fashion of the fair edifice of woman's work for temperance, for home protection, and for purity, although the world may say so, but it will be that by word and deed, and most of all by character, we tried to follow the Gospel's gleam along the hills of hope and to help prepare the way for the coming of our Lord in custom and in law; it will be that we tried to teach and live a consecrated Christian life. To the young women in school and college to whom we are looking to gather the bright web of the white ribbon work out of our weary and ere long nerveless hands, and to extend and brighten its already radiant fabric, I would in your name send forth a trumpet call; I would bid them haste to the rescue; I would call upon them to despise the pessimism that among the cultured so largely characterizes the closing up of the present century, and to saturate their thinking with the optimism of Christianity. I speak for you, the "mothers of us all;" for you, Crusaders, stalwart, invincible; for you, Neal Dow, father of Prohibition, with that shining face and fearless forehead so long patiently uplifted to receive the handwriting of Time. In the words of the Christian heroes who stood before the Roman Emperor at the gladiatorial games, I say to you, young women, for these veteran reformers, "We who are about to die salute you."

On motion of Mrs. Burt of New York, put by Mrs. Monroe, president of Ohio, a unanimous rising vote of thanks was tendered to the president for her beautiful and touching address.

Singing, "Throw Out the Life Lines."

The committee on telegrams reported the following cablegrams received:—

"BIRMINGHAM, Eng.

The W. C. T. U. Convention.

Love and greeting. English White Ribbon Sisters. Isaiah XL, 2 and 3."

"BIRMINGHAM, Eng.

Miss Willard.

The National Executive of Great Britain never ceases to remember you in love."

It was moved by Mrs. Stevens that there be sent from this convention a cablegram of loving appreciation to Lady Henry Somerset, and the executive committee now in session in Birmingham. Carried.

The following telegram was also read, dated Jackson, Mich.:—

"Greetings in Christ's name. My heart is with you.
Mary T. Lathrap."

Mrs. Hoffman presented to the convention a memorial which had been prepared to send to Mrs. Lathrop and asked the approval of the convention that it might be sent from the convention. Mrs. Hoffman also read the following letter to be sent to Mrs. Lathrop:—

To our Beloved Sister and Comrade, Mary T. Lathrap:

Sorrow is in our hearts, and tears fill our eyes because your familiar voice made no answer at roll call this morning. We grieve at your enforced absence.

We need your wise counsel, in our executive committee; your strength, eloquence and steadfastness in our great annual gathering.

We miss you every hour and everywhere. We pray our Heavenly Father that though the flesh in weakness shrink from the flame of suffering, the victorious spirit may rise with triumphant song: "I know that my Redeemer liveth," through Him that hath loved us. "Neither death nor life; not anges nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor any other creature shall separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus, our Lord."

We send tenderest greeting, love, deep and true. We are one in heart, one in faith, one in hope. We feel, we know, that you are with us in spirit. Thousands of prayers ascend like incense before the throne, that you may be restored to health and come to us as of yore.

The Lord bless thee and keep thee; the Lord make His face to shine upon thee and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace, Amen.

Offered by Clara C. Hoffman and unanimously endorsed by rising vote by Convention.

Cleveland, O., Nov. 16, '94. L. M. N. STEVENS, Rec. Sec.

Mrs. Hoffman then moved the adoption of the aforementioned memorial and letter by the convention Seconded and carried by a rising vote.

It was moved by Mrs. Hoffman that when the different groups meet who appoint their representative on the committee on resolutions, they either instruct that representative, or appoint another to form a committee on a memorial in memory of our beloved corresponding secretary, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge.

A rising vote was taken and the motion unanimously adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN: I ask you to rise in token of respect to her memory which I feel cannot be measured by any word that we can speak or action that we can perform.

Report of the Corresponding Secretary was read by Mrs. Stevens as follows:

REPORT OF THE CORRESPONDING SECRETARY.

The voice that should have read this report is still in death.

Never again will that voice ring out clear, musical and vibrant through this convention, as you have heard it in all the years of the past. The busy brain has ceased to evolve wise plans for the establishment and upbuilding of the cause we love.

Never again shall the tireless hand send forth swift and timely message to presidents, organizers and evangelists to arouse, quicken and unify the sisterhood of the white ribbon army. We mourn a common loss in the death of Mary A. Woodbridge, and from every heart comes the sad refrain:

"O, for the sound of a voice that is still!
O, for the touch of a vanished hand!"

This convention will not fail to understand how difficult it has been for your recording secretaries to round out the work, held by other hands, almost to the close of this crowded year. It has been no easy task to gather up all the threads so suddenly dropped.

The tabulated report has been arranged according to the plan of previous years from the statistics sent in from the several states. From the many fields of faithful and efficient labor we have gathered a harvest to cheer and gladden all hearts.

We have read, in and between the lines, of heroic endeavor, of patient service, and willing sacrifice.

RESUME: The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union has great cause for thanksgiving in this year of grace that brings us to our majority.

While many churches, missionary and charitable societies mourn a deficit in finance and the consequent crippling of their work, we come to our annual meeting with increased membership, every bill paid, and a more comforting balance in the treasury than any previous year has shown. Truly can we say, "The Lord hath established the work of our hands."

The tabulated report appended will show that twenty-one years have given a marvelous record of work done and results achieved.

Every state and territory has been organized, and most of them by our honored president, Frances E. Willard, through long years of ceaseless travel and unremitting toil, while we had no money to give in return, even the smallest salary.

Reports show that the following states have increased their membership this year, and as a natural result have broadened and deepened the work along all lines: Arizona, Arkansas, N. Dakota, S. Dakota, Delaware, Florida, Georgia No. 2, Idaho, Illinois, Indian Territory, Iowa, Maine, Maryland, Missouri, Mississippi, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, West Washington, Wisconsin, Wyoming.

New York presented to the Constitutional Convention a petition four hundred and seventy-two yards long, containing forty thousand names for prohibition of the liquor traffic and emancipation of women. Thousands of evangelistic meetings resulting in several thousand conversions have been held.

Pennsylvania reports an immense amount of work. Saloons closed in some localities—in Butler county every one. The state boasts four hundred and forty postmistresses. Communication there always reliable. Last convention, greatest ever held in the state.

Massachusetts, as active as ever, united in purpose, and harmonious in execution.

Michigan has given prominence to local work, encouraging all white ribboners to reach up to higher spiritual and intellectual planes of thought and action.

Minnesota declares that she has more workers and has done better work than in any previous year.

Nebraska with half her area withered and scorched, and relief-work imperative for the unemployed, will not permit her white banner to trail in the dust.

California has been the scene of the greatest strike ever known in our land, yet she has held her temple in the south, while north and south she has shown great activity in suffrage, and evangelistic work.

Connecticut and Rhode Island are endeavoring to educate their women to exercise the small degree of franchise they possess.

Virginia, West Virginia and the District of Columbia remain firm in the faith, and loyal to all our interests.

Kansas, Colorado and New Mexico, mountain, plain and plateau, are teaching to all the world what women will dare and do.

Kentucky has defeated Col. Breckenridge. Louisiana and Alabama amid all obstacles stand as witnesses for the truth.

East Washington, in her mountain fastnesses, stands loyal and true, while far-away Alaska writes, Our flag is still there.

Mrs. Grow, the business manager of the W. T. P. A., by permission of the convention, explained that difficulties had been encountered in the post-office of Cleveland, and it was uncertain whether the DAILY UNION SIGNAL could be sent through the mail as second-class matter. If not, it would be necessary to put extra postage upon every number, thus making it impossible to mail as promptly as arranged for. Mrs. Grow stated, however, that the publishing association was doing all possible in the way of interviews, with post office officials, telegrams to Washington, etc., and no effort or expense would be spared to keep the promises made by the publishing association.

In connection with Mrs. Grow's statement, Mrs. Martin, of New York, suggested that this convention should take up the matter and see that proper steps were taken by which the UNION SIGNAL could receive at least as advantageous recognition from the post-office department as the low grade literature.

The following telegram was read:

The Indiana Prohibition party sends fraternal greeting to your splendid organization, the wonder and the admiration of the best thought of this century. I regret that our party will not have accredited fraternal delegates present.

F. D. MCWHERTER,
Indiana State Chairman.

By consent a telegram of response was ordered sent.

THE CHAIRMAN: It was said in the corresponding secretary's report that the president had organized a majority of the states. I think she had a hand in organizing twenty-one.

The noon hour having arrived, Miss Cassie Smith led in prayer, and "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name" was sung.

After announcements, the convention adjourned to meet at 2 p. m.

CONVENTION ECHOES.

A NOVEL contribution plan, recommended from Ohio, is the distribution of envelopes in which each one desiring to do places a penny for each year of life that God has so graciously granted her.

OHIO has 1,300 Y's and 1,000 honoraries. Illinois numbers 1,451 active and 355 honorary members. Who can say the Y is not inclusive?

THE L. T. L. of Illinois is a great young army numbering 40,000, of whom 28,000 have the triple pledge.

MRS. LOUISE S. ROUNDS represents Illinois as its president for the ninth time.

A CHILD can be older than its mother! Massachusetts Temperance Union was born in Boston a little while before the organization of the National W. C. T. U. at Cleveland. After Mrs. Livermore's return from the latter meeting the Massachusetts Union became affiliated, and thus the paradox is explained.

"MEMBERSHIP good in spite of the hard year" is the refrain which comes to the National from many states.

THE School Physiology Journal is the title of Mrs. Hunt's new department publication.

THERE are 318 local unions in Indiana, 68 of which were organized last year.

THE District of Columbia has twenty W. C. T. Unions. They are planning for permanent headquarters.

THIRTY thousand women are represented by the Pythian Sisterhood, which has signed the Polyglot petition.

OKLAHOMA W. C. T. U. has determined to present a petition for a prohibitory law to the incoming legislature.

NORTH DAKOTA has instituted a new convention feature—an honoraries' evening.

KANSAS has 2,554 members.

NEW YORK has lost 354 members—the work of the Silent Gleaner—during the year.

MRS. BURT has been president of New York W. C. T. U. for eleven years.

MRS. MARY T. LATHRAP sent the convention the following beautiful telegram: "Greetings to you in Christ's name. My heart is with you."

MOTHER STEWART'S keen wit furnishes many pleasant episodes, as she sits at Miss Willard's left hand. When Miss Willard related the saying of the little girl that "God made Eve out of Adam's back-bone," Mother Stewart remarked emphatically: "She got all the back-bone."

IT is a great disappointment that our Prohibition hero, Hon. Neal Dow, felt that the strain of the long journey could not be endured. His daughter, Miss Cornelia Dow, brings her revered father's greetings to the Convention.

151,009 active, and 19,057 honorary members are reported this year. To this add the 13,234 active and 3,873 honorary Y's, and our total paid membership reaches the encouraging total of 187,173.

NEW YORK reports 31 reading rooms, and heads the list. Connecticut has 25.

CONVENTION ECHOES.

Y PROGRAM to-night. Be sure to attend.

YOUNG women's evening with Mrs. Frances Barnes presiding—tonight.

THE white ribboned choir of young women furnished excellent music last night.

"OHIO has the best system of collecting and forwarding dues," said Mrs. Barker.

THE National superintendents and organizers are seated under the left side of balcony.

AFFILIATED interests, hospital, temple, W. T. P. A., and reports of organizers are on Monday's program.

A SPONTANEOUS burst of song followed the splendid report of the treasurer and a rising vote of thanks in its adoption.

IT is good to hear the reporters at the press tables joining so heartily in all the hymns sung. No wonder the reports are so exceptionally good.

THERE could have been no more glorious ending to the Crusade service than the singing of Julia Ward Howe's "Battle Hymn of the Republic."

AT her request, Mrs. Barker's efficient secretary, Mrs. Horning, unwound a small portion of the donors to 10-cent fund roll, which is 30 yards long.

THE courageous veteran from the Indian Territory, Mrs. Jane Stapler, of Tallequah, is again with us, and was presented to the Convention this morning.

MRS. ISABELLA WEBB PARKS, of Atlanta, Ga., a former pupil of Miss Willard, and an able and forceful writer, represents the New York Independent at the press tables.

ADMIRABLY conceived and conducted was the Crusade conference this morning, under the chairmanship of Mrs. J. T. Foote, of Cleveland, whose introduction of the Old Crusaders was voiced in felicitous remarks.

MRS. JESSIE MORGAN PICKOP, former National organizer, is again at a National convention, the first since her marriage following that of Boston in 1890. She brings an honorary in the form of a two-year-old son.

MR. JOHN BAER, the magnetic and earnest general secretary of the International Christian Endeavor Society, whose labors have done so much in the growth of that powerful young Christian host, will speak to-night.

MRS. MARY CLEMENT LEAVITT has gone to South America for the Winter. It is well known to White Ribboners that Mrs. Leavitt's health does not permit her to remain in a cold climate after the autumn winds begin to blow.

MRS. STEVENS has been president of Maine 18 consecutive years, and only three votes against her in all that time. Mrs. Hoffman has been president of Maryland for 12 consective years, with only five votes against her in all the time, and none for the past two years.

A NEVER-TO-BE-FORGOTTEN picture was that presented on the platform when Mother Thompson gave her inimitable speech with its happy ending. Keen attention and enjoyment was on every face. The approval of the audience was manifested in frequent applause.

MRS. ELLEN B. DIETRICH, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Carrie Lane Chapman, organizer; Mrs. H. T. Upton, treasurer, and Alice Stone Blackwell, recording secretary, held a business meeting this afternoon in the interests of the National Woman's Suffrage Association, Miss Anthony presiding.

THE Cleveland morning papers gave excellent reports of yesterday's services. Pictures of Miss Willard, Mother Stewart and Mrs. Woodbridge appeared in their columns most kindly, although a frank difference from us in some of our purposes and methods was expressed in editorial columns.

MRS. MARGARET A. WATTS, of Louisville, well known in former conventions as the National W. C. T. U Superintendent of work among police stations, became president of the Kentucky W. C. T. U., at the annual Convention, Mrs. Nannie A. Mennell, who had filled the post most efficiently for five years, was obliged to decline a longer term of service by reason of ill-health.

WE were generous yesterday and gave our readers about three times as much of our President's annual address as she had time to read. We published, however, only a small portion of the great annual which every white ribboner will want to have and read in its entirety. Our extract was Miss Willard's chosen portion which she would have read, had time permitted.

THERE are present in convention according to the preliminary report of the Credentials Committee, this morning, by Mrs. Helen Bullock, Chairman: General Officers, 4; General Secretary of the Y. Branch, 1; President's Private Secretary, 1; Vice-Presidents, 28; Superintendents, 21; Organizers, 7; Evangelists, 1; Standing Committees, 4; Delegates, 354. Total, 421.

WHEN Miss Willard attended the Iowa Convention and found that sturdy society had 2,100 members, she said "Can't you make it 2,500 before the Cleveland Convention?" and at her earnest request the delegates pledged themselves to try. As a result this youngest of our State unions has more than 2,600 members and comes to us with a record of pluck and perseverance that the oldest State union may envy.

THE old Crusaders gave way to the young Crusaders last evening. It is always a happy and cheering time when the legioners march on our convention platforms and "ring in the new" hope with their joyful songs and bright enthusiasm. The children marched and sang last night as never children did before, under the martial generalship of Mrs. Rice and the musical leadership of Mrs. Harris. Their Prohibition and L. T. L. yells brought down the house.

SATURDAY morning's prayer meeting was led by Miss Cassie Smith—the well-known Evangelist. The vestry was filled and from the first moment the hush of the Infinite Presence was felt by all. Requests for prayer came pouring in from burdened hearts, one especially touching, being from the wife of a saloon-keeper, who is herself a victim to the appetite fostered by his traffic, but who is still groping blindly after God.

She founded her thought upon the two words used in describing Caleb and Joshua—"another spirit," and her whole address was an earnest appeal to the members of the convention to be filled with "another spirit" than that which had actuated the unbelieving Jews, even such an one as is described by the Apostle in as producing the "fruits of the spirit."

DOAN Music Hall—the convention hall—is a center of religious, mission and temperance work, a hive of industry every day of the year. Aside from the large labors connected with the frequent social and intellectual entertainments provided for the people, the Doan Gospel Temperance Union, in whose hands are placed the conduct of the hall, have nine special departments. These are a Sunday School, a Christian Endeavor Society, Y. W. C. T. U., Knights of Temperance, Co. A; Temperance Volunteers, Co. B; Kitchen Garden, Band of Hope, Physical Culture Class, and Treatment for Alcoholism. Oberlin theological students hold gospel services every Sunday evening.

CLEVELAND.

ITS RELIGIOUS REFORM AND EDUCATIONAL ENTERPRISES.

Commensurate with the growth of Cleveland as a commercial and manufacturing city, has been its practical progression along the lines of religious education and reform.

From the calling of the first missionary in 1800, to the maintenance of 229 churches and missions in 1894 is a long and significant step in religious work whose gradations can only be left to the minds of the reader. The efforts of Rev. Joseph Badger, the pioneer missionary who preached to his small audiences in the open air or in the settler's cabins, in 1800, and the first little Sunday-school gathered by Miss Anna Spafford in the parlor of the paternal log cabin in 1802, have expanded with the mighty force of righteousness now at work in Cleveland's numerous churches and Sunday schools, and in its charitable and reform organizations.

Nearly every religious denomination is represented in the city, and nearly all have large, strong, working memberships. The most interesting of these, because the only "peoples' church," is the Pilgrim Congregational Church, on Jennings avenue. The new church now being erected contains 43 rooms besides church auditorium, with a seating capacity of 3,000, and will be open at all times every day. The first floor is entirely devoted to the social and institutional work of the church, and comprises reading room, library, dressing, toilet, and bath rooms for ladies and gentlemen, gymnasium, recreation room, reception, dining and sewing rooms, kitchen and pantry. Rev. Chas. Mills is the pastor.

Plans for the education of the people are laid on a broad and liberal scale in Cleveland. The city has the best of modern equipments in its fifty-seven public schools, and in its Central and West Manual Training Schools, with nearly 40,000 pupils, and a corps of over eight hundred teachers.

Two well known colleges are located here. The University has a wide reputation, but still better known is the old Western Reserve University, of which Rev. Charles F. Thwing, the eminent divine and author, is president. The latter institution comprises Adelbert College on Euclid avenue, opposite Wade Park; The College for Women, in Wade Park; the Cleveland Medical College; the Cleveland School of Law, a College of Dentistry; Conservatory of Music and two Academies. 1,000 students and 91 professors are enrolled.

An exceptional and significant project for the education of the masses, carried on by a board of public spirited citizens, and called the Educational Bureau, may be cited further as illustrative of the liberal policy and broad charity of Cleveland's residents. This Bureau affords instruction and entertainment to the adult working people by means of concerts, lectures and the distribution of small books. Three cents is the average cost of a lecture, concert or pamphlet.

Cleveland's citizens somehow find amid the press of business opportunity to carry out their theories. A notable illustration is the University School, at Hough and Giddings avenues, which is conducted on the theory that a student's physical, mental and moral discipline shall be under the supervision of one instructor. The pupils remain all day and have their meals served to them.

The connection of the Forest City with the inception of our own world-wide organization is too well known to need repetition in the DAILY UNION SIGNAL. The city whose record we have briefly reviewed with so much pride, has furnished more than its quota of workers for our great reform, and in no other place could we meet and be welcomed by so many of our original crusaders, now fast "crossing the bar."

Cleveland's Federation of Missions, comprising fifteen local W. C. T. Unions and Y's, is working in every line recommended by the National W. C. T. U. Its new Reform Alliance plans its operations on a basis of temperance as well as municipal reform. All the practical charities usually conducted in a great city find here a fruitful soil and a genial atmosphere for growth.

Such is the character of the powerful, liberal and clever city which having but a few short months ago entertained the great Christian Endeavor host, again extends its wide hospitality to the representatives of the white-ribbon army.

NATIONAL WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

TWENTY-FIRST ANNUAL CONVENTION.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON.

The convention met at 2.30 o'clock pursuant to adjournment. The meeting was called to order by Mrs. Barker. After the singing of "Blest Be the Tie that Binds," Mrs. Forbes, of Conn., led in prayer, and "How Firm a Foundation" was sung.

The minutes of the morning session were read by the secretary and adopted.

REPORT OF NATIONAL TREASURER, MRS. HELEN M. BARKER.

MADAM PRESIDENT AND LADIES OF THE CONVENTION: It is with a degree of pleasure and thankfulness that I present to you the report of the treasurer. Truly the Lord has been better to us than our fears. One year ago our treasurer reported a deficit of $1,100, but beside that there were out-standing bills, back salaries and appropriations unpaid that swelled our indebtedness to very nearly $2,000. The situation financially was to say the least not hopeful. To meet the emergency our Chieftain, always fertile, in methods and new plans, with her own hand wrote an appeal asking the small sum of ten cents from every white ribboner. The response to this appeal was as astonishing as it was gratifying. $2,762.52 from America came in response to this autograph letter and $38.63 from foreign countries. This effort has demonstrated that the National has a constituency back of it that can be relied upon to stand by it in any storm, financial or otherwise. (Applause.)

My relations to the state treasurers have been most pleasant and cheering. I have found them almost without exception business-like and anxious to help the National. The dues show an increase in membership over last year. Some states have made large gains, others hold their own and others still have lost. Illinois gained 640 new members, South Dakota has added 420, Iowa 470, and California the same. North Dakota, Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Indian Territory, Missouri, Montana, New Hampshire, New Jersey and Vermont have made good gains. Wisconsin has added 400 to her membership, while Ohio has had a net gain of 800. Oregon has greatly increased her dues, and Mississippi, West Washington and Texas have nearly doubled their membership and Oklahoma has quadrupled her dues. Colorado, Connecticut, Georgia and Rhode Island have held their own, which was doing well in such a year as the past.

George P. Rogers, of Connecticut, left to the National in his will $3,000. This amount minus the inheritance tax of five per cent on all above $1,000, giving us $2,900, was sent the treasurer in September by his brother, S. F. Rogers.

We have also received a gift of a note of $1,800, secured by mortgage on real estate, bearing 10 per cent. interest, from Samuel Simpson, of West Washington, but this does not of course enter into our tax receipts. Neither does a note and stock to the amount of $5,000, sent to the treasury by our president, while in England.

I want to say right here that Ohio has the best system for collecting and forwarding its dues of any State in the Nation, and I hope during this convention the State treasurers may hold a meeting in connection with the National Treasurer that better plans for the future may be formulated.

Oregon has greatly increased her dues.

Receipts from all sources during the past year reached the sum of $26,029.25, of this $14,704.99 was from dues, $514 from the self-denial fund, $2,762.52 from the ten-cent fund, and $3,880.24 are miscellaneous receipts.

Our expenditures during the past year have been $20,348.07, leaving on the first day of November, at which time our books were closed, a clean balance in the bank of $5,681. (Prolonged applause.)

Whereupon the convention sang the doxology.

It was moved by Mrs. Rounds that a rising vote of thanks be given our National treasurer for this admirable report. Carried unanimously.

Mrs. Barker then also read the Auditor's Report as follows:

CHICAGO, November 10, 1894.

I have carefully examined the books, accounts, vouchers and letters of the National Treasurer and find them correctly and neatly kept, with a balance in bank of $5,681.18.

MATILDA E. KLINE.

It was moved by Mrs. Benjamin that the treasurer's report be now adopted by a rising vote. Carried.

It was moved and seconded by Mrs. McLaughlin, that Mrs. Forbes be asked to serve us as sergeant-at-arms on the platform.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Chair will make a few remarks to the effect that she feels that she needs some looking after, and there are others that won't be any worse off for it. The motion was seconded and carried.

THE CHAIRMAN: The W. T. P. A. people request that this statement be made that the postmaster of Cleveland has been informed by the officials at Washington that the DAILY UNION SIGNAL can be sent as a second-class matter. He delivered the message in person (and I imagine the postmaster of Cleveland is rather a busy person), that he might have the pleasure of saying to us, that he is as glad as we are.

Any fraternal delegates and visiting delegates who are present will be kind enough to come to the platform. We requested the appointment of fraternal delegates from all philanthropic and reform and religious bodies from all good, earnest working men and women, who might be inclined to send fraternal delegates in order that we might get better acquainted with each other. Of course they are not voters in the convention. We are accustomed to send delegates ourselves in all the different bodies where they are received with the same courtesy which we desire to extend.

MISS HAY: I have listened all the morning for some one older in the work to make a motion. We have missed one that is known all over this nation, one we all love to honor, and we especially in Indiana, love to honor, and I therefore move that this convention send a telegram to Mother Wallace. The motion was seconded and carried.

It was moved by Mrs. Bailey that a telegrrm be sent to Gen. Neal Dow.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is moved that a telegram be sent to General Neal Dow, whom he had hoped and expected to be with us, and who, on account of failing strength, cannot be here. I am sure that will be heartily adopted. The motion was seconded and adopted.

It was moved by Mrs. Hoffman that Mrs. Bailey, of Maine, as in years past, be the timekeeper. Carried.

"Guide me, Oh, Thou Great Jehovah," was sung.

The committee on credentials not being ready to report, the chair stated that the reports of superintendents were in order.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Chair is pretty sure that she will have permission to present a royal friend of ours who is a delegate fraternal truly, brotherly from all along shore, and his name is Joseph Cook.

REV. JOSEPH COOK: First of all let me express my personal gratitude to Providence that we now have restored to us on this side of the Atlantic the president of the most powerful, the most successful, the most useful organization ever formed by women in the whole tide of time. Whom God has crowned, let no one try to discrown.

I congratulate this great organization on its twenty-first birthday because it is indisputably triumphant over prejudice and passion, time and numbers and the powers of the pit. Here is an organization that first began as a spark of divine fire, falling upon consecrated individuals, it filled the community and the state and the nation and now it is international in its scope. It is really cosmopolitan in range. Nowhere on the globe can woman suffer and this society not know the facts; nowhere on the earth can a woman have just complaints to make and this society not be able to give them voice that shall be heard at the ends of the world.

You say it is high time for something tangible, something solid to appear, as the work of the W. C. T. U. in its national and international aspects. I have in my grounds at Lake George a beech tree, bearing the initials of Neal Dow, Miss Willard, Mrs. Mary H. Hunt and Mary Clement Leavitt. Do you think that I am skeptical about the cosmopolitan solidity of the work of temperance men and women in our time when I find names like these carved on a beech tree in my own grounds? I might go to the other side of the globe and find all these people well known there. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is like a banyan tree, with its root here in America but with daughter branches in every land on the globe. There are thirty-nine states in this Union that now have laws requiring scientific education in their schools. We owe those laws to this organization. I speak with bated breath whenever I touch upon the achievements of the great presidents of the different departments in the W. C. T. U. They are all heroines, and if the presidents are heroines who is the president of presidents? But simply because I happen to know a little more about the work for the promotion of scientific temperance instruction than any other one of the several and various numerous departments, I ask you to notice that at the World's Fair last year there was hardly any other reform exhibited separately that attracted so much attention from foreign visitors and our own citizens as that of the work of the W. C. T. U. as represented by the text books and the various laws which have been passed under the instigation and efforts made by this society. Mrs. Mary H. Hunt has been the leader in this one department, and I think there is no politician in the land that has done more to bring legislatures up to a high level in the matter of popular education than she. Thirty-nine states out of our forty-four, or forty-five if you count Utah, and very soon the entire Union will be brought under this beneficent ameliator of popular education.

Children are very much better brought up now than we were. We are benighted and belated if we are not believers in total abstinence in these days. A new literature is being issued, many of these books have been translated into foreign languages, so that all around the world there is solid evidence that the daughter branches of the banyan tree are taking root.

I congratulate every department of this great organization; I congratulate the Convention of departments, because here are hundreds of minds taking hold of many classes of reform and securing a long pull, a strong pull and a pull altogether.

Lady Somerset, whom may God bless for that beautiful friendship which she exhibits toward the queen of our organization, has been criticized, so I have heard, for encouraging and pushing the organization among the women of England, but she believes that when you attack the liquor traffic you must attack its allies, and it has allies of infernal power, so the women in England, as here, are attacking social vice, are attacking certain unreasonable limitations of woman's power, are attacking everything that injures the home.

If Great Britain were at war with Russia and Russia were in alliance with several other nations, it would be necessary for Great Britain to attack those other nations as well as to attack Russia itself. So I believe that Lady Somerset and our Lady Willard—for I recognize natural rank, as well as that which is hereditary, I believe these elect ladies are right in choosing broad methods of action and in striking at whatever injures the home.

Neal Dow believes there is no way of putting an end to the liquor traffic except by prohibiting it entirely. Mr. Gladstone says The House of Lords must be ended or mended. Neal Dow says, and this society says, and I give it to you as a watch-word for the twentieth century, the liquor traffic must be ended, because it cannot be mended.

THE CHAIRMAN: I will give him a white rose to put in his coat, for he is a man as white as lives.

We are very grieved not to have Neal Dow here, but we have got a member of the family, Miss Cornelia Dow, who is a chip of the old block, and she is undertaking to keep us straight on the floor. She has her aids and abettors in the various ushers, and in order that they may all know her, I will bring her forward. We have known her for years. She is one of the strongest white-ribboners in the State of Maine, as she ought to be with her fetching-up.

MISS DOW: I would just like to ask the members of the Convention and the visitors here to understand that when I or my assistants with me on the floor, ask them to be quiet, it is simply what you are asked from this platform to do. Please remember it is not on our own account, but on account of all of us.

Mrs. N. Coe Stewart was introduced to the Convention as a fraternal delegate from the General Federation of Women Clubs and spoke as follows: Ladies of the Convention, the General Federation of Clubs send you greeting and Godspeed. You are a great reform body, though you may not know that we too are a reform body. You have undertaken to reform the world; we, to reform ourselves, and it is needless for me to say, Madam President and Ladies of this Association, that we have the larger task, but when we are reformed we will all belong to the National W. C. T. U.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is where our recruits are coming from, for, if they are all like that, it won't take them long to reform. You know it says in Hiawatha, "Since I come so far to see you," and Mrs. Dr. Blakely, of Winnipeg, perhaps came farther than anybody, and I am sure you will be glad to see her.

MRS. BLAKELY: Dear White-Ribbon Comrades: It affords me much pleasure to bring you greeting from the Dominion. I come especially from the provinces, and more especially from Manitoba, which we consider the finest province in Canada. You have all heard of No. 1 hard winter wheat that grows there. I stand here as an evidence of the superior winter nutritive quality of that winter wheat.

I wish to congratulate you on reaching your majority. In Canada, we are only eleven years old, and we only have 10,000 members. When I compare that number with your vast numbers it makes me feel very small, but we hope in time to grow larger, and if we never get as big as you, we probably may feel as big.

THE CHAIRMAN: Now, that was nice, friendly and homely.

Mrs. Monroe, of Ohio, moved that Mrs. Caroline B. Buell, former corresponding secretary of this Union, be invited to sit on the platform during this Convention.

The motion was unanimously carried by a rising vote, and Mrs. Buell was called to the platform and addressed the convention in the following words:

MRS. BUELL: Those who know me best will know that I had much rather sit on the floor of the convention with my own Connecticut women than upon the platform, still it seems very natural to come to the platform and look into the faces of so many that I have seen before, and not only seen but have loved for so many years. I am very glad to be with you again this year, glad to sit here and listen, glad to take part heart and soul in the deliberations of this great convention. Dear friends, let us work together, let us think together, let us pray together, let us sing together, and by and by we will have victory together.

THE CHAIRMAN: And now, as we have had this charming interlude, this bit of sociability, which is especially characteristic of a woman's convention because this is to us a sort of a parlor, this is a sort of a perpetual sociable. We will take up the department of organization, the topic is, The Relation of Organization to the Extension of the Temperance Cause and the Progress Made. Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, who is at the head of the Young Women's Branch of the work, will address us first.

[By an inadvertence, Mrs. Barnes' report was overlooked, and will appear in full in the regular convention UNION SIGNAL. The last paragraph follows.]

"And dear president, I want to say in behalf of the young women who listened so attentively this morning and on behalf of the schools and colleges of this city, regretting they could not adjourn to be here to hear your words this morning,—I want to say in their behalf that your words come to us with the hope of a life ahead. We have caught the gleam from those who are here, the silver sheen of those who have gone before, and may we all follow as the Holy Spirit may direct and press us forward."

WORK AMONG FOREIGNERS.

MRS. S. F. GRUBB, Kirkwood, Mo., Superintendent.

This work lies at the foundation of the safety of our Government. We have a hetergeneous mass of people in our midst, composed of the most active and virulent of all other nations. These people center in our large cities, they control our municipal elections; influence the character and conduct of our government, affect the springs of our social life, and endanger our institutions. Their power as a class is greatly increased because in fourteen of our commonwealths they can vote at elections after a residence of one year in America; they thus become an immense factor in political life, before they are acquainted with our language or institutions, and before any educational influences from our pulpit, press or platform can possibly reach them. Strangeness of tongue is the gulf that separates them from us; they are largely under the influence of the saloon; it is the only school of politics open to them, they receive their knowledge of government through this corrupt medium, and are often voted by it in wholesale numbers. It is to counteract this influence and to gain these strangers to purer principles through the use of arguments in their own tongues, that this department is carried on. Appeals, facts, stories, and the best advice on the duties and responsibilities of citizenship, are sent out in seventeen languages. Special efforts are made by state and local superintendents to influence their ministers and to gain a place in their newspapers. A missionary is kept at Ellis Island, to meet the immigrants with a friendly greeting, to reach out a helping hand to them, and to give them instructions for good citizenship, "in their own tongues wherein they were born." This division of the department has been kept up by individual efforts alone the last year. It meets one of the greatest needs of the day.

Said a recent writer in the Century, "Whatever the individual opinion may be on the policy of restricting immigration, or however public sentiment may shift, there can be no difference about the desirability and necessity of making good Americans of those already here or certain to come. These people are ignorantly led into wrong doing by reckless schemers. If we could train them to know their duties, put at their disposal arguments with which to meet the spacious assertions of self-styled leaders, the much vaunted dangers of socialism would disappear. It is time to inquire what organization of citizens with unselfish and patriotic motives, meets these new citizens and carries into their humble homes, some knowledge of their new environments, political industrial or social. Is there any society either in the large cities, or sparsely settled communities which tries to teach them what they ought to know?"

To this inquiry, which the author thought could be answered only in the negative, we give an emphatic affirmative. For ten years this department has sent out pamphlets teaching American ideas of citizenship, that all-embracing term, including good morals, good sense and good manners, as well as right intentions and purposes.

MRS. HOFFMAN: I would like to inquire of Mrs. Grubb if the Lord would have sent the salary to the secretary if it had not been for the superintendent.

MRS. GRUBB: I have faith to believe that the Lord hath put it into the heart of the superintendent; it came from the Lord whether through this superintendent or not. I would be glad to have any other questions asked.

THE CHAIRMAN: How would you like if every one of us should give you twenty-five cents to keep that Swede lady there, and if we would give it a little lift to that extent, it would make a nucleus, and I believe Mrs. Grubb could get that woman's salary.

MRS. GRUBB: I want to tell you that, unknown to either the superintendent or Miss Lindahl, the officers of the board, this summer, Dr. Senner, whom many of you know, and the other officers gave her a very high commendation, speaking of the value of her work and of her fidelity and faithfulness in the discharge of her duties, and of her usefulness, and so it seems to me that it comes to you as a work that ought not to be dropped. I want to speak also in connection with our work and say that we are trying to affect the ministers in the different churches, gaining them, if possible, over to our work, and I would be very glad to impress it upon the hearts of our women that we want to affect their newspapers; we want to get cuttings and clippings of our papers into the newspapers in foreign languages. Will you let this come in as a special recommendation for you, this year, that you follow that out in order to affect the people a little more in their own language. You know it is strangeness of tongue that cuts these people off from our educational forces, and we must speak to them in their own language or we cannot influence them.

It was moved by Mrs. Robinson that a collection be taken now for Mrs. Grubb, and that each give twenty-five cents, if possible. Seconded.

THE CHAIRMAN: Mrs. Robinson, who is a "suit-the-action-to-the-word-woman," moves that we give twenty-five cents apiece to help keep that woman there at Ellis Island.

MRS. WOODWARD: I would like to ask if that motion cannot be made to apply to each department.

THE CHAIRMAN: Sister Woodward has the railroad boys in her eye.

MRS. CAMPBELL, of Wis.: I rise to a question of privilege. Wisconsin has been sitting here by an open register all day, and it is getting pretty warm in this quarter.

THE CHAIRMAN: Where is the man that shuts up the register? He will be allowed to circulate to that extent. We cannot lose Wisconsin or we would cease to housekeep. I know Mrs. Campbell for a very efficient woman, and I hereby give her the freedom of all creation to get that stopped, and I do not think anybody will consider that I have overstepped my rights in my capacity. The motion is on the taking of a collection. What is the pleasure of the convention?

MRS. LOVELL: I rise to a point of order. I wish to speak again on the resolution that was passed this morning. The program was to be followed. This would be a violation of the program, as it stands.

THE CHAIRMAN: Will Mrs. Robinson hold over her resolution and the Chair will call the next on the program. The Chair meant to say that Mrs. Lovell's point of order was well taken.

LOYAL TEMPERANCE LEGION.

MRS. HELEN RICE, Boston, Supt.

We hear very much in these days of applied Christianity. In this intensely practical age all truth must be applied to the needs of humanity if it is to be accounted of any worth.

The work of the Loyal Temperance Legion is applied scientific temperance truth. Through the wonderful accomplishments of the department of scientific temperance instruction the truth in regard to the effects of alcohol, tobacco and other brain poisons upon the human system has been made available to millions of children in the publi schools. The most that we have a right to expect of the busy teachers of these schools is that they will impart this scientific truth earnestly and faithfully. But here comes in the need of applying the truth, so that our boys and girls may become not only intelligent total abstainers, but trained temperance workers. This the Loyal Temperance Legion aims to accomplish.

To this end we emphasize in our regular L. T. L. meetings, by lessons, songs, blackboard and object teaching and experiments the same truths that have been learned in the public schools. We clinch this teaching with the safe-guard of the triple pledge. We train restless hands and feet, and fresh young voices, to numerous forms of helpfulness. The very fact that they are bonded together with a common purpose strengthens and inspires our boys and girls, and their annual county conventions awaken an enthusiasm for temperance that could come to them in no other way.

That we may keep our hold upon the older boys and girls during that period of their lives when they most need the restraints of the triple pledge we institute the senior grade, with advance exercises, such as debates and parliamentary drills. We set before these seniors a special optional course of study and examinations. Hundreds take this course, receive diplomas, and become our L. T. L. graduates. Wisconsin, in 1891, gathers its graduates into a s ate legion, which holds thereafter annual conventions; Pennsylvania, New York and Massachusetts follow Wisconsin's example.

State unions amend their constitutions to receive L. T. L. delegates into their annual conventions on payment of dues, that the Legioners may fully realize that they are a component part of the W. C. T. U. This year Massachusetts welcomes five such delegates, $56.60 having been paid into her state treasury. Other states follow her lead. Even "Mother National" amends her constitution, and Pennsylvania, first to take advantage of this amendment, has its delegate in this convention, backed by $50 of L. T. L. dues. Indiana, Oregon and Iowa each lifts its L. T. L. department to the dignity of a branch, and constitutes its superintendent a secretary, with membership in the executive committee. All-day county conferences for the discussion of L. T. L. methods are held that our superintendents may have the best possible equipment. Thus striving to prepare the best possible material for the active and honorary membership of our coming W's and Y's, we ask, and expect, the active co-operation of every union in the land.

MISS GORDON: I rise to a question of privilege. I am sure the convention will not regret their action of last year by which they amended the constitution saying that in any state where one thousand Loyal Temperance Legion boys and girls had paid $50 into the treasury, they might have a delegate at the great Mother convention of the National W. C. T. U. And you won't regret it when you see our delegate, Mrs. Sarah B. Knowles, the first delegate from the Loyal Temperance Legion.

MRS. KNOWLES: I feel that I am under false colors. Miss Graham, our devoted State superintendent, should have been here to-day in my place.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is a beautiful shining good that for the first time we have here on our birthday, a gracious tender woman with a thousand of our pledged children at her back that have put their pennies together and paid them into the treasury and sent up this woman as our representative. Go and do likewise in every one of your states.

WORK AMONG COLORED PEOPLE.

LUCY THURMAN, Jackson, Mich., Superintendent.

Miss Willard, in her report of the world's W. C. T. U., says, "No testimony is more cheering than that which comes from the round-the-world missionaries, showing the solidity of sentiment among women everywhere, no matter what their complexion, language, or condition. They all believe in the white ribbon movement when it is explained to them, and none more heartily than the dusky women of Africa, to whom our missionaries spoke through an interpreter, who listened so long and with such interest that our pale-faced women could not find it in their hearts to break up the meeting until a late hour." I have received some very encouraging reports of work done in a few of the states in this department. Many other states would take up the work among colored people, but report no funds to carry it on. While this is true, we have faith to believe that some way will yet be provided, and we have great hopes of the success of the work in the future among the colored women of our own land, who would be so glad if our Christian women, with sympathy and love, would lead them and their children to a better life. Like many, many others, they have the heaviest burden of this terrible sin of intemperance, and out of the depths of their hearts of suffering, they speak to you to-day. We must look to the great sisterhood of women to secure the rights of education for women of all climes and color, not forgetting those whom God has placed at our very doors. I feel confident that the great white ribbon army of women will always stand as the friends of those that are oppressed and wronged. If I were asked what I consider the most important branch of our work, I would say, the Loyal Temperance Legion. Wherever possible, these organizations should exist, among the colored people as well as other classes. The training the youth of our land for the love of God and country, will, I am sure, before another generation shall come and go, destroy this foe to everything that is just and good.

Some of the things needed to carry on the work among colored people are, first, consecrated hearts, which have received the gift of the Holy Ghost. It is also true that we need means. Literature adapted to the colored people, some illustrated and some in large, clear type, plainly and pointedly worded is also a necessity.

I hope that another year will reveal more sheaves gathered for the Master in this work. Then let us remember God, who is rich in mercy, for His great love wherewith he loved us hath said, "Let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth," and that "He who loveth God loveth his brother also."

THE CHAIRMAN: I hold in my hand some little envelopes. When I was in Ohio I found that they had a birthday there and the way they celebrated it was that a little envelope was scattered through the audience and everybody put into that envelope an amount of money equal to a penny for each year. We are going to do that next Tuesday night, and it was in my mind that we could use this birthday offering for the colored people. Mrs. Barker has this in mind and so something is sure to come of it. She is going to give us these envelopes next Tuesday night and I know you will keep in mind what this dear sister has said when you put your money in, and I am sure you will none of you go back on your age.

I wish to say that the W. C. T. U. knows nothing about complexions. In the National Society we are all just the same. We recognize in every state its own rules and so we do the rules of every nation in the world's association. It has its own autonomy; its right to make its own rules in every regard, but when we gather in the great campfire we are all children of the great mother and all received in an equally kindly way.

The Woman's Home Missionary Society, represented by Mrs. Mary B. Ingham, a fraternal delegate, was brought to the attention of the convention.

Mrs. Ingham: I bring greetings from a younger sister of the W. C. T. U., a society of which the revered Lucy Webb Hayes was the first president. We have no less noble a president now, the widow of Gen. Clinton B. Fiske. When I heard Mrs. Thurman speaking on this platform my heart was thrilled, through and through, and I praise God that I belonged to the Woman's Home Missionary Society. Dear Mrs. Thurman, it is one of our principle objects to help the women of the South and I wish you great success.

Before I sit down I want to say that next to Mrs. Lucy Webb Hayes, our first president, we always have loved Frances Willard, the president of the W. C. T. U. In 1896, the General Conference is to meet in this city and I earnestly hope that if Miss Willard is to be a delegate in the year 1900 that she will not be refused admission into the General Conference. Ours is a noble church, I am glad that I belong to it, and it is in almost every reform, and it would be in more if it wasn't for Dr. Buckley, of New York.

THE CHAIRMAN: And yet although he said in an article in the Century last August some rather hard things of us, in the very opera house in which his speech had the most to do with getting us all kept out, that is the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, a year or two afterwards, we brought him forward and introduced him and rose up before his face and treated him beautifully.

Now, we have a very pleasant item. Mrs. J. Mitchell of Ohio, National Fraternal delegate from the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the M. E. Church. After her name I read the name of the Rev. Dr. John Mitchell, her husband, and he is coming forward to support her in her public appearances at this time.

DR. MITCHELL: That is the way it will be in the General Conference after awhile.

MRS. MITCHELL: Madam president, ladies of the Convention: It is with joy that I bring the greetings of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church to this body. We are engaged in the same work. Our objective point is lifting men and women up and starting them onward and heavenward. Your work will not be done until the last saloon is wiped out and the last drunkard has been reclaimed. Our work will not be done until the last one of the four hundred million heathen women that they tell us can never receive the Gospel unless it is carried to them by the lips of Christian women, has been taken to them. We bid you God-speed in your noble work. It is a great undertaking. We might say, "Who is sufficient for these things?" And yet we remember the words of comfort, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me." In the name of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, I bid you God-speed.

THE CHAIRMAN: It seems to me we never had such nice fraternal delegates; they make such good speeches, that go off like the snap of a whip. Now, we are going to have the pleasure of receiving the Catholic Total Abstinence Society of America in the person of three fraternal delegates, Mrs. William Manning, Mrs. Dempsey, and our own Leonora Lake.

MRS. LAKE: Madam president, sisters and coworkers in the cause of total abstinence, we, delegates from the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, bring you a four-fold message. First, we bring you from 60,000 total abstainers heartfelt congratulations upon the safe return and restoration to health of your queen of womanhood, your beloved President, and our none the less beloved sister, Frances E. Willard. We bring you congratulations upon having arrived at your majority, upon having reached the age when according to the constitution of these United States, you may vote upon all questions. We bring you congratulations upon meeting in this city where was begun that early crusade which made your organization possible, and we bring you again from the women of our organization, an assurance that as you are the outgrowth of that early crusade of a few earnest women, so we with God's help, taking example from your energy and determination, may be an outgrowth that in the next twenty-one years will respond with no uncertain sound, as you have to-day to the work of temperance in this fair land of ours. And we also bring with us the earnest hope that to-day whatever lines may appear indistinct as they are, upon which we differ as to methods, as there is no difference in the object we have before us, we bring you a sincere hope that the time may come when the W. C. T. U., the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, the Good Templars and the nonpartisan W. C. T. U. may have trampled down the lines which now divide them, and become merged into one great body that shall march to victory bearing aloft the white banner of total abstinence.

HEALTH AND HEREDITY.

DR. ANNETTE SHAW, Eau Claire, Wis., Supt.

Dear sisters and fellow workers, I am very glad today to have the privilege of representing before you one department of the great department of prevention, for, if formation is better than reformation; if it is better to save humanity from falling than it is to be obliged to go out and gather them up after they have fallen under the snares of temptation; if under the old adage, "an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure"; if it is true that the iniquity of the fathers is visited upon the children unto the third and fourth generation, and also that the virtues and the graces of the ancestors are found in further generations; if that saying of that peerless man and physician, Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, that if we would reform a man, we must go back to his grandfather and grandmother; if these things are all true, then I believe that we are justified in saying that this department of hygiene and heredity lies at the very foundation of our work and because I believe that it is in the possibilities that are more than we can ask, opportunities equal if not more than that of any other department, I am happy to stand before you to-day and to represent that department.

We are asked the question: What is the use of combining the department of health and heredity? All over this broad land, in all localities, to a greater extent than ever before our women are coming to recognize the value of this department, they are coming to see that if we are ever going to regenerate humanity we must begin at the very foundation. There are three ways in which we can do away with the evils, which as an organization, we are working against. We are glad of all these three methods. One is the one which we represent in this great department of prevention. That is, drawing out the evils that are in the world by putting into the hearts and minds of men and women that which shall take the place of the evils in their hearts and minds. Another is, that by the ballot of the people this great evil of intemperance and impurity shall be driven out of our midst. And the other, which has been in the world from the very beginning, without which we can do nothing, that is the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, brought into the hearts of men and women to cleanse them from all sin and all unrighteousness. We have these three methods that we can use to legislate out of existence the liquor traffic. There is still that in men and women that must be overcome through the careful attention to hygiene and the laws of heredity and for this reason we believe that this is a department whose work lies at the very foundation of our success in this great work.

We have not succeeded in this work quite as well as we would wish, but from many parts of the country come to us assurances that the spirit is gaining, and so we believe the time is coming when the principles we represent shall be taught clearly and plainly not alone in our unions, not alone in the mothers' meeting, not alone in the schools of methods or in our conventions, but that it shall be presented in the right form and language to be understood by our children; that it shall come not alone to the attention of our young men and our young women, but to the boys and girls, and they realize the principles of hygiene and the great laws of heredity, and that other factor, environment, which goes to make up the character and purpose of the true manhood and womanhood of our people.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Cleveland Temperance Alliance, which I believe represents all the temperance societies in Cleveland, has sent us these beautiful flowers, and with them Mr. W.C.Cornell sends this note: "The noblest, purest and best organization on the face of the earth, the W. C. T. U. Greetings from the Cleveland Temperance Alliance."

On motion, the report on the Department of Health and Heredity was accepted.

Song, "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name."

SCIENTIFIC TEMPERANCE INSTRUCTION.

MRS. MARY H. HUNT, Boston, Superintendent.

Is the perpetuity and extension of what is known as the nineteenth century civilization assured? While the fact of asking this question implies a possible doubt, all agree that the answer to it depends upon the physical, mental and moral character of the people as a whole. That being true, the question of how this kind of character can be assured becomes one of tremendous importance. In looking for its answer, we find it universally conceded that as a cause of physical, mental and moral degeneration, the use of alcoholic drinks and other narcotics outranks all other causes. How can that use be prevented? is the vital question that stares Christendom in the face to-day. A clear vision of what cannot be done in our own country may help us to see what can. That a government of majorities like ours cannot prohibit whatever the majority want is an axiomatic statement of fact. Can a representative government then do nothing to prevent the use of popular substances that menace its civilization? Yes, it can command such universal education on the subject through its system of public schools as will prevent the formation of alcoholic and other narcotic habits. That is what the State and National governments of the United States are doing.

New Jersey, our latest victory, is really an aftermath of the Scientific Temperance Exhibit at the World Columbian Exposition. There are only five more states to win for compulsory temperance education, Indiana, Tennessee, Arkansas, Georgia and South Carolina. There are now, according to the latest census estimates fully 16,000,000 children and youth of school age in the United States under temperance education laws.

What has the National Department of Scientific Temperance done for the disbursement of temperance truth during the past year? In addition to the campaign in New Jersey, the superintendent of this department has prepared and sent out over 2,800,000 pages of circular and magazine matter, directly bearing on the subject of total abstinence teaching in the public schools. Nearly 1,000,000 pages of this printed matter, including the annual budget to the 10,000 W. C. T. U.'s in the United States and Canada, has been gratuitously sent through the mails to all parts of the United States and other countries in response to requests for information from almost every class of persons interested in the public good. Every request of this sort, if promptly and fully met, will help toward securing the temperance education of the children. In addition to all this, the publishers of the endorsed books have sent free to our correspondents 400,000 pages of endorsed temperance text-book matter.

Through the Index Medicus, we are introduced to the new books and other printed matter in any language on the question of what alcohol will do to those who drink it, and other topics of hygiene. Translators are hired to put into English what we need from other tongues. Thus the arsenal of truth at the headquarters of the National Scientific Temperance Instruction Department is continually replenished.

MRS. LOVELL: I rise to a point of order. The rule is, I believe, that each superintendent has ten minutes. If there is to be an extension the length of the extension should be fixed. I do not know whether any extension has been made. Now, I think it will certainly be said that I am impartial, for if there is any one to whom I should wish an extension made, it is Mrs. Hunt. I am her superintendent in Pennsylvania, and there is no woman whom I honor so much, but I do not think unless we adjourn our rules, we can be considered just, and we must be just before we are generous.

THE CHAIRMAN: The chair wishes to say in self-defense because she feels that Mrs. Lovell has taken a just position when time was called, and Mrs. Hunt made some playful remark, the chair said, "I believe they have been accustomed to grant you a little margin," because you know that has been true of Mrs. Hunt, as hers is a great department, but the chair promises that she will not do it any more.

PHYSICAL CULTURE.

MRS. FRANCES W. LEITER, Mansfield, O., Supt.

The most promising feature of the year is the hearty co-operation of influential educators in the purposes and plans of the department.

As yet, there is no indication that either of the two great educational bodies of the country will take steps in the direction of compulsory law. The one is laboring with a curriculum already too full; the other deems it advisable to wait until a sufficient number of trained specialists is ready to meet the demand which will arise through legislation. We believe a crowded curriculum will yield to an imperative need in the education of the child; and the supply of specialists will speedily equal the demand when laws are to be enforced. The prominent normals of the country already recognize this training as a necessity in the preparation of the teacher; while the privileges of the county institute and summer schools of methods can prepare the way for initial discipline in villages and rural districts. Two years after the enactment of the Ohio law Louisiana has added this discipline to the required work in the public schools of that state.

Bills have at various times been introduced in the legislatures of four other states, but failed to become a law.

The stronghold of the department at the present stage of the work is its pertinent literature. Any wide-awake woman with the envelope of literature amounting already to three hundred pages, and costing but 50 cents mailed, can prepare an article or address which will give audiences a fair and interesting presentation of the subject. These documents come from the pen of prominent specialists and scientists. Other important leaflets are to be added. Systematic exercise under a competent director has marvelous power in helping women estimate the priceless value of a healthy, strong, unhindered body, and will aid in settling the difficult problem of correct dress. The Y. M. C. A. is doing a grand work for men and boys through the means of the gymnasium. A nobler philanthrophy in behalf of womankind, cannot be thought of in any community. This is a fitting work for the young woman's branch of the W. C. T. U. Compulsory legislation will include all institutions of an educational nature that come under public control. Reformatory and penal institutions should not, however, be neglected. While it is the prerogative of the state to punish by denying liberty, it is equally the duty of the state to strive for such physical conditions of those under its care, that the convict may improve rather than degenerate physically, mentally and even morally by the incarceration. The fair distinct lines of work—social, legislative, educational and prison reform, each with a distinct bearing, necessitates heavy correspondence. The department needs a competent paid assistant. Raising the people to a higher physical plane will lift the mortgage which alcohol holds upon rising and coming generations through its power to falsely persuade that it possesses the magic touch of healing. This branch of our work is the silent yet powerful battering ram which will eventually undermine the stronghold of this enemy of mankind.

THE CHAIRMAN: One of the most important things that Mrs. Leiter has done is to bring out a valuable literature on the subject of physical culture and most carefully prepared, and I hope you will all take note of that and get specimens from her of this literature and circulate it among the young women.

It was moved by Miss Hilles that after the necessary miscellaneous business the convention adjourn, which motion was carried.

The telegram committee reported as follows:

Telegram to Lady Henry Somerset. 2nd John, 13:3.

To the executive committee of the British Woman's Temperance Association, "Greeting." Hebrews, 6:10.

To the Hon. Neal Dow, Portland, Maine, "Love, honor and greeting." Read Hebrews, 6:13.

Mrs. Zerelda G. Wallace: "We miss your presence and send love and greetings." Read Isaiah, 40:30, 31.

On motion, the report of the committee on telegrams was adopted.

MRS. HOFFMAN: I wish to state a fact which has just come to my knowledge, that it was Mrs. Woodbridge who requested Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson to write the song which we sung this morning, as a surprise to Miss Willard, our president. The last day she was in the office they went over the song together and she was quite delighted with it and gave it her heartiest approval. The song, as you know, was written by Mrs. Stevenson, but it was Mrs. Woodbridge's thought.

THE CHAIRMAN: You may be sure that will always be a fragrant and tender remembrance to me of my loved comrade.

Now, we have had a day of intense thought and purpose and concentration, probably the most varied in playing upon the gamut of the spirit of any day that we have ever had in a national convention, and you know that the evening brings us home. Our thoughts and our spirits find equipose in God and I thought it would be a very sweet and tender thing just before we separate to greet that noble man whom Mary said was the best man that ever lived, Mr. Woodbridge, also her daughter, Mrs. Way, and her sweet young grand-daughter, who is a special page of the officers. When I said to her, "You have begun early," she said, "I felt that I wanted to belong to the white ribbon women as grandma did." And then the daughter-in-law, the wife of the only son of Brother and Sister Woodbridge, Mrs. George Woodbridge. When we have risen in tender greeting and recognition shall we sing a verse of "God Be With You Till We Meet Again," recognizing one of the great company, part of the host which has crossed over and part is crossing now. Frederick Woodbridge, whose plain handwriting you and I have often seen when he wrote letters for Mary when she was so busy. Mrs. Way, her daughter, and her grand-daughter, and George's wife.

Song, "God Be With You Till We Meet Again."

Prayer by Mrs. Hunt.

Convention adjourned till 7.30 o'clock.

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 16TH.

After singing "Coronation" the convention was lead in devotional exercises by Mrs. H. E. Hammond, of Cleveland.

The choir sang, "Christ for the World We Sing."

THE CHAIRMAN: We are now to receive from our good friends to whom we have come and who have prepared for us so generously and thoroughly, addresses of welcome and no one is better entitled, by what she has wrought for us as well as by her own ability to speak her mind freely, to give an address of welcome, than Mrs. S. M. Perkins, of the Federated Unions.

By MRS. S. M. PERKINS, Cleveland, Ohio.

The federated unions of our Forest City extend to our co-workers, who have come so far to see us, our most hearty welcome.

Twenty-one years ago, you were here to organize a little band of women who would stand for the principle of total abstinence, and to-day you are here to tell us of your victories and defeats, and will rehearse the story of a little, narrow band of white ribbon which now encircles the world.

Is there a magical power in white silk ribbon, does it possess the electrical force to bind heart to heart in a circle around the globe, or is it the great principle of the golden rule in the hearts of the women and the Christ-power that has been given to enforce this rule?

After loving the Lord supremely you have remembered the second great commandment and have loved your neighbor as yourself. You know that many want to be saved but only a few want to be Saviours of others.

You met here 21 years ago, a little company not much larger than the little band of disciples who followed the lowly man of sorrows, who walked and talked beside the sea of Galilee 1800 years ago; and now that seed sowing has produced a harvest of consecrated workers who will never cease their toil while there are boys to be saved, girls to be warned, or saloons to be closed.

We expect to hear from the workers who have returned from the other side of the globe, and as we say to them, "Watchmen, tell us of the night," perhaps they can respond that there are a few streaks of dawn in the distance even if they cannot say, "the morning cometh soon."

We welcome you to our city, beside Erie's charming waters—a city beautiful in construction, with its renowned Euclid avenue, the most beautiful street in the wide world. The palatial homes on this avenue are now opened to our delegates, for we are truly a hospitable city.

You have been told that there are 16 millions of young people in the schools of our great country and those children are exposed to great danger from our licensed saloons. Can a half million workers save 16 millions? How powerless we feel when we contemplate the magnitude of the evil—greater than all other evils combined.

But we turn to the blessed book and read, "Not by night, nor power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." Trusting in the precious promises and in the influences of the Holy Spirit we are not afraid.

Mary Lyon used to say, "I am afraid of nothing in the whole universe but that I shall not know and discharge my whole duty." The Master has made this path of duty plain to us, and though we walk the path with bleeding feet we shall not turn aside till He, whose right it is, shall rule, and then our homes will be protected and our boys saved from the destroyers.

Those of us who have long worked in the suffrage ranks, because we believed that the ballot in woman's hands would protect the homes, and close the saloons, used to get so discouraged because the devout church women did not take hold of this foundation of reform. But when the ancient prophecy was fulfilled and the spirit was poured out upon the daughters, we said there is an influence that will speed the day of woman's power.

After the dear women had prayed till their voices were hoarse with their pleading, after they had wept till they could not shed another tear, they would see that God works by means, and that he wants us to help answer our own prayers, and we need the ballot to protect our loved ones from the destroyer. This eye-opening is now accomplished. Our Christian temperance women stand as a unit for this reform. For this we thank God and take courage. Prevention is better than cure. Our women are following the master's footsteps, and are doing what they can. They carry the Bible, and flowers, and literature and sunshine into prisons. They go into infirmaries, and tell the story of the cross of Christ. God blesses their work abundantly, but should they not prevent as well as mitigate? I often think of Bridget, who did not know how to turn off a faucet. The water was running all over her kitchen floor; her mistress came in, "Oh, Bridget, do turn the faucet."

"And sure, ma'am, I have got enough to do to mop up all this water and you should not ax me to do anything more."

Alas, too many of our devout women have been standing with their mops working till every nerve ached with weariness, taking care of retreats and prisons and workhouses, and when you suggest turning off the faucet of crime, by closing saloons, they will say, "I am so busy with the mops that I have no time."

The men throw them a few pennies for the purchase of more mops, but should they speak of having the power to close the saloons they say:

"Oh a mop is a beautiful weapon, but you never, no never could carry such a heavy thing as a ballot. You, dear angel, you cannot fight."

It is a great mistake to say that a woman cannot fight. She can if she wants to, but she knows that there is a better way.

You, my sisters, have come to tell us of this better way when all quarrels shall be settled by arbitration, when the wolf shall dwell with the lamb and a little child shall lead them. The millennium door of the future will have a little child's hand upon the latch.

Our brothers have made one great mistake, they have filled their own sphere and have defined and tried to fill ours too. Too large an undertaking altogether, and they have brought dire confusion to our country.

Now they reach entreating hands to us to help them and we are ready to come to the rescue. A male oligarchy is not a republic. (Laughter.)

THE CHAIRMAN: It seems a work of superogation for an humble and disfranchised specimen of the human race to introduce a high official. I have the honor, however, to introduce Mayor Blee, of Cleveland, whom I doubt not is a most honorable gentleman, and I know he is a very brave one.

MAYOR BLEE. (On behalf of the city of Cleveland): Miss Frances Willard, president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, ladies and gentlemen: As mayor of the city of Cleveland, I greet you, and it affords me great pleasure to be present this evening at the opening of your majority convention. The W. C. T. U. had its origin right here in the city of Cleveland, twenty-one years ago, in the year 1873. A great many very important matters have had their origin in Ohio, and have made their debut in Ohio's metropolis, Cleveland.

Ladies and gentlemen, both from home and from abroad, as mayor of the city of Cleveland and on behalf of our citizens, I extend to you a most cordial welcome and the unrestricted freedom of the city of Cleveland during your sojourn with us. We have in Cleveland, as Mrs. Perkins remarked, a law-abiding, big-spirited, big-hearted people. We ask you to hold your next convention in Cleveland. We trust that you will be so warmly received and kindly treated on this occasion that when you do adjourn, you will adjourn to meet in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1895, and we offer as an extra inducement, to the ladies particularly, that in 1895, they can do here in Ohio what they can do in very few other states in the Union, that is, they can vote next spring.

THE CHAIRMAN: Our next welcome is from the general of the Ohio regiment in the G. A. R. (Grand Army of the Republic of Women). Our comrade leads the veterans of the host, Mrs. Henrietta L. Monroe, of Ohio.

HENRIETTA L. MONROE.

The event which brings us here is of deepest significance, of most intense interest, and of vast importance, not only to this state, but to this nation, and to all countries. Twenty years ago the wondering gaze of the world was fixed upon Ohio; for from her went "the first goings out of power" which have swept to the ends of the earth, and here the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union came into being.

It is meet and fitting that we should come up here a great gathering to celebrate our twenty-first anniversary at our birth-place, and here recount the wonderful way by which the Lord has led us.

Our hearts have longed for this homecoming, and in behalf of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Ohio, we welcome you with all the hospitality of Christian friendship, and with a generosity of warm sisterly affection, whose length and breadth, and height, and depth cannot be measured by words; with a welcome so glad and sincere that it shall shine forth in loving deeds while you tarry with us.

We welcome you, our dear honored president, home from foreign shores, from which you have returned with renewed strength and vigor. We welcome you back, where twenty years since, you deliberately laid down beneath your feet all prospect of worldly gain, earthly advancement and honor, counting these things as nothing, and here consecrated your all to this work, which is for the uplifting of humanity, the advancement of Christ's cause, that your efforts might hasten the establishment of Christ's kingdom upon earth, that He whose right it is shall reign this Nation's king. We welcome you, dear president, because you have led us up to a broader outlook, a more comprehensive view and to greater heights. We have seen thy works, thy labor, thy patience and how for His great name's sake thou hast not failed; for in all of this peaceful war thou hast endured as seeing Him who is invisible. Thou hast always stood for the right, for truth, for principle, for justice and equity; and although thou canst not hear these that are evil, thou hast always exercised towards them the pity, the tender compassion, the long suffering, the forbearance, the charity, the love which is like unto Christ, and we welcome you with love and devotion, and re-pledge our loyalty unto thee.

Dear president and friends, it is in the hearts of all Ohio women to do you honor, and from where placid Erie's waves wash this northern shore, to where the beautiful river kisses the sunny southern slopes; from the east where Ohio bids her neighbor, Virginia, good morning; from the west to where she whispers "good night" to Indiana, there comes a glad and joyous welcome from each and all, to you from the broad prairies of the northwest, to you from Maine to the Gulf, to you who hail from the shores of the Atlantic, to the coast of the Pacific, to you who came from the sunny south land, where side by side by the heroes of the grey and the blue their precious blood mingled together, thus making us one in hope, one in faith, one in purpose; a union of heart and hand that naught can sever. It is with delight we welcome these who have come to us from accross the seas, and we deeply regret it is not in our power to welcome in person dear, beautiful, precious Lady Henry Somerset, who has so ingratiated herself in our hearts, for her exceeding great kindness to our beloved president, and her own intrinsic worth, until she has become to us a sister tenderly beloved. We welcome you with all that this precious word implies, for you who heard the call of the Lord, when out of Zion a meeting had come, for the children who were cut off from without, and the young men in the streets, and straightway came to the help of the Lord against the mighty; and when he touched your lips and put his words into your mouth, which you were to speak unto all people, you girt your loins about with truth, put on the breastplate of righteousness, shod your feet with the preparation of the gospel of peace; unwaveringly you have carried the shield of faith; have with the powers born of God, wielded the sword of the Spirit, and upon your heads have been the glorious helmet of salvation.

While we have thus welcomed you, your hearts have been sad and heavy and your eyes moist with unshed tears that there is one less to welcome here to-day; one whose seat has never been empty until now, and while we mourn this great loss, may there come to each of us such a longing and thirsting for God's presence that we will reverently welcome the Holy Spirit to brood over us, to be filled with Him, to abide with us, that when our work is done we shall, like this dear departed sister, be welcomed into the mansions above and see the King in his beauty.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is nothing if not homelike. It would not be a complete welcome if we did not hear from varied members of a family. We have been greeted by our sisters and our honored brother and now the children are going to come and give us a welcome, I think, in song. I do not know, but they have wonderful variety in the way they do it, and we will give ourselves the pleasure, the restfulnes and the charm of allowing ourselves to be welcomed by children—Children of the Loyal Temperance League of Cleveland.

Three delightful songs were rendered by the children, led by Mrs. Rice and Mrs. Harris.

THE CHAIRMAN: Mrs. Mary T. Burt, president of the New York W. C. T. U., will make the first response. Mrs. Burt was here at the convention twenty-one years ago, and when I asked in the executive committee that all those present when the beginning of things was had, to rise, the only ones that rose as veterans in the executive committee were Mrs. Burt and the present encumbent. So Mrs. Burt is really to us one of these figures in the great movement that crystallized from the crusade, and has been loyal and true and full of results in the work from the day she entered upon it until now.

MRS. BURT: When a society or an individual attains its majority, it is an occasion not only of interest but of importance, especially so when the same hands that guided us in our infancy, and the same lips that blessed us at that time, are stretched out in kindly welcome now and speak words of loving greeting. And when we come back to you, our sisters, after twenty-one years, sacred memories have come to my heart. Again I sit in that crowded church filled to overflowing with earnest, consecrated women called from all parts of this country, an assembly of women such as the world had never seen before. Again I hear the tones of the organ pulsing through that great audience. Again I hear the hymns,

"Give to the winds thy fears, Hope and be undismayed," and

"Rock of Ages cleft for me, Let me hide myself in Thee," sung whilst the tears coursed down the cheeks of strong men. And it seemed to me that the prayers and the hymns of that time came from women on their knees, and they were full of the anguish that was in their hearts over the awful sin which they had come to plan and pray and work for, and it seems to me that as they uttered them they went straight from that church up to the great heart of the Eternal.

Again I see the face of Mother Stewart, and again I hear her voice ringing out in favor of the prohibition of the liquor traffic, straight and strong and true as it has rung all through these years, and for the enfranchisement of women. Again I see and hear Mrs. Lathrap; again I see and hear Mrs. McCabe and Jennie Fowler Willing and Mrs. Monroe, and again I see and hear one who through all these years has carried the white ribbon banner fearlessly and steadfastly forward—the one who saw farther into the future than any of us; one who has beaten down more prejudice and opposition as regards the standing and the position of women than any other woman in the country, one who has carried the white ribbon around the world, and we bring her back to you, our best beloved, Frances E. Willard.

We cannot bring to you all the women who made possible that great meeting in Cleveland. The faces of some are hidden away forever, and their voices stilled forever, and some are shut away within the four walls of sick rooms, but living and dead, sick and well, all have helped to make possible these grand achievements. Their sacrifice, their consecration, their denial, their love for the cause, have all made it possible.

What of the twenty-one years that lie before. I may say also that during these past twenty-one years this organization, in the face of criticism, in the face of the loss of friends, good and true, has declared that that political party and that alone which declares in its platform for prohibition of the liquor traffic and for the enfranchisement of women shall have its influence and its prayers. And permit me to say that woman is coming on.

I believe if the second majority of this National Union should be held in this city, that you will see that it will be in a new century then. We are catching its gleam already. It will be in the new century, and I believe from every State you will hear—for there will be no territories then—that the flag of prohibition floats over them. I believe women will come to that convention, not as we come, with our hands bound as they are and helpless, but they will come free and equal before the law with their brothers, and may God speed the day—may God speed the day. Think of it, mothers, why the saloon is just at our homes to-day, as it was twenty-one years ago, but God is working in His own way to bring about His own ends, and when the women of this nation come again to Cleveland, it will not be as now, but it will be with that little piece of paper which will, I believe, prohibit this traffic in every state in the nation, and it is for us to work and for us to pray. Some of us who are here to-day will not be here then, should the convention be held, but will have done our work, and we receive the baptism. We were consecrated, we felt the spirit of the Lord and heard his voice here in Cleveland as we never heard it before; we look into the faces of women at that time, shining with the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ and we received our mission.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is said that some of the most remarkable inventions came about through the blunder of the manipulator, or the student, and I think that a wicked invention on the subject of welcomes, has been inaugurated by my own stupidity to-night, that is, it might be well to sandwich in your response after you had your welcome, and our dear Mrs. Hammond was to have welcomed us and I was too taken up with the children that it escaped my eye, and now that we have responded to the dear ones who have welcomed us, let us have Mrs. Hammond's and we will respond to that.

MRS. H. E. HAMMOND, Cleveland.

MADAME PRESIDENT, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: The hope of the world in this temperance reform is the union of its Christian forces against the saloon; united we stand, divided we fail. We have had our rallies and our sallies from the different regiments of the great temperance army, and have been ofttimes defeated because one great reserve force failed to come to the rescue.

The W. C. T. U. intrepid souls have charged time and again into the very ranks of the enemy, and then sorrowfully had to halt to educate the rest up to their standpoint. Owing to this want of harmonious action or education we see different colors flying at the front of different companies. Over there we read "A moral reform," over here "A political question," here is another, "Keep it out of religion," another "Keep it out of politics." You see whether talking to preacher or politician, saint or sinner, it is "keep it out," who says "keep it out!" Who wants it kept out!" There's a hot breath comes along with that whisper. I see no license flag in all this Christian army, but on the right the great Methodist regiment is shouting it "can't be licensed without sin." In the centre where the fire is hottest, we see a bullet-pierced banner in the hands of Frances E. Willard—"For God and home and every land, prohibition is the remedy," and coming in the rear we hear the tramp, tramp of the boys and girls, fifteen million strong, educated in Scientific Temperance Instruction, led by Mary H. Hunt, and singing with Anna Gordon, "We are Coming to the Rescue," and now coming up over the hills and through the valleys we see Christian Endeavorers, Epworth Leaguers, Good Templars, a mighty host, holding their banner high, "Saloons Must Go." Bring that banner to the front beside Frances Willard, lift it high, let us all fall into line and as sure as you are here to-night saloons will go. The Cleveland Temperance Alliance represents this union of forces in Cleveland. Christian Endeavorers, Epworth Leaguers, Good Templars, W. C. T. U., Catholic Total Abstinence Societies, Prohibitionists, and many others, numbering over seventy organizations. This strong organized force has bidden me to say to you, honored president, and the society you represent, welcome. Through this Alliance the uncompromising church says welcome. We will pray for you, work with you, and when the two-thirds disfranchised majority of church members get their legal rights we will vote with you. At the World's Fair we were impressed with a group of marble statuary. It told the story of hard times in England, when it was the custom to throw a limited number of labor tickets out of an open window into the crowd below who scrambled to secure them. The marble represented a stalwart man standing over the prostrate form of a woman, who with a babe clasped in her arms had fallen to the dust in the unequal struggle, the men waved aloft the coveted ticket which the woman burdened with the child had failed to secure, a little lad was clasping the man's knee and apparently pleading for the ticket for his mother that they might have food and shelter. That marble group represents the world to-day, womanhood, motherhood is handicapped and prostrate before force, and unable to cope with the enemy of the home.

The Cleveland Temperance Alliance, honored president, welcomes you to-day, as the leader of an organization that would lift that woman to her feet, put a labor ticket with equal wages for equal work in one hand, giving her the inalienable constitutional right to life, liberty and the pursuits of happiness, and place in the other hand a ballot to protect her home and children from the most fell destroyer of the age.

THE CHAIRMAN: We have had reason to feel ourselves acquainted in the most pleasant way with the Cleveland Temperance Alliance. The beautiful flowers that came to us with the most brotherly message from the president today, and Mrs. Hammond is vice-president, and it is a union of all the temperance societies of Cleveland and they recognize equal rights, and so we feel that this is a representative welcome and one that we most highly prize, coming from our own household of the temperance faith, and we are glad that the ring is so clear and the position taken so unmistakable. We will now have a response on our behalf from Mrs. Emma A. Crammer, the president of the South Dakota W. C. T. U., one of our young presidents, and one that is an example to the elders.

MRS. EMMA A. CRANMER.

MADAME PRESIDENT: I remember when I was a young girl finding one day written in my diary, in my father's well-known hand, these words: "Kindness sits upon the heart as dew upon the flower; it is as a morning star, an evening hymn, a dream of heaven." In the greeting we have received, surely those words have been verified to-night. And in behalf of the great Northwest I thank you, and am proud to represent in these exercises this section of our Nation. Many have an idea that the Northwest, and especially the Dakotas, is a land of blizzards, Russian thistles, and drought; but that is a mistake. We can raise almost everything out there excepting a mortgage and an umbrella, and I rejoice to say, that we have razed—to the ground—the legalized saloon.

Prohibition is the greatest blessing that has ever come to these states. It has closed hundreds of saloons, and placed in their stead, lines of legitimate business and trade, and has rendered safer and happier many of our homes. It has taken the saloon signs down and removed the liquor advertisements from our newspapers. Prohibition is teaching the children that the liquor traffic is out-lawed; that a saloon keeper is a criminal and to sell liquor is a crime; and best of all, as a people we have gone out of partnership with one of the most infamous traffics that ever cursed a civilization.

Cry down prohibition and you cry up the saloon. It means something to be a prohibitionist in 1894. The only correct attitude for the Christian church and for Christian manhood and womanhood toward the liquor traffic is that of uncompromising hostility. It is the business of the church to echo God; but that echo will never ring out loud and clear so long as we have a saloon for a sounding board, and the ballot box holds whiskey ballots dropped from the hands of Christian men. In France no one approaches the ballot box without first uncovering his head as a token of respect. And why should not the head be uncovered, and why should not the sandals be removed from off the feet as we approach the urn of destiny? There is no human agency so potent to the answering of our own prayers as the ballot box. It holds more weal or woe; more riches or more poverty; more laughter or more tears than any other factor in our civilization. It may be a horn of plenty pouring out happiness for every heart; or it may be a Pandora's box from which the evils of a hundred years are let loose upon the world; but it should be as sacred as a child at prayer; indeed every ballot that is cast is a prayer, but it is often the saloon-keeper's prayer, and hearts go on aching and breaking.

Some wonder why woman asks for the ballot. It has been truthfully said that "woman asks for the ballot that she may better meet her obligations to herself, to her country, and to her God. It is not that woman is so given to politics, but she sees 240,000 saloons pursuing her sons and 60,000 brothels her daughters; and with the mother instinct that makes even the timid quail ruffle her feathers in defense of her young, she asks for the ballot for her own and their protection, and she asks it as a right that has long been withheld."

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union stands for all great reforms of the age. Million-handed labor is to-day knocking at the door of every church, philanthropic organization, and political party, and anxiously asking "What will you do for me? What is your attitude toward the enemies that eat up my subsistence?" And we answer the Woman's Christian Temperance Union would aid in every legitimate way in securing to labor the bread it has earned. Labor has no greater enemy than the saloon. It robs the arm of its skill, the hand of its cunning, and the brain of its power. William T. Stead intimates that the saloons of Chicago did more for the unemployed last winter by means of the free lunch, than all the churches, all the charitable institutions combined. Shame on such nonsense. The free lunch in a saloon is to the unemployed what the little piece of cheese in a mouse trap is to a mouse. It is a delusion and a snare. Let the saloons of this country give back to the laboring man all they have taken from him, and there will be no need of a free lunch from one end of this nation to the other. I am proud that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union can take noble part in the solution of these problems.

Again I thank you for your words of greeting. May this convention be a benediction to this city and a blessing to us all.

THE CHAIRMAN: The next thing set down on the program is "Silver Chimes" the audience. We have thought it well to lift this part of the program, and it will be introduced by our treasurer, Mrs. Barker.

MRS. BARKER: The delightful jingle on the program is designed to help on this great work, and it is my privilege tonight to introduce to you one of the brightest women of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, Mrs. Narcissa White Kinney, president Oregon W. C. T. U.

MRS. KINNEY: I came from far away Astoria, the city founded by Jacob Astor, the largest city in the United States without a railroad communication with the rest of the world. (I am not a good real estate boomer.) I once said that in Boston and the next day a real estate agent of the Baltimore & Ohio railroad came and offered me a commission, but I vow it is not my purpose tonight. I want to tell you a little incident. We have not a railroad, but you know in the West we have very progressive, energetic men, and so the men of Astoria got together and said we must have a railroad. And they called a meeting and discussed ways and means and decided to raise a hundred and fifty thousand dollars to start that railroad and appointed a committee to go around and get subscriptions for stock.

There was one man who owned a great deal of land in Astoria, and a great deal across the bay and no individual there would have been more benefited by a railroad than that individual, but he was rather a close man and no one could remember when he had ever given anything for a charitable purpose. Now, this was a business proposition, and everybody said, we will get Mr. B.'s name, get his signature for a hundred shares of stock of $100 each, and it will give us such a boom that everybody else will subscribe liberally. The agent went to him and said, I suppose you are in favor of a railroad. "Oh, yes," he said, "I think I am in favor of railroads, count me in every time, they are the civilizers of the world, and in this, the greatest seaport of the Pacific Coast, if we just get that railroad, we would be a metropolis of the growing West."

The committee began to take out their books. They thought they would get at least a ten thousand subscription to build that railroad, and they said Mr. Blank, "We are very glad to find you so much in favor of that railroad, now, here we are around soliciting stock, and we want a cash subscription for building a railroad. How much will you give?" The man said, "Well, if you can guarantee that that railroad will be completed inside of a year, and that it will just touch my land on that corner where it won't do much damage, and you will put a station on that point so that I can have free access to ship the products of my ranch, and if you will agree to give me a life pass on the railroad, why I will give you a free right-of-way and a cash subscription of—two dollars." (Laughter)

You have all heard doubtless of a railroad that was described once as a glass railroad, one that was built entirely of glass and on which the passengers were shouting, laughing and singing ribald songs, although every passenger on that railroad realized that the stoppage of that railway was a precipice down which that whole train would be hurled to destruction. It is the railroad of evil habits, but this great Woman's Christian Temperance Union is building another railroad. It is a railroad whose bed is the Gospel of Jesus Christ, whose tracks are the more than bessemer steel tracks of the Twin Commandments, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, and thy neighbor as thyself." Its cars are built of the sturdy oak of righteous principles and noble ambitions and aims. Who wants this railroad built? Who subscribes for the stock of this railroad? The books are open for subscription for shares of stock, how much are you in favor of it? How much do you believe in the railroad? It is said we will have some silver chimes from the audience. I now have the pleasure of announcing that music, and there are certain collectors who will pass around here and we will then sit entranced to the music of the jingle of the silver chimes. They will show how much every woman and child in this audience is in favor of this temperance railroad.

THE CHAIRMAN: We might put the platform in competition with the audience, and I believe we will by having some music—"There are Bands of Ribbon White" performed upon the stage, while the silver chimes are going throughout the audience. This is our World's W. C. T. U. song known and sung in every quarter of the globe by White Ribbon women.

Song, "There are Bands of Ribbon White," by the White Ribbon choir.

THE CHAIRMAN: Not to hear one of those beautiful Southern voices this evening would be to leave out an important part of the chorus. We shall now have our appreciation of all loving kindness shown us, voiced by Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp, organizer in Kentucky, and one of our most successful and beloved workers.

FRANCES E. BEAUCHAMP.

For me to attempt to express on behalf of this convention appreciation of the cordial welcome accorded us tonight would be like a dew drop essaying to echo the thunder of Niagara. We are welcomed to a city enshrined in the affections of every loyal white ribboner, to a state around which holy memories cluster. It was the virgin state Ohio that the power of the highest overshadowed when she conceived and brought forth that holy thing, the crusade. And you crusaders, veterans in our most holy warfare, as you look out on this convention, will see that "the child grew and waxed strong in spirit," is "filled with wisdom and the grace of God" is upon it, and will more than ever believe that as it has "increased in wisdom and stature" it has grown "in favor with God and man." We have compared our organization to an aqueduct conveying water from a mountain top to the thirsty plain. The plenteous supply of water had always existed, but the aqueduct man must build. So the eternal purposes of God's grace and love have ever been inexhaustible, but never has the world been so blessed with organizations, whose office and life work is to convey this life-giving stream to the famishing souls of men. It is true that as in the first place it was a rudely constructed wooden aqueduct, and the water was not unsullied so in the moral world it is but a fallible human organization, and our human ambitions, human frailties, our short-sightedness, our misunderstandings of each other, our narrow views of God and our weak conceptions of His loving purposes, all tend to render the Water of Life, which we bear, less inviting. These National conventions are to some of us as the mountain tops crowned with sunshine. We come here weary, often discouraged, we go home inspired with new energy and hope. We rejoice in the privilege afforded us at these annual gatherings of coming in contact with each other and right glad are we here and now to acknowledge our debt of gratitude to you for the inspiration and courage that has been born in some of us through this contact. We are each the product of all. No one of us will leave this convention just the being that she came, but will be shaped and molded more or less according to the several temperaments and dispositions. We all admit with the poet laureate "I am a part of all that I have met." So we are each helping all the rest to be, which is even better than being helped to do. As it is the building in of each individual insect life on the lives of all those which were before him that makes the coral, so our lives are being built into our social and civil fabric. Let us so order our being that the generations that come after us shall find a foundation of moral adamant upon which to raise its superstructure and mount Godward the civilization of the future.

THE CHAIRMAN: Are you not glad the South came with us? Mrs. Beauchamp works in dark and bloody ground, in the whiskey state, in the conservative city of Lexington.

Now, we have had a great variety in personnel this evening, and we are to close on a different theme from any that we have struck. I remember meeting Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson in Boston when she was a student in the Boston University, from which institution she graduated and afterwards she took the theological course in the same university. She is our editor in the W. T. P. A. of books, pamphlets, leaflets and she is one of our poets, as you know. Some of her hymns have been sung here this evening.

MRS. KATHARINE LENTE STEVENSON: I have been trying while sitting here this evening to follow that rule which Charles Reade gave a good many years ago, "Put yourself in his place," that is, I have been trying to put myself in the place of some one who may be in this audience outside of this great organization. I have been trying to think how such a meeting as this tonight would seem like to such a one and it seems to me that the very first thing which under such circumstances would impress itself on my mind is, that this body of women have a very good opinion of each other. Well, that is one of the charges, you know, that is brought against us, one of our most heinous offenses is that we are a "mutual admiration society," and somehow or other, as I sat here listening to these gracious words so beautifully spoken it seemed to me that if I were on the outside that would not count as a very great offense. There is so much detraction, so much jealousy, so much vilification everywhere in this world that I should be glad to get for once into a meeting where everybody had something nice to say about everybody else.

Then, I thought, from the outside, I should think that this organization had done something in the past, if I never had heard of it before, and had come into this meeting tonight and heard Mrs. Burt's eloquent enumeration and the words that came from these veterans, I really think that the idea would have sunk into my mind that this organization had a record back of it and that it had done something which gives it a right to a place in history, something that gave it a right to be glad and rejoice in this, its twenty-first anniversary, and I should be thankful, I think, even from the outside, for all that the past recorded.

It seems to me that another lesson would have come to me and that would have been that every advance step had been because somebody under the might of a great conviction had tried to take the next step; somebody empowered with the divine spirit tried to do the thing which came next absolutely regardless of consequences and that following the next had been following the Divine leading until it had come out into the large place where this society stands.

And then one thing more, I believe I should have come to the conclusion that it must have a great future. There is a logical continuity of things generally; causes produce effects. The same Divine impulses which have brought the results thus far must carry it on to larger, to grander results in the future.

But now I just want to drop my incognito, if you will allow the expression. Thank God I am not on the outside! If I am thankful for anything in this universe today it is that I am heart and soul, might, mind and strength, every bit there is of me, and every bit—I was going to say—there is not of me, that I want to have of me, a W. C. T. U. woman. This organization is woven into the very fibre of my being, I love it with a love that passes words, because to me it stands for so much that is highest, truest, grandest, best for this world's future, for the incoming of God's Kingdom, for the building up of His righteousness.

Dr. Buckley, of whom perhaps, Dr. Willard, you may have heard, at a public meeting where I heard him speak once in Boston, used this figure of speech, which I have never forgotten. He said that in long ages past a magnolia grew tired of its sweetness and wanted to become a pine, and as in fable there is always given to inanimate things the power which it desires, it was able to work out its wish and so its arms began to grow upright, its bark began to thicken, and lost its fragrance until at last it had accomplished what it was seeking, and instead of a magnolia it stood a very poor specimen of a pine. The application in Dr. Buckley's mind is not far to seek, but it seemed to me that the mistake in that figure lay where the mistake in most arguments lies, not so much in the application as in the premise. The magnolia does not want to become a pine. It thinks there are quite pines enough, and that the Lord knew what He was about when He made the magnolia. What it does seek to do and long to do, is to become the ideal magnolia, the perfect woman, nobly planned, who together with the perfect man, nobly planned, (and he is yet to be born,) shall work out the larger civilization, the grander future, the truer outcome, the fuller Christianity of the years to come.

Song.—"Press On."

Benediction by Mrs. Stevenson.

Adjournment.

SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 17TH, 1894.

The convention was opened at 9:30 a. m. by singing, "Blest be the Tie that Binds."

Then followed devotional exercises conducted by Mrs. R. B. Hall.

Minutes of the previous day were read and approved.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is the wish and was the action of the executive committee that we should ascertain how many women are delegates here now who were delegates twenty-one years ago. As I stated yesterday in the executive committee there were but two, Mrs. Burt of New York, and the president. I will now ask that any delegates present now who were present as delegates at the convention in 1874 will please rise.

Mrs. Emily McLaughlin, National lecturer, tells us she was here in 1874, also Mrs. Monroe, so we have two who have risen. Now, I honestly thought that when we should ask all those who were here in 1874 should come to the platform there would be a regular flocking up here. I forgot how twenty-one years decimates a host, so that we have only on the floor three including Mrs. Burt, and on the platform three, only six of probably two hundred women who were here in 1874.

It was moved that Miss Greenwood be invited to a seat on the platform, as she was a regular crusader, though not a delegate at the time. Carried.

The Chairman announced that Mother Thompson desired to say a few words, and suggested that every one be quiet.

MRS. THOMPSON: I do not like to be reminded so much that I am getting older, and that I am going to die. I know that and it is not worth to be always talking about it. I want to feel that the reason my voice is weak is because I have had two attacks of la grippe and one of bronchitis, not that I am seventy-eight years old at all, because old people sometimes have very powerful voices. But I want to tell you what you want to hear before I lose all the voice I have, that I was a bona fide elected delegate to the first convention that met in Cleveland, of the society now called W. C. T. U. It had no name then, but it was named at that convention I think. Well, the crusade zeal of our county and the district has gotten up so high that our men—for women didn't carry purses in those days,—our men raised the money to pay all my expenses and placed it in my hands for the first and for the last time. And when I got home I had $5.75 left, and I was so honorable in my temperance work and considered that one of the tender points that I went out the next morning and visited the store of the gentleman who handed me the money and returned it to him, and he said, "Now, I know that your society is going to prosper, you are an honest set of women." Now, let us all stick to that.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid she was honestest of the lot; I never heard of a parallel case.

A LADY IN THE GALLERY: I was a member of the original convention and a delegate.

THE CHAIRMAN: Then come down here where you belong.

Consent was given that our national evangelist, Miss Cassie Smith, might say a few words.

MISS CASSIE SMITH: I just wanted to ease Mother Thompson up a little on the age subject by telling her and the rest of you that I was reckoning it up yesterday and concluded that I was older than Mother Thompson; that I was eight years older in the work; that Lois Smith, whom most of you may remember here, and I began our work crusading against wrong together in a Congregational church in 1866, and she was a very great sufferer at the time the crusade movement arose, and she used to look up at me and say, as we prayed fervently and watched eagerly for the leader's movements, "If we are not in the crusade the crusade is in us." And so you see I feel it was quite proper when Mother Thompson offered to clasp her hand in mine across Miss Willard's back yesterday, where none of you could see it, I thought I was not out of place, and I hope you will not think it egotistical for me to claim my little place here.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think Sister Smith has given us a good nugget of expression—"I was not in the crusade but the crusade was in me," and the women who rallied all about the world were those in whom there was that spark of divine desire for good that made them respond and made that spark flame up when the great beautiful torch of the crusade was waved in the faithful hands of the women in Ohio.

On motion of Mrs. Hunt, Miss Bates recently elected State Superintendent of Public Instruction on the Republicant ticket in North Dakota, was invited to a seat on the platform.

Miss Jennie Smith was also invited to the platform and by consent the chairman invited all women ministers present to be seated upon the platform.

Mother Ransom, of Los Angeles, Cal., was also so honored.

The convention greeted with much pleasure Mrs. Jane Stapler, the Cherokee sister, a delegate from Indian Territory.

In introducing Mrs. Stapler the chairman referred to her history and work, and also to the fact of her having been entertained at Mrs. Stapler's home, at Tahlequa, Indian Territory.

In recognition of the vote the President said:

"It is very nice of you and I am much obliged. I think the greatest thanks I can get is that you should be patient enough in the course of the year, taking it up in sections and paragraphs, to read it. I do not ask you to do it under that length of time."

The order of the day being called for, the secretary read sufficient of the record to put before the convention the point under discussion, which referred to the amendment of the by-law in such a way as to create the office of vice president at large, the nomination for such office to be made by the president and confirmed by the convention.

Mrs. Benjamin moved to amend Article 1, Section 1 of the By-laws in accordance with that idea. After considerable discussion Mrs. Benjamin consented to hold her motion in abeyance until the report of the Committee on Credentials should be submitted and acted upon, and the preliminary report of the Committee on Credentials was submitted by its chairman, Mrs. Bullock, and adopted.

The special order of the day was resumed, and after prolonged discussion, it was moved by Mrs. Campbell, that this matter be laid upon the table, as the hour had arrived for the Crusaders' meeting. Seconded.

THE CHAIRMAN: The chair would ask if the mover of the motion is willing to hold it over in order that she might make a personal explanation before laying the subject on the table.

Unanimous consent was given and Mrs. Barker was called to the chair.

MISS WILLARD: This subject has been very much in my mind for the last several years. The desire was not on my part to have more power. I think you will bear me witness that I have not asked personally from the convention things that they would do for me. They have been only too ready to do everything. The thought was in my mind that inasmuch as the recording secretary has always had the right to name the one who stood nearest to her, so that they might be in harmony over the work, perhaps you would be willing that the president should have the right to name the woman—it would be in my thought for I have the woman in mind—the president of a state, because it would be natural to choose the president of a state because she knows the work of a large organization, it would be unnatural in my mind to choose any one else. The president, if she had a woman with whom she agreed, with whom the ideas and sentiment and outlook were harmonious, it would make less harm to the society in case the president could not act. If If the president has not the power to choose one who shall act when she is unable, then the office becomes an elective office, and of course you cannot tell who will be chosen. The people have not their power taken from them, because if the president brings forward a name that they do not think wise, they will have a perfect right to ask her to bring forward another, and so on, just as the President of the United States sends in the names of his Cabinet, and they have been rejected repeatedly in the history of our country, so there is always that check, that power remaining in the hands of the people, and I really cannot see why it is so terrible a thing to allow the president to nominate the woman who is to act in her place any more than to let the recording secretary nominate the woman who shall act with her. These things are said that you need not think that any undue authority was asked and the whole subject is left with you to think over. The exact method of getting at it is, of course, to be considered, but I wanted you to know directly from me what was in my heart and mind on the subject, and I thank you for your kindness. (Applause.)

Mrs. Campbell asked leave to withdraw her motion, which was to lay the subject on the table, and then made the motion that the matter be postponed until after the Crusade meeting.

Carried.

The next order of business, which was the Crusade meeting, was then taken up.

CONVENTION ECHOES.

KEEN, pointed and telling were the arrows of wit sent from the quiver of Mrs. Perkins' welcome.

THE Mayor's welcome was cordial and he extended to the delegates the entire freedom of the city.

THE addition of shaded lamps, palms and flowers gave the platform a festal appearance on Welcome Night.

THE three Catholic delegates stood while Mrs. Lake voiced their message to the convention in a clear, ringing voice.

HAVE you found your way to the headquarters of the W. T. P. A.? If not, you have missed one of the delights of the convention.

TEMPLE mite boxes and literature will be freely distributed at the Temple table inside the main entrance to the hall. Souvenirs are on sale for the benefit of the Temple fund in the main corridor.

TWO of the most notable faces at the convention are those of its two "Mothers," Mother Stewart and Mother Thompson. Read what is said of these beloved Crusaders in White Ribbon Portfolio No. 1. Sold at W. T. P. A. headquarters, room left of the platform.

SING, sing, sing! Did you forget your White Ribbon Hymnal? A good supply can be found at W. T. P. A. headquarters. Price, 35 cents.

CONVENTION ECHOES.

A VARIED program tonight.

THERE are 9,678 members in Ohio.

MR. J. B. HOBBS, of Chicago, is in attendance upon the convention.

MRS. INGALLS' splendid report, which was given Saturday, will be found on page 8.

THE rule for order during the reading of superintendents' reports is well enforced.

ONLY two days more of convention. It has been a genuine "feast of reason and flow of soul."

ELECTION of officers takes place tomorrow, Tuesday morning. Every delegate is expected to be in her place

"I BELIEVE the careful study of God's word shows there are two kinds of wine, not one, there."—Dr. Bashford.

MRS. HUNT'S map with only five black patches to mar its surface hangs, telling a object lesson, under the right balcony.

THE ten cent fund in response to Miss Willard's appeal in the time of need last winter has amounted to $2,762.

WE are ready to come and help our brothers because we realize that a male oligarchy is not a republic.—Mrs. S. M. Perkins.

A TINY picture of Miss Willard and the dates 1873–1894 are upon the delegates' badges, which are more than usually dainty.

AN undercurrent of sadness is irrepressible throughout the convention as at every turn we miss "the touch of a hand that is still."

MRS. CRANMER is indisputable authority that blizzards, Russian thistles and drought are not the sole products of the Dakotas.

TOMORROW afternoon occurs the memorial service for our beloved and departed comrade, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, led by Mrs. Helen L. Bullock.

THE gallery and rear seats of the hall are well filled with sympathetic listeners at every session, many of whom wear our winsome token of white.

OVERHEARD in the vestibule—Janitor: "When will the meeting be out?" Mrs. ——: "How can I tell? Don't you know this is a woman's convention?"

FOR seven successive years New Jersey has petitioned its legislature for school temperance education. "They have had a hard time," said Mrs. Hunt. The workers are now enjoying the hard-earned success.

SEVEN State W. C. T. U. papers are represented: The Organizer, Indiana; The Pennsylvania Bulletin; Pacific Ensign, California; Oregon White Ribbon; Colorado W. C. T. U. Messenger; Ohio W. C. T. U. Messenger; The Outlook, Rhode Island.

A CHEERY sign of progress is displayed in Colorado, that Beulah land, where the State W. C. T. U. will soon send upon its monthly rounds the new State W. C. T. U. Messenger, edited by the State Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. S. L. Teetor, of Denver.

IT comforts us to know that every delegate and visitor in this convention is aware of the fact that Mrs. Hoffman is president of Missouri, not of Maryland, as our types made us say yesterday.

"WOMEN of Cleveland and their Work" is the title of an interesting book by Mrs. Mary B. Ingham, one of our original crusaders, of whom it can be obtained at 138 Superior street, or of the National Temperance Society in the vestibule.

DR. BASHFORD'S sermon yesterday was a logical and incontrovertible setting forth of the fin de siecle problem. His conclusions were statesmanlike and supported by the plaudits of the audience. Read it, if you were not there.

A WINSOME young woman is soliciting subscriptions to our young woman's paper, Young Women. Do not say her nay, but if you have no daughters at home, send the paper to some one's else daughter, who may thus learn to know and unite with the growing and helpful Y sisterhood.

THE well-known, handsome face of the prohibition veteran, General Neal Dow, on our cover page will be greeted enthusiastically by the delegates, as the best possible substitute for America's "grand old man", who was expected to address the Convention to-day.

DOUBTLESS scores of new members are the result of the white-ribbon Sunday morning services in the churches of Cleveland, but definite data has reached us from one only. That is from Mrs. Helen S. Bullock, who spoke in Asbury M. E. Church and secured 22 active and 11 honorary members for the Wade Park W. C. T. U.

IN addition to the services announced in Saturday's daily, Mrs. Barker and Mrs. Trego spoke at Berea Congregational Church; Mrs. Helen G. Rice at First M. E. Church; and chalktalks were given at Jennings avenue M. E. and Free Will Baptist Sunday schools by Mrs. E. A. Blair, of Nebraska, and Mrs. Maude Green, of Colorado.

THE complete roster of convention as given at 3 P.M., Saturday, is as follows: General officers, 4; general secretary of the Y. Branch, 1; presidents' private secretary, 1; vice-presidents, 33; superintendents, 21; organizers, 8; editors and publisher UNION SIGNAL, 4; president National Temperance Hospital, 1; evangelists, 3; delegates, 357. Total, 433.

OUR Cleveland hostesses, whose pervasive care are felt through all the various arrangements of this glorious majority convention, are as follows: Entertainment, Mrs. Alice M. Terrell; Reception, Mrs. C. E. Tilliughast; Railroad Rates, Mrs. Grace P. Oviatt; Finance, Mrs. S. M. Perkins; Baggage, Mrs. G. R. Doty; Sabbath Services, Mrs. Mary A. Doty; Decorations, Miss Lulu Bradley; Music, Mrs. N. Coe Stewart; Overflow Meetings, Mrs. H. E. Hammond.

PULPITS in all the Cleveland churches, numbering fifty-four, were occupied yesterday by our women. Large and interested audiences are reported, and our work in its varied phases was presented by its ablest and most gifted exponents. The Y's held three important meetings, the main one, presided over by Miss Ensign, being in Music Hall at 7:30 p. m. The opening exercises were conducted by Miss Nichols of Rhode Island. After our national hymn, "America," was sung, Miss Parrish of Illinois spoke of the more active work of the women than men and the wider outlook for women in these later days. She said women did uot want to be called "queens" as long as "King" Alconol reigns. Following her Miss Kearney made on eloquent appeal for prohibition, which was heartily and repeatedly applauded. Mrs. Barnes spoke at Franklin M. E. church, which is known as the strongest temperance church in the country, gave a resume of temperance work the world around and appealed for recruits. Mrs. E. O. Buxton, formerly of Cleveland, also addressed the meeting. At the Hough Avenue Congregational church Miss Carrie Lee Carter of Missouri and Miss Mary Campbell of New Jersey addressed a large and appreciative audience.

NATIONAL WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

TWENTY-FIRST ANNUAL CONVENTION.

(Saturday Morning Continued.)

CRUSADE CONFERENCE MEETING.

(In charge of Mrs. J. T. Foote, of Ohio.)

After all the crusaders in the hall were called to the platform, a solo "Nearer, My God to Thee" was sung by Mrs. Bertha Oviatt Cox, daughter of Mrs. Oviatt, a faithful crusader, whose labors on behalf of this convention have so fatigued her as to make it impossible for her to attend.

In opening the scripture lesson, Mrs. Ford said:

"In the hearts of many of us was a lurking thought that perhaps God in some way was going to use his miraculous power in this work of ours, and carry us over into a beautiful land where there were no saloons. But it was a very short time before we learned that was not God's intention, but that our work was to act as an advance guard for Him, so we learned more and more to call upon God to come up to our help against the mighty. I will read from the last chapter of Deuteronomy, as we have so often read before.

THE CHAIRMAN: We have a double lesson in bringing forward the old crusaders, while we want the memories of the older ones to be freshened, we want still more the young ladies engaged in Y work to see how healthy it is to do this kind of work. We have great pleasure in introducing Mrs. Manley, of Akron, Ohio, who had the first inspiration I believe of this "sober, second thought," the W. C. T. U.

MRS. MANLEY: Very early in the morning of the Crusade I stood amid the spray that came from the incoming tide. I heard a voice whispering to me to go forward and battle with this great foe of our human family. The cross was heavy, the way was rough, but the great burden-bearer of the race was near by to lighten the burden and smooth the way. Again I knelt on the Esplanade in Cincinnati with Ohio's brave women gathered there and received a new baptism, a new inspiration, and then again at Chautauqua, showing that God moves in mysterious way His wonders to perform. While the body slept the spirit was active and in the night time I saw a host of women gathered from all nations, working in this one glorious cause. I woke from that sleep with the words upon my lips, "Oh, what a glorious opportunity." I knew those women were there. My room-mate said, "Seize it then." But nothing more was said, and we slept. In the morning she said, "You talked in your sleep." I wanted to know what I said and she told me. I said, "I was not asleep," and then I told her what had come to me. She said, "Go on, call a meeting to-day." I wrote a note to the Rev. Vincent, President of the Chautauqua, and he called a meeting and I saw the seed planted there from which this glorious temperance tree has grown, the branches of which encircle the world, bound together with white ribbon. Again our women in Cleveland twenty-one years ago, and a new inspiration came, and it has lasted me ever since, and that was the inspiration which came to me as we knelt on the sawdust in that board tent in Chautauqua, where we renewed our covenant with God to live and die for this glorious cause. That has lasted me all these years and although I have not grown as our president and many of the ladies have, my environments have not been such that I could, yet I have stood firm with my feet planted upon the Rock of Ages and my heart is still warm in the work and my resolution is to go on in this glorious cause and do what little the Master has told me to do until I shall hear the words: "Alcoholism is banished from our land."

THE CHAIRMAN: We have with us another name that is national and world-wide, and we will now hear from Mrs. Sarah Knowles Bolton.

MRS. BOLTON: I thought to-day as I sat here of these women in Ohio, the women in Cleveland, who, twenty-one years ago, or about that, went two by two, five hundred of us, along these streets, stood in the saloons, stood sometimes on the sidewalk, sometimes received kindly, sometimes mobbed. In the towns around Ohio we have been through the same thing. I said to myself if we could have looked forward to this day twenty-one years ago. But we couldn't. This thought has been strongly in my mind, there isn't time to tell about the different incidents. This thought has come to me strongly, the words that are on the tablet in Westminster, applied to Charles Wesley, who wrote so many thousands of hymns, "God burries the workman, but he carries on his work." That is the grand thing about this work of ours. A great many of us in this city have gone, for one reason or another, many of us have been laid aside from work. But let us carry away this thought and this comfort, the young people are coming on. I have written my books a good deal for the young people, because I love them. I am glad to have my only boy proud of his mother as a crusader. These young people have the world before them. Charles Wesley had a grandmother, Susanna. There are twenty-five million adherents of the Methodist church and six million members, I am told, and Charles Wesley owed what he was to Susanna, his grandmother, and so the next generation will owe what they are very largely to the mothers of this.

Mrs. Foote then presented to the convention Mrs. Louisa Fee Hedges, the daughter of Mrs. Fee who was put in jail in Cincinnati at the time of the Crusade, and then requested the singing of the hymn, "How Firm a Foundation."

MRS. FOOTE: We have with us Mrs. N. Coe Stewart, who at the time of the movement, when it was said that we didn't do our housework well, said she would sweep out her house after she had swept out the State.

MRS. STEWART: There are many mighty forces with which we are familiar. The earthquake, the cyclone, the flood, and the tidal wave, which swept over the country and leave wonderful changes that in the natural order of erosion would take ages to accomplish. So twenty years ago the temperance movement of the world experienced a cyclone. The women of the country found themselves swept out from the seclusion of their homes and landed face to face with the saloon. And this for the first time changed the aspect of the temperance movement. Instead of working with the poor, irresponsible drunkards as all temperance work had been heretofore, we realized for the first time that the saloon was the object at which we should send all our forces, and which we should use our powers to extinguish. Now, for the first time, the nation was face to face with its great enemy. We bowed before the saloon, we got on our knees before the saloon and the saloonkeeper, we begged of him and pleaded with him and pleaded with High God to do away with this dreadful business. We did away with many of the saloons, they passed out of existence, but sprang up again with a wonderful life force which we could not understand until we drew ourselves back and took a perspective from which we could see what we were fighting, and we found that there was a great octopus of which the saloons were only the little feelers, an octopus that had its millions and millions of little pores with their suction on the government. Then we began to realize what we had to deal with and we said this thing must go. Now, how? Why, by the legal enactments, by majorities ruling, by saying that no such octopus shall exist in this government and so we said we will prohibit this thing and we will work for prohibition.

Song, "My Faith Looks up to Thee."

Mrs. Foote announced that two minute speeches would be made, and then introduced as the next speaker, Mother Thompson, of Hillsdale, O.

MRS. THOMPSON: When I was young I could say a great deal in two minutes, but I tell you we old ladies have to not only think awhile but to utilize our strength and we hardly get ready to talk till the two minutes are gone. But I just want to endorse every word that the last dear young sister said, for she will never grow old, Mrs. Stewart. That has been the cry at our house for many a long year, prohibition wont prohibit, and I say, "Why wont it, my husband?" But that question has never yet been answered to my satisfaction and still I am teaching, "Go it anyhow, and leave the results to the Lord." (Applause). And so that is as far as I have got in politics, gentlemen reporters. I am an old fashioned crusader, and unfortunately I have not a streak in my poor old brain, and had not in my young brain, of parliamentary usages. I am an old-fashioned mother. I govern my children with love, and a sweeter set never lived, and I have got four of the eight left on earth, and four better children no mother ever had, and I don't know a bit more about parliamentary usage today than I did the first day of the crusade. But I will tell you what I do know, I know that this white ribbon host is made up of consecrated motherhood, and I know there is One who rules for us who never makes a mistake. And I am easy while we have got Sister Benjamin and a host of others following in her train, for I consider her the grandest on that subject that I ever met. She has got a great head. Now, here is what I want to get at. What we want is, as dear Mrs. McCabe said in our first convention, we want cansecrated common sense, and it towers above parliamentary usage ever so far. Now, this morning I was dying to get up, but I was afraid to trust myself, for I am an old ignoramus on all these technicalities. But I did want to say when I married my husband, and he got the license, there was not one single word in it about a substitute in case I got sick. (Laughter and applause). And the first time I did get sick they didn't call a family convocation and have a constitutional decision as to who would be brought in to help me out, but they came up to the good woman herself and said: "Mother, we need your place supplied for awhile, whom shall we get?" And I had the woman in my mind, and I said: "Get her, she will make us all right," and the message went and she was there before dinner and everything moved on smooth as oil, and everything she wanted to know about the housekeeping, the children and the husband she came to me and we did not have a jar. Now, I want to say this, dear sisters of this grand Union, go and do likewise for our beloved Frances Willard. (Great applause.)

Song.—"Hold the Fort."

The Chair then introduced Mrs. Henrietta Moore, of Springfield, who made a few remarks and then led the convention in prayer.

Mrs. Perkins read to the convention the following communication:

To the National W. C. T. U. Crusade Meeting, to be held in Cleveland, Ohio, the 16th of November, 1894.

DEAR SISTERS: In my providential retirement by an attack of apoplexy, I look out upon your work with my former interest and see one after another called from our ranks to their everlasting inheritance. But I am comforted in that God is raising up others to fill their places. Therefore, my word of cheer is,

"Forward and fear not; though trials be near,
The Lord is your refuge, whom should you fear."

In Christian fellowship,
HANNAH B. TATUM, Denver, Colorado.

The battle hymn of the Republic was sung by Mrs. N. Coe Stewart, the audience joining in the chorus.

Mrs. Parish, of Michigan, announced that the Michigan delegation had just received a beautiful white ribbon having the name of the Michigan president printed upon it and the word "Mispah," with the words "Michigan delegation for 1894."

By request of several delegates, this token from Michigan's president was sent to the platform and exhibited.

THE CHAIRMAN: I know that it touches our hearts deeply. It is just like her own beautiful face and thoughtfulness to send it. I can hear Mary Lathrap's bright voice saying: "Michigan, my Michigan."

It was discovered at this point that Mrs. Jennie Fowler Willing, who presided at the first convention in this city, had just arrived from New York, and by unanimous vote, she was made a full member of the convention and invited to the platform.

MRS. WILLING: I was just thinking the bible speaks of the time when he that is married shall be as he that is not. I think twenty years has brought quite an advance when a woman can get up out of the sleeping car and come before a big convention and be received heartily and lovingly as I have been. My heart has been with you many times. This time I am glad that my face can be before you, and I am very grateful to you that you will let me drop right into the ranks where I was twenty years ago.

On motion of Mrs. Campbell, the order of business to be taken up immediately following the Crusaders' conference was postponed until after the reading of the minutes at this afternoon's session.

The following telegram was read:

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Miss Frances E. Willard, President W. C. T. U.

The general Assembly of the Knights of Labor convened in this city acknowledge your warm and fraternal feeling and your kind words and encouragement and have arranged for your delegates' address. May the deliberations of your convention be productive of much good for the uplifting of humanity.

J. R. L. SOVEREIGN, Grand Master Workman.

Adjourned with benediction by Rev. Townsley.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

The convention met at two o'clock and was called to order by Miss Willard. After singing "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," the devotional exercises were led by Miss Ida H. Read, Vermont's president.

The minutes of the morning session were read by the secretary and adopted, with some corrections.

THE CHAIRMAN: I would be glad to have it noted that the Chair has received a telegram stating that Samuel Gompers, who is the head of the American Federation of Labor, has indicated a fraternal delegate to this convention. The name was not given, but I presume we shall hear further.

The order of the day being called for, Mrs. Benjamin was called to the front.

THE CHAIRMAN: I want to say that in what I said this morning on the subject, I ought to have had the finesses and wit to have said it in an impersonal manner, as relating to whoever will be your president in the future. I spoke as though I expected I would always be your president, you have got me into a bad habit on that subject, and I never thought that I was carrying this impression till some good woman nudged me behind and said: "You are speaking as if you expected to be always president." So I wish you would go back and put that all in third person.

MRS. BARKER: I want to say that I have received a very pleasant letter from the president of New Mexico, announcing that she has just been ordained a full fledged minister by a set of Congregational ministers. I begin to think there will be hope for any of us.

THE CHAIRMAN: Mrs. Stevens reports that our delegation now numbers 398. You know I am fond of round numbers and I hope it will come up to 400. As it is, it is the largest delegation we have ever had, excepting last year at the Columbian Exposition.

It was moved and carried that the time should be limited to two minutes of speeches, on the amendment before the house.

MRS. BENJAMIN: I am about to do, Madam President, with the consent of this body, a thing that I have never done in all my life, and that is to ask consent for a personal statement. Consent was given.

MRS. BENJAMIN: First of all, I wish that something may be done to arrest our president in her mad career, as she has openly declared that she wishes to belong to the "400."

THE CHAIRMAN: You have it, Mrs. Benjamin. The 400 here are the true aristocracy.

MRS. BENJAMIN: By consent then, I withdraw my motion made this morning and move the adoption of the following by-law: "It shall be the duty of the president to preside at all meetings of the Union and also at all the executive committee meetings. And she may also nominate one of the vice-presidents, to be known as vice-president at large; said nomination to be acted upon by the convention. In case of the inability of the president to act, her duties shall devolve upon said vice-president at large, and in case of her inability to act, upon the general officers in the order of their election."

The amendment was put to the house and precipitated a prolonged discussion.

MRS. HOFFMAN: I am pained beyond all expression that when our president, after an absence of two years, comes back to us still in delicate health, and asks that a vice-president be appointed who should assist her in her work, that there should be this awful quibble about it. I don't think she is going to name me, so I can speak my mind; but no matter who she names, my sisters, I would be ashamed to object. She simply asks for one on whom she can lay the burden when she is incapacitated for the duties of the office, and we quibble about it and talk about the constitutionality of it when it is in the by-law anyway, and talk about salaries. Dear sisters, I can tell of states that have been more generous than that, and countries that have been more generous than that, and have outdone our boasted generosity and breadth among American people. I pray you that we shall rise to the level of Christian courtesy at least. I ask you in the sense of fairness and justice that when our president, after the years of service that she has given to us, years of service without compensation, that when she asks that she might nominate the vice-president already elected, and to be confirmed by this convention, so that you have it in your power to say no, let us be gracious enough and graceful enough and Christian enough to let her nominate this president already elected, to act as vice-president at large.

Dr. Anna Shaw closed the discussion by a few remarks to the same effect.

Question called for, put to the house and the by-law adopted by a almost unanimous vote.

MRS. HOFFMAN: I see that Mrs. Kells, so long associated with the UNION SIGNAL, is here. She has not a seat in the convention, and I move that she be invited to the platform.

The foregoing motion was seconded and carried.

It was moved and seconded that Rev. Anna Shaw be invited to the platform. Carried.

The following reports were then made:

TEMPERANCE LITERATURE.

MRS. KATHERINE STEVENSON, Chicago, Ill., Sup't.

Some one suggested to me since coming to this convention that I had been born rather late into the office of superintendent. I acknowledge the fair impeachment, since as a superintendent I am only a year old. But Sisters of the Board, and Superintendents of Local Unions everywhere, I have been here long enough to catch your slogan, and it is this: My department is the most important of all. Now, it seems to me as I read the question which heads this group that in my case it could be as well rendered, "What is seed doing to produce a harvest?" I think you will each one of you acknowledge that the most essential pre-requisite in any harvest is seed. Results anywhere can come only from causes. Deeds are the fruit of principles; principles are the fruit of thought; and thought, alas, genuine thought is a plant that is not indigenous in the average human mind. Therefore, the only way in which this harvest of thought which shall grow into principle and then into deed can be secured is by sowing seed. And how can we get it? Where can we get it? Where we get all other seed, from well-stored granaries which have been gathered from minds, which have been filled with thought.

There is a great deal of lamentation about temperance work that lacks results which is about as logical as a farmer complaining that he could not gather a harvest when he neglected the most important part of the harvest, the seed sowing. I have not forgotten that in the very early days when the baptism of work was first upon me, I heard Neal Dow say, in a lecture way along on Cape Cod, "Before we secure prohibition in Maine, we must sow this State knee-deep in literature." Friends, we could have secured many of our ends, if we had followed our work exactly in that line.

Now, what do we need? First, seed; second, more seed; third, good seed, plenty of it. As I glanced over Miss Willard's address, it seemed to me that among all her grand suggestions there is not one that comes with greater force directly to the center of the work of each department than that one where she recommends that the National appropriate a sum of money for the use and the free distribution of literature this year. If I could tell you the appeals which have come to me through the year—"We have just started a little Union here, we want some literature, can you not send us some?"—if you could know how I feel them drawing upon me from all the States and recognize the needs everywhere, you could understand why I feel that there should be some means of scattering these leaves broadcast over the land. And so I am hoping that our first step shall be in this direction; our next, that we may be able to find a more clear and more definite method of reporting our work already done, that its knowledge may lead to further doing. May God give his blessing on the seed sown that the harvest may be a hundredfold.

RELATION OF TEMPERANCE TO LABOR AND CAPITAL.

MRS. S. E. V. EMERY, Lansing, Mich., Supt.

Never in the history of the W. C. T. U. has the importance of this department been more recognized than during the past twelve months. We realize as never before the importance of redoubling our efforts to convince both laborers and capitalists that sobriety and moderation are essential elements in the solution of the problems that confront us to-day. Still more are we impressed with the importance of urging upon our legislators, both State and National, the necessity of abstaining from intoxicants while engaged in the sacred duty of law-making.

Though not adopted by as many states as we had hoped, nearly all that have adopted this department are doing good work. Reports from New York, Indiana and Oregon show that the line of march extends across the continent, while Texas sends a word of greeting and joins hands with us at the Great Lakes. The scarcity of literature has been one of the hindrances to the work. The publication of the Corner Stone devoted to the interest of all reforms has been continued. Much space has been given to temperance, and the teachings of Miss Willard and the UNION SIGNAL have been given prominence. Through its columns hundreds of our opponents have been led to see that the solution of the temperance question is an important factor of the labor problem. Thirteen states, the Territory of New Mexico and the District of Columbia have adopted the department. Many presidents write that they are deterred from adopting the work for want of means. The general and increasing hard times have crippled all reformatory work. Through the contraction policy money has been made scarce and consequently dear, while labor and its products have become correspondingly plentiful and cheap. Dear money and cheap labor mean competition in the labor market with thousands thrown out of employment. Thus humiliated and disheartened—with destitution staring them in the face—thousands of men who are sober and industrious under favorable conditions resort to the saloon, seeking relief from the evils they cannot escape. This course not only adds to their misery but brings them in disfavor with those who might otherwise espouse their cause. To-day 2,000,000 of men are in a condition of enforced idleness and consequent starvation. An idle element, especially when spurred on by hunger or incited by strong drink, is always a dangerous element. General Schofield recommends that this element be kept in subjection by increasing our military force, and to prevent the uprising of these starving millions, he has ordered troops to be withdrawn from our national outposts and established at the great labor centers.

We can but contemplate with sadness these preparations tending towards a military despotism. Therefore, as representatives of a Christian organization, shall we not recommend that Congress exercise its prerogative to issue money, and employ these millions upon public works, thus dispelling the cloud of anarchy that hovers over us.

MRS. CAMPBELL: Madam President, with the consent of the convention I wish to ask our National Superintendent what she would suggest as a remedy for the present condition of things.

MRS. EMERY: I would suggest that the government issue money and employ these two million of idle men upon public works. If greenbacks were good to put down a rebellion, I ask you why they are not good to stop a rebellion. It is the prerogative of this government to issue money. Then let the government issue money and employ these idle men upon public works at $1 or $1.50 a day. Just as soon as this idle element is employed, it will have money with which to buy the necessaries of life. Then comes a call for the manufactured goods, the manufacturer sees this and sees at once that he must employ more help, and when he attempts to employ more help he finds that the government has this surplus labor already employed; where he has been paying perhaps $1.25 per day, he finds that he must raise the wages even higher than the government has put them, and that he will be compelled to pay $1.60 a day. Now, this draws this surplus labor from the public works, and consequently the government will be relieved from issuing any more money than is actually necessary to keep these idle men employed.

A MEMBER: If the government does this thing, how shall we keep these men from spending this money in the saloons?

MRS. EMERY: Thousands and tens of thousands of these men are sober, industrious men. When the mills are shut down and they are thrown out of employment, they go there, many of them, for the first time to the saloons to drown their humiliation and shame.

THE CHAIRMAN: Mrs. Emery does not mean that that covers the whole ground, but part of the ground, and she wants us to think about and study that part of the ground. I believe there is a lot in this and it does us good to hear of the matter from the point of view of the laborer. A question is asked about Mrs. Emery's book. She says you can get it by writing to her and it costs ten cents. I will now introduce a gentleman who is the chairman on the committee of grievances and arbitration for the Central Labor Union. He comes to us as a fraternal delegate.

MR. ROBERT BANDLOW: Madam President and friends, I was pleased to listen to the remarks of my predecessor. Very seldom I believe the ladies listen to topics of that kind.

(Cries of "No, no," all over the hall.)

MR. BANDLOW, (continuing): If you had seen the manner in which the Cleveland ladies took up this question you would coincide with me. Never was I more pleased than when last week I received a letter from Bro. Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, asking me to extend fraternal greetings to this convention in behalf of the American Federation of Labor. I am but a poor substitute for Bro. Gompers, but in my humble way I will extend to you my most heartfelt sympathies in your work, and I only wish that you could put a little more vigor in your glorious campaign in order to relieve the distress under which workingmen suffer. We have heard but a moment ago that the contraction of currency had a great deal to do with our present deplorable condition. But, my friends, it goes a little deeper than the contraction of currency. You that look over the history of the last twenty-five years, will find that the industrial development of this country is such that at no time in its future history under our present competitive system will all workmen find employment. You have not only got to enforce upon the government the privilege of issuing this money, but it must be direct, instead of more bonds with which to buy the gold and silver of people who use their wealth for immoral purposes. You have got to place within control of the government all means of protection that it may so provide for every citizen of the community. Let us look at my own trade, the printing trade. When some fifteen years ago they spoke of a typesetting machine the person who tried to open his mouth on such a subject was riduculed and the asylum was said to be the proper place for him. Go to every daily paper in the city to-day, and you will find machines in operation, and the result has been that two-thirds of the men previously employed in that trade have been thrown upon the streets. The saloon that is so despised by you is about the only refuge that many of them have, and unless you direct your work in such a manner and in such channels that people can be removed from the vice of intoxication you will never accomplish anything. The saloonkeeper generally has an open hand, and the man that comes to him that has spent his money with him generally finds it out. He not only gives him food, but a glass of beer or whiskey stands beside it, and I dare, my friends, to say that if these very same men would go to many institutions that preach temperance in this city they would neither get a crust nor anything else. Now, I am somewhat encroaching upon the liberties extended to me in giving these greetings to you, but I desire to point out these evils. I am satisfied that the address of your president, together with the remarks of Mrs. Emery and the pamphlet that she has placed before the American people, "The Seven Financial Conspiracies," will induce you to take up a new course along these lines.

I thank you again, extending to you, in the name of Samuel Gompers, the greeting of the American Federation of Labor, which will meet in Denver in December, this year.

SCHOOL OF METHODS AND PARLIAMENTARY USAGE.

MRS. E. S. BENJAMIN, Portland, Mich., Superintendent.

I am sometimes asked? "In what way is the School of Methods related to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union?" A strange question, which proves that some of our own membership do not clearly understand the plan and scope of our work. The School of Methods is a department, and the most comprehensive by far, in that it has to do with all the other departments. If in any locality it can be said truthfully, our women are perishing for lack of knowledge, let those women betake themselves to a School of Methods, and there begin to learn the things that will make them wise. We are constantly urged to increase our membership; let us as constantly impress upon the unions, that to do effective work, the rank and file must do it intelligently. To this end the School of Methods was instituted. There are born leaders, but even these need to be trained. A woman may be ever so zealous, but if her zeal is without knowledge, she should never be given the leadership, for sooner or later, (usually sooner), she will bring her followers to grief. Our organization will never attain to the heights we are striving to gain, until intelligent, systematic, persistent work in our local unions is the rule, for the local union is the unit. Without it this magnificent Convention of women here in Cleveland would be an impossibility, so we should constantly magnify the local union. The superintendent of a School of Methods should not only be thoroughly conversant with the departments of work she presents, but she must be "apt to teach," else she is not the woman for the place. She must not only be intelligent, but must have the ability and tact and skill requisite to train others, so that they too, may impart knowledge, for a School of Methods is just what the name clearly indicates. We go to school to learn; we go too, to a training school to be taught the best methods of imparting our knowledge to others. A school of Methods if rightly conducted never stops short of instruction in the best and highest sense. When a woman is thoroughly versed in the work of a department and is able to present it so clearly, concisely and comprehensively as to make every hearer not only an interested listener, but a forever-after determined doer, she is the leader for which we long. This is coming to be realized for in no previous year has such exhaustive teaching been the rule. I believe the meaning of thoroughness was never so generally comprehended as now. The average superintendent seems to aim at the highest and best results. There seems too, judging from the reports, a sort of wholesome rivalry between the several schools which I most cordially commend. Emulation in its best sense is not to be depricated. Whatever else may be omitted in our Schools, Parliamentary Law, Usage and Practice should be taught, and until the great majority of our women are more firmly grounded in this essential knowledge, it should be made prominent.

PRESS DEPARTMENT.

LODIE E. REED, Indianapolis, Ind., Superintendent.

"Four hostile newspapers are more to be dreaded than a hundred thousand bayonets," Napolean thought. But, conversely, four friendly newspapers are as potent in the advancement of any moral cause, and believing this, at the initial Convention of the W. C. T. U. twenty-one years ago in this city, the plan of work and resolutions adopted looked toward capturing this ruling educational force of the age. So for twenty years this Queen Esther of our departments has gone in unto the King, and with gentle tact and courage, born of faith, besought favor for a work and organization chosen of God to save a persisting people. Is it too much to say that the royal Sceptre has been extended and the question asked: "What is thy request? It shall be granted thee even to the half of my Kingdom?" Never has the Press been so friendly as in the past year. Never have the great metropolitan dailies given of their influence so liberally. Religious papers have given unprecedented attention to the subject and so also have many agricultural and labor papers. Noticeable is the advance of leading literary magizines, in which it is not an uncommon thing to find a symposium or article on the subject, and not less important is their rejection of contributions having an opposite tendency. In forty-six states and territories the department is reported as doing organized work. Thirty-seven states report 2,546 superintendents, being about one-third of the unions reported. About one-third of the newspapers are furnished with W. C. T. U., and temperance items by local superintendents, the amount in the past year aggregating 37,100 columns. Besides this local work, state superintendents are in many cases contributors to several papers. The Associated Press has been generous in sending our news around the world, my associate, Miss Fockler, having supplied 512 type-written sheets to the four great agencies centering in Chicago. The National W. C. T. U. Bulletin, issued weekly since the first of May, has been sent regularly to over 550 papers and press workers, and to the Newspaper Unions, through which its items have been used in the "ready prints" of several thousand papers, reaching millions of readers. We have this year secured the insertion of temperance items—very small, but vital seed thoughts—in Ayers' Family Almanac for '96. It has a world-wide circulation of 17,000,000, and is published in ten languages. To aid in advancing our work more rapidly and systematically your superintendent has this year issued a manual entitled "Points for Press Workers," and has also provided through the kindness of Miss Willard, and other writers, the manuscript for several leaflets. No evolution of our twenty years' growth is more note-worthy than the W. C. T. U. Press, represented by our National organ, the UNION SIGNAL, with its bright coterie, Young Women, the Young Crusader, and the Advance Guard, issued by our white ribbon publishing house, the W. T. P. A., and twenty-seven State W. C. T. U. papers, a strong confederation of persuasive and pervasive teachers of white ribbon principles and methods.

On motion, the reports from this group of superintendents were adopted.

The Chairman then introduced Mrs. Ida B. Cole, Fraternal Delegate from the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Keeley League.

MRS. COLE: To-day the strongest arm is that moved by the dynamic power of heart throbs, and we have come into this work, many of our women from the baptism of sorrow as drunkards' wives and mothers, others simply from love to humanity, but we have come to the work realizing that to-day we need not only the fearlessness of a John Knox but the prudence of an Erasmus, that we do not need only the courage of Savonarola, but the cloister prayerfulness of a Luther, and we hope to bring to our work always not only the fearlessness of a Peter, but the tenderness of a John, and I am very glad to bring to you the fraternal greetings and the hearty co-operation and good wishes of the Woman's Auxiliary to the Keeley League.

THE CHAIRMAN: Now, wasn't that a model speech for a fraternal delegate?

The Chair then made the announcement that there were present 433 delegates at this Convention.

A fraternal delegate from the Royal Templars' Temperance Association, Mr. W. H. Crampton, of Lockport, N. Y., was then introduced.

The chairman then introduced the Rev. Dr. Thwing, President of Western Reserve University, who spoke as follows:

DR. THWING: I desire, Madam President, to invite you and every one of you heartily while you are in Cleveland to pay a visit to any and all departments of Western Reserve University, and in particular to the college for women of that university. I had the pleasure this morning of saying to the women of the college that this organization was the noblest organization of women anywhere in the world for doing any kind of work, and I told them I wanted them to have some part in it by forming what I believe they call and we call a "Y." I want you to come out and see those girls and make good my commendation. And if you come early do not forget also,—quoting the old rhyme, "Come as early as you can, and stay till after tea."

THE CHAIRMAN: I wish there were more college presidents who talked like that and asked us out to form a Y. I consider that Y is our Christmas present, a little beforehand.

A MEMBER: A birthday present!

THE CHAIRMAN: A birthday present to be sure, a Y in a beautiful college in Cleveland, I do not know what I could have picked out to suit me better, or you either

The following telegrams were read:

PORTLAND, MAINE.

MISS FRANCES WILLARD, President of the W. C. T. U.

Cordial thanks for your kind telegram. May God watch over and keep you and greatly prosper the labors of the W. C. T. U. in the future as in the past.

NEAL DOW.

NEW YORK.

MISS FRANCES E. WILLARD, LL.D., President.

Congratulations to white ribboners, the old guard that never surrenders.

A. B. LEONARD.

On request of the chairman, consent was given that telegrams of tender remembrance be sent to Mrs. Youmans, of Canada, and also to Mrs. Williams, who has been in the hospital in surgical care.

THE CHAIRMAN: Now, here is a little girl that I know you would like to see. She is Lady Henry's private secretary, and she gave me the help of this child while she is away, and there never was a better. Her name is Edith Good, but I am wont to call her "Good Edith." She is a little London girl and she is very shy, but I said, "I want the women to know about you because you have got a future."

MISS GOOD: I am very glad of this opportunity to tell you how grateful we all are in England that you have lent Miss Willard to us for two happy years, the outcome of which is the departmental work which is progressing so splendidly. I hope a great many of you will be there at the great convention next year.

THE CHAIRMAN: I told you to tell them you are a white ribboner.

MISS GOOD: Indeed I am. That goes without saying.

THE CHAIRMAN: You know this little lady—the indomitable little Japanese who is going to have a school over there in Tokyo. She is going to speak later on, but we didn't like to have her sit here and never say a word to her, and she such a little dear.

MADAM SAKURAI: I am very happy to stand here again in this convention. I shall have an opportunity to tell you something more next week.

The following telegram was read:

To the Women's Christian Temperauce Union for the meeting to be held at Cleveland, Ohio, on November 16, 1894:

I greet the Woman's Christian Temperance Union as the advance guard of the greatest reform movement of the new age; a movement that will ultimately prevail over every obstacle and hold the whole world in its embrace; a movement that will finally dethrone all the vices that oppress mankind, and establish in the high places of trust and power the virtues whose rightful reign will bless the people with prosperity and peace.

CHARLES C. BONNEY.

A long and earnest greeting from Francis E. Clark was also acknowledged.

The chairman announced that after a song by Mrs. Harris, Mrs. Jennie F. Willing, would lead in prayer, closing with the benediction, and asked for the formality of a motion to adjourn before this was done. It was moved and seconded that the convention adjourn.

After the vote was taken, Miss Willard spoke as follows:

THE CHAIRMAN: I think we all feel that we have invested two days in a very friendly, excellent, sweet-spirited convention, with a great deal of beautiful crystalizing of the Christian thought and philanthropy, flashing before our spiritual gaze, and I think we are all grateful and glad that amid all the sorrows and tenderness that came of it, and that mellows every heart that feels it there has been so much brightness and uplook and outlook. I am sure we are very glad that it is Saturday night; if we get a good rest on Sunday, and I think when we get back on Monday we shall be prepared to give undivided attention to the report of the superintendent's work, which is more interesting than it ever has been before.

Song, "Some Glad Day," by Mrs. Harris, the audience joining in the chorus, after which the convention closed with prayer.

SATURDAY EVENING.

YOUNG WOMEN'S EVENING.

The largest audience of any was present at the Y session presided over by Mrs. Barnes. A welcome song, written for the occasion by Miss Ensign, was sung by the large choir of white ribbon young women. Prayer was offered by Miss Ensign.

Scripture watch-words in place of the stereotyped Scripture lesson were then given by the young women National organizers, chosen to represent the different sections.

Miss Nichols, of Rhode Island, brought the greetings of the Eastern group, and presented a bunch of violets for her own state. Miss Gordon, representing Miss Willard, received the flowers on behalf of the National W. C. T. U.

The Middle States were represented by Miss Clara Parrish, of Illinois, who brought a beautiful bunch of pink roses, and Miss Dickson, of Indiana, after voicing the mottoes of the Western States, presented a large bouquet of chrysanthemums.

Miss Willard in the meantime had entered and received the applause of the audience. Miss Carrie Carter of Missouri, spoke for the South, giving the Scripture words and indicating the typical flower of each state as she held them, a large and handsome cluster in her hand,—honeysuckle, lilies, passion flower, cotton plant, Cherokee rose, yellow jasmine, spanish moss and mistletoe.

Miss Willard responded in part as follows:

I was thinking as I came down the aisle and saw this audience so intent and so kindly and I think a bigger one than we have had, and I was pleased that they came out in greater number for the girls than for the old ladies. I said to myself, "What is it about, why is dear Mrs. Barnes there in the midst of her group, her posy garden of girls and what are they wanting to cause to come to pass, because an organization is for the purpose of causing something to come to pass. That is the very root and core of it. And then I thought it is to make home happy. That is not a very new idea, but there is not a sweeter or a holier idea on the face of the earth. It is to make it a happier place, a purer place, a safer place, and then I thought what cute creatures girls are and what ways they have of doing things. I saw in my mind's eye a picture that came there when I read in the paper about something that occurred in the Ashland district in Kentucky a few weeks ago. A bright young Southern girl in Lexington was passing along the street; toward her came a tall, gentlemanly looking young man who in the most approved fashion made his courteous manners to her and stopped a moment and she said, "Charles, we have been friends for years and schoolmates when we were little, and I do not like to say what I must say, but I cannot recognize any farther a man who has a Breckenridge button on his coat, and it goes without saying that the young Kentuckian put a vigorous stroke on that button and flung it as far as he could send it.

We want girls to learn ingenious, womanly, gentle, smiling, imperturbable ways of making young men choose between them and the insignia of an indulgent and false and really unchivalric life and there are a thousand ways to bring it about. You know Carlisle wrote the epitaph of a great woman, and he said she had about her—I think it is one of the finest phrases ever used in literature—he said she had about her a "Soft invincibility." To have the softness without the invincibility would be to be a nothing and a nobody. There are alas, too many of just such people walking about. To have invincibility, the rectilinear method of doing things and not the soft, parabolic grace is to lose one's case before one begins, but to bring them together, a soft invincibility, is what I, as your elderly sister, would recommend to you, beloved ones, who have given me these fragrant flowers, as the best recipe for a successful life.

Mrs. Harris then sang a beautiful adaptation of the song "The Old Buckeye State," after which Mr. John Willis Baer, general secretary of the International Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, gave a brilliant address. Among many good things, he said:

The arm that you permit to encircle your waist should be capable of earning an honest living for two; the lips that touch yours that are not clean and innocent of intoxicating drink, before the "mystic sacrament" is taken, seldom belong to the one who will prevent the flame of home life from being a flickering taper, that finally smolders and is snuffed out. You know for yourself, you must walk the straight path of a white life or men will look upon you with disrespect. It should be just as true that a man needs to know that in the eyes of a woman, he too must be beyond reproach. Man needs it for his own good. Make us walk that path and live that life! Do you know your power? Mothers, continue to give your boys the best in your life, train, admonish, bear with them, and for God's sake as long as you can keep them under your own roof, keep them!

I have been told that when your elder sister, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, met in this city for the first time, twenty years ago, that the first debate that occurred was over the question whether the name "Christian" should be included in the name of the society. A few objected, "it would hurt the following" they said. Others said, "We are not here to seek a following; we are here to lift an ensign." "Young women you too have lifted that ensign and bear it forward with all the vigor and enthusiasm of youth. Never lower it. Be Christian and Christ-like, and seek to win others to your standard. Win young women; win young men to the Lord Jesus Christ. True, this is an age of specialists. Young men to work for young men, and young women for young women. But I say to you, your bow has two strings to it. You are to work for young women and also for young men.

Again I say, be Christian Christians, be evangelistic in spirit. Do your part in proving that the religion of Jesus Christ, cleans up men and women whatever their life may have been and gives them an opportunity to get square with God.

A sacred solo was sung by Miss Minnie A. Randall, of Cleveland.

Miss Belle Kearney, of Mississippi, in a bright and taking speech announced the collection, during which Mrs. Lydia Hoyt Farmer, of Cleveland, read an original poem, "The White Ribbon Host Marches On."

The World's and National organ of the Y Branch Young Women was briefly presented by its editor, Miss Jennie Stewart.

Miss Anna Cummings of South Africa, the leader of the earnest and enthusiastic temperance band of Cape Colony, was presented by the chairman. After giving the audience a clear and modern picture of "Benighted Africa," a brief account of its white settlers and the introduction of the much needed temperance work by the visit of Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, the speaker dwelt on the present hopeful state of the white ribbon movement in that far-off land. Concluding, she presented the salutations of the South African Y's in a most practical way by holding up seven ten dollar bills for the Temple to complete the tablet for the Y's and gave their beautiful mottoes: "The Master calleth for you." "I am but one, but I am one. I can't do everything, but I can do something. What I can do, I ought to do. What I ought to do, by the grace of God I will do." Mrs. M. L. Hutton of Los Angeles, on behalf of the South California Y's, then presented the national Y banner to Mrs. Emma Cranmer, who received it for the Y's of South Dakota, who have won it this year.

Mrs. Frances Graham, of New York, beautifully sang "Some Glad Day," the audience joining in the chorus. The benediction was pronounced by Rev. Edith Hill, of Pittsburg, Kansas.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON.

An immense audience greeted Dr. J. W. Bashford President Ohio Wesleyan University, who delivered the Annual Sermon on PROBLEMS OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.

"Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." Matt. 6: 10.

The aim of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is to bring in the kingdom of heaven on earth. You have chosen the field of applied Christianity. We shall therefore consider to-day:

I. THE PROBLEMS TO BE SOLVED IN BRINGING IN THE KINGDOM.

II. THE BEST SOLUTION OF THE PROBLEMS WHICH CONFRONT OUR CIVILIZATION.

a. THE PROBLEMS.

1. The Growth of Cities.

The first problem which confronts our civilization is the growth of the urban as compared with the country population. In 1790 three per cent. of the population of the United States was found in cities of five thousand inhabitants or over. In 1890 twenty-nine per cent. of our population was found in cities.

The question of municipal government is a national problem. If the corruption of our chief cities grows with their growth during the next half century, and if our urban population becomes larger than the rural population, the republic is doomed. Do we not need to pray earnestly today: "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven?"

2. The Unequal Distribution of Wealth.

Dr. Strong, in the New Era, calls attention to the fact that 200,000 men in the United States own 70 per cent. of our wealth. We believe in each man reaping what he sows. But we cannot believe that 200,000 men do 70 per cent. of the physical and mental and moral work upon which the wealth of the nation depends, and that the other 64,800,000 of us create only 30 per cent. of this wealth. New York city has over 1,100 millionaires. Yet 60 per cent. of her people do not own the roofs which shelter them. The wealth of New England depends upon the capital invested in her factories, the skill in which they are managed and the toil of the millions of operators. We recognize that the physical toilers are only one of three factors in creating the vast wealth of the eastern states. But when we remember the millions of them as compared with the few capitalists, and when we learn that 99 per cent. of the operatives do not own their own homes, we are afraid that they do not receive their just proportion of the wealth thus jointly produced. Dr. Strong reports that 100 Americans receive each an average income of $1,200,000 a year. But we learn from the same authority that in thesweat shops of our great cities women are making fine linen shirts at 75 cents per dozen, and fall overcoats at four cents an overcoat, and boys' knee-pants at sixteen cents per dozen pairs. Dr. A. T. Pierson found in certain tenement houses in New York City as many as eighteen men occupying in relays a single room ten by twelve feet as their sleeping apartment. Mrs. Helen Campbell, in a worse tenement district, found forty-five persons occupying a single room in relays. The Christian Union in 1892 discovered two filthy allies in New York City in which the death rate of children under five years of age was 73 per cent. One cause of the fall of Egypt and Babylon and Rome was the accumulation of immense wealth in the hands of a few, while dire distress was the fate of many. Our republic is approaching the danger line. Our civilization cannot last, indeed it ought not to last, unless we strive earnestly to remedy these inequalities. Individual freedom is a great boon. But we have carried individualism too far. We have placed the shining goal of wealth and fame in sight of all men and have cried to the multitude, "Run, run; the first man at the goal wins the prize." But, alas, multitudes are knocked down and trampled under foot in this mad chase for wealth. Our materialistic philosophy has crystallized in the Satanic motto, "Every man for himself, and the Devil take the hindmost." Unfortunately even that heartless motto is not true. When every man is for himself Satan gets all of us. Do we not need to pray this afternoon with added earnestness, "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven."

3. Our World-Wide Relations.

The relation of Christian civilization and especially of our republic to the world is fraught with possibilities of good or evil of which we little dream. During the century now closing the barriers separating the nations of the world have broken down. Christian nations are now face to face with nine hundred millions of people who do not accept our faith. Does any one suppose that, with the world now become one great neighborhood, the history of the twentieth century will be simply a repetition of the independent and isolated national careers of past generations. All experience teaches that diverse nations and alien races have struggled with each other whenever they have come in contact. The unfortunate war between China and Japan is simply another illustration of this principle. But Christianity is now in contact with the world. The very richest of Christian nations constitute one source of danger. They will enervate ourselves as they weakened Rome of old. At the same time they will awaken to cupidity of greedy and hungry millions; and we shall fall a prey to heathen hordes provided these million acquire in some measure our material civilization and learn our arts of war before they become imbued with Christian principles. Sixty-five million people in the United States hold seven-twelfths of the cultivatable soil of the globe. Four hundred million people in China are starving upon three-twelfths of the cultivatable soil of the globe. Millions of them have never eaten enough to satisfy their hunger. Immigration is the law of nations. Does any one suppose that with the increase of the means of transportation and with the awakening of these four hundred millions of people from the lethargy of ages and their mastery of our material sciences, they will still continue to starve while we roll in wealth? The Christianization of the world is necessary to the safety of the republic. We are spiritually asleep, dreaming the same selfish dream of race supremacy which has wrecked the greatest nations of the world. Meanwhile Jehovah is saying to us, as he said to the Jews of old: Either serve the world or perish. America in the twentieth century must say to all men, even to the Iagos and to the Giteaus, to the Lobengulas and to the Calibans: We are brethern, and lift them up to angelhood; or the Lobengulas and the Calibans will hoarsely hiss in our ears: We be brethren, and will drag us down to beastliness. Do we not need to pray as never before: "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven."

4. Intemperance.

Our sudden and violent political changes at least indicate the strange unrest of the people. In 1890 the Republican party, after the passage of the tariff bill, met with an overwhelming defeat; because the people did not find in that measure the financial relief which they expected. The Democratic party, after passing its tariff bill, has met with a still more overwhelming defeat, because the people have not found in the present measure that financial relief which they are blindly seeking. I would not belittle the tariff and the currency issues. Strong men may honestly differ upon these questions, and great political parties may legitimately crystallize around financial problems. But before we find relief, the nation must face another financial problem. The drink bill of the republic is seven hundred and fifty million dollars a year. Considering the loss of time and skill by the drinker, the accidents which occur, and the crimes which are committed through intemperance, the ablest statisticians in Europe and America declare that for every one hundred dollars spent in drink the financial loss alone amounts to another hundred dollars. Hence the drink bill of the nation is one billion five hundred million dollars a year. This is more than the average annual cost of our Civil war. That enormous expenditure brought us to the brink of bankruptcy. But our losses through drunkenness have extended from '65 to '70, from '70 to '80, from '80 to '90, from '90 to '94; and they are heavier to-day than ever before in our history. Abraham Lincoln declared that the republic could not last half slave and half free. When we think of this enormous drain upon our resources, when we contemplate the undermining of health and the loss of manhood upon the part of the rulers of the republic, may we not exclaim with greater seriousness: The republic cannot last half drunk and half-sober. In the language of Bishop Foster, "We must close the rum holes, or the rum hell will engulf Christendom." Do we not need to pray with something of the agony of Gethsemane: "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven."

b. What Light Does Christianity Afford for the Solution of These Problems?

But prayers, however intense, never answer themselves. Nor will God hear our cries, until we really pray. We have certainly learned through these eighteen centuries of Christian history that we are workers together with God. Whenever we really pray—pray with our hearts and with our heads, with our hands and with our feet, as well as with our lips, we may expect God to help us. Let us therefore turn again to these same problems and see what remedies are within our reach for their solution.

We remark in turning to the remedies that our only hope of safety lies in an abandonment of materialistic tendencies, and in the acceptance of a Christian philosophy of life.

GOSPEL SUFFRAGE MEETING.

This followed the Annual Sermon and was conducted by Dr. Anna Shaw.

Mrs. Hoffman, the first speaker, quoted several undoubted authorities from the Bible for Gospel Suffrage, beginning at the time of the creation when first inanimate creatures were brought forth, then animate, afterward man and the crown all, woman was created the most perfect of all.

Miss Elizabeth M. Yates summed up her brillant address in the phrase, "The great need of the world is more father in the home, and more mother in the government.

In introducing Miss Anthony, Miss Willard said in part:

"Forty-five years ago in this country there was a 'voice' that began to speak for the voiceless. A quiet school teacher in a State teachers' association in New York where the few men teachers sat in front to do all the voting and the thousand women teachers sat in the hall, not expected to talk or vote, this woman teacher having some ideas of her own and wishing to express herself on a certain question, arose. The dignified LL. D. who presided looked at her anxiously and said, 'What does the lady want?', thinking perhaps she was going to faint. But Susan B. Anthony stood her ground, and after a long wrangle they agreed that she might tell what the lady wanted, and she has been telling it ever since."

Miss Anthony: There was a time when your great leader introduced this personage to an audience when she thereby "jeopardized" her official head, and that is but one decade and two years more ago. I am delighted that at last the women of this great body have learned that there is but one way through which they can reach the desired goal, and that is through the ballot. I was summoned here to talk about gospel suffrage. What is gospel suffrage? It must mean if it means anything to good women a political system whereby truth and justice may be made to come uppermost in the government. What is a democratic-republican form of government? It is simply a system of mathematics. Every election is the solution of a mathematical problem, the solution of the question as to what class of ideas shall administer the government, what particular men, what particular measures shall prevail, and in order to make this government represent what we all want to have represented, the classes that favor certain ideas should be enfranchised. Now we have in this country represented at the ballot box all possible material interests to put into one government scale.

All manufacturing interests, all commercial interests, all mining interests, the grand Standard Oil business, the railroad business, the Pullman Car business, express, and every kind of business by which money can be made —and I can see in every one of your faces the thought of—whiskey. Yes, that with all other material interests is put into one political scale. Now, everyone of those interests is conducted by nine out of ten men, at least that proportion, and when you go to a political body, city, state, or nation, you will find their representatives watching the best interests and the particular measures that affect their business. The late investigation developed the fact that the Pullman Co., for instance, kept a heavy lobby at Washington always to see that no legislation inimical to the best interests of the Pullman Car Co. is allowed to go through. What is true of them is true also of the breweries, the distilleries and of every possible class of money-making business.

On the other hand, all the moral and the religious and the educational instrumentalities in this country are represented nine out of ten times by women who are disfranchised, and when you ask to have a moral question weigh or prevail in the government in that particular scale we have to offer but that one poor man out of ten. The result is that the material must and will pull down in every one of those questions. Tammany was redeemed a few years ago, but settled right back into the same corruption and degradation. Again we have an exposure and upheaval, but there is no balance of power to go to re-enforce the political balance, and so there is no possibility but what Tammany will again settle back into the same old conditions. The men who are associated with women have no more effect in politics than the women themselves. I have a great deal of sympathy for them, the teachers and ministers whose constituents are five out of six of them women. When those men go to Congress or the State Legislature to ask for appropriations, they have no possible influence, because behind them stand these classes who are disfranchised and have no power to make or unmake a single law or law-maker. You all remember how, in the face of a memorial from many of this class of citizens, Gov. Flower refused to sign a certain righteous law because Senator Murphy waived his hand at him and said: "Better not sign it." Gov. Flower knew that behind Senator Murphy there were voters, plenty of them to sustain him, while the long list of ministers could only claim as constituents nine out of ten women and you might send five hundred or five thousand ministers to the legislature to argue what is for the best interests of the state and yet nothing would result. It is no use to berate the legislators or the governor either; they can do nothing even if they want to, as long as women are disfranchised. If you would secure the enforcement of legislation you must have people enough with ballots in their hands to make a strong balance of power that can make or unmake political powers. Those gentlemen will tell you they are there to represent their constituents, and that, of course, means their voting constituents.

What is true of ministers is true of educators. Our teachers and professors are considered by the politicians as of no more importance than the women with whom they are classed and whom they represent.

As long as women belong to the disfranchised class it does not matter what they or their friends undertake to do. So that if the women have no mercy on themselves, if they do not care for their own right to respect and recognition, they ought to take pity on the good men who are associated with them, and come out and make their demand for woman's enfranchisement. Then and not till then will they receive the same respect as men.

There is no other reason for the general lack of respect for woman's opinion in this country. We have been classed with idiots, lunatics and criminals long enough, as we are still in the estimation of ignorant men and small boys.

I believe that intelligent and cultured men everywhere are ready together with the most intelligent and cultured women to work to remove from woman's brow this badge of degredation, this ban of disfranchisement, and are ready to recognize that it is a relic of barbarism, but the most ignorant man that walks to the ballot box, white or black, drunk or sober, knows and feels from the crown of his head to the tip of his toe, because he is allowed to vote, that he is superior to the best woman that walks the continent.

Rev. Joseph Cook, upon being introduced, said in part: I have always occupied a conservative position on the subject of woman's ballot.

I venture in this rather radical company to suggest a watch-word for the twentieth century.

I should like across the walls of this hall to write these words:

"No Simpletons, no Shirks, no Sex in Suffrage."

By "no simpletons" I mean the reading test for both male and female.

By "no shirks" I mean compulsory voting. Give me those two strategic safeguards, the reading-test and compulsory votes, and then and not until then I will say "no sex in suffrage."

My impression is that most of this audience don't know that the leading advance suffragists of this country are ready to have the reading test applied to both male and female voters.

Of course I would not take the ballot from any man who has it now, but so help me Heaven, I would follow the advice of Gen. Grant, and many another of our great statesmen, and proclaim by law that all who come into this country by birth or immigration after a certain date, say 1900 or 1925, and have the privileges of our common schools and do not learn to read and write shall never vote until they do learn.

I am sure the time is coming in the history of our civilization when we shall have to call upon the women to lift us out of the Slough of Despond. I think we shall be doing it within twenty-five or thirty years, and I am so sure we shall need that help that I want to be sure that we raise up the safe-guards absolutely necessary to make this help effective, to make it permanently valuable to our civilization. When I obtain those two safe-guards, the reading test and compulsory voting, I will vote for unlimited suffrage for women.

Dr. Shaw's closing remarks were, "I believe that that vermilion cord which shall drive voters to the ballot box will be given when mothers are teachers of their boys in their political duties and political service, and the mothers and wives will drag recreant husbands and sons to the polls when the whole family go together to the polls.

I believe that the school has come to stay, the family has come to stay, the church has come to stay, but if the church has come to stay it will only be when in the church women stand equally with the men, or the church will go back.

The school will come to stay only when woman stands equal with the man in the school or the school will go back. The family has come to stay when the woman stands equal with the man in the family or the family will go back. This republic has come to stay when the woman stands by the side of the man or the republic will go back and we will have the dark ages over again. Then will justice, truth and righteousness reign; we will grow and prosper together, men and women as God put them.

The meeting closed with the benediction.

MONDAY MORNING SESSION.

The convention was opened with the hymn, "Jesus, Lover of my Soul", after which Mrs. Jones, President of the Virgina W. C. T. U., led in prayer.

THE CHAIRMAN: Mother Stewart has sent a special, personal request to the chair which she passes to the convention. She is ill and to our great regret unable to remain longer and is on her way to the railway station to go home, an announcement that you will hear with regret. She asks for two minutes in which to say good by to the delegates. Is consent given?

Consent being unanimously given, Mrs. Stewart spoke as follows:

MRS. STEWART: I am glad of these two minutes to look into your faces, dear sisters, in all probability for the last time. I wish I had the time to say a great deal of what is burning in my heart, but I want to say this to you: These meetings, these labors, these prayers, these aspirations mean so much more than it seems on the surface. You are manipulating wires that will circle around the world, around and around and clear into eternity. The work you are doing to-day will meet you in the great beyond, and oh, sisters, if I can give you one sentiment above all the rest, let me tell you to throw out the life lines. Just for this one year, sisters, try it and go back to the old crusade spirit and work and go out and rescue those that the liquor men are destroying. Our blessed boys are being destroyed by this curse every moment. You realize that we are coming in to the midnight hour when soon we will all hear the cry, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh." Oh, let us have our lamps trimmed and burning, and let us have our harvest work done that we may carry up our arms full of sheaves to lay at the foot of the Cross. Let me give you this warning, sisters, as the last, oh, stand behind the Cross of Christ. "In the Cross of Christ I glory." Through that we have thus far prevailed, and through that we shall conquer. And now the time is up, God bless you.

At the request of the president, the audience arose and gave the Chautauqua salute.

MRS. STEWART: On the other shore.

A verse of "God Be With You Till We Meet Again" was sung at the suggestion of the president.

MOTHER STEWART: I want to thank these dear reporters, I want to thank the press always all over the world for being so kind to Mother Stewart.

Mrs. Stewart then repeated the following stanzas:

When for eternal worlds we steer,
The seas are calm, and eyes are clear,
The soul for joy then spreads her wings,
And her celestial anthem sings.

"I'm almost home,"
Nearer still she draws to the land,
More eager all her powers expand,
With full set prow and full set sail,

She drops her anchor within the bay.
Then folds her wings and glad her celestial anthem sings.
"Safe at home, safe at home at last."
Work for the ballot, sisters. Praise God.

At the request of a member, the chairman rapped for order.

THE CHAIRMAN: The perfect number, seven raps, the rounding of a life, these are in our thoughts; we are in the sultry noon, most of us now. Now, let us address ourselves quietly, steadily and sturdily to our work.

The minutes of Saturday afternoon were then read and on motion adopted.

Consent was given that the minutes of the executive committee meeting and the minutes of this morning be held over until the opening of the afternoon session, and that the superintendents' reports be at once taken up.

Miss Greenwood then made the following report:

EVANGELISTIC DEPARTMENT.

ELIZABETH W. GREENWOOD, Brooklyn, N. Y., Supt.

Our report is the record of self-sacrificing service performed by our evangelists, and evangelistic superintendents in state, county and local unions. Never has the need been greater for ministry to the poor, the sorrowing and the sinning. Ten reports give figures, but from five superintendents only we have a year's record of 27,333 gospel meetings, 10,044 visits in homes, 50,451 services in jails, 2,335 services in churches, 906,858 pages of literature distributed. Multiply this report from five states by all the state reports and a faint idea will be given of the great work of our department. Our plan for 1894 was as follows: First, the churches. The effort to arouse them has been continued; hundreds of temperance sermons have been preached, resulting in new interest, new members and financial aid. Second, the masses: That each union take the district in its own vicinity and send its evangelistic workers from house to house with wisely selected gospel and temperance literature, invitations to the temperance meetings, and that personal contact which the church has so sadly lost, and which alone can bridge the chasm between the church and the masses. Third, gospel missions.

We also recommended the admirable plan of the evangeliatic superintendent of the B. W. T. A. Over seventy gospel missions are to be conducted, in as many different centers, east, west, north and south, each of eight or ten days' duration. Most careful arrangements are made for these missions. Undenominational halls are secured when possible. Weekly prayer meetings are held for two months previous, to ask God's blessing upon the work. A well led choir is organized. All the ministers and leading Christian workers are visited and interested in the proposed mission. At close of the week a full report of the mission is sent to the National evangelistic superintendent. Over seventy lady missioners are now ready for the work.

Many such missions have been held. In Illinois alone the superintendent has conducted over forty county evangelistic conferences. Crusade bands have been formed in other states than Kansas, where they have been so successful. Crusade day, Neal Dow anniversary and Pentecostal week have been generally observed. Our eleven o'clock devotional hour, adopted at Atlanta, has been richly blessed in almost every state and county convention. The experiences of our last convention have led us to propose for this year an early service of prayer from 8:30 to 9:30 a. m., and a half hour of devotion from 11:45 to 12:15 daily. As this plan has the full approval of the executive committee, it is hoped the program will be fully carried out, and rich blessing result. The superintendent has invited ten ladies for these services. The national superintendent has issued three campaign circulars during the year—calls for the Crusade anniversary and days of prayer, and has given lectures, Bible expositions and addresses in many cities and towns. For the twenty-first summer she has supplied a pulpit in Massachusetts and written hundreds of letters in the interests of her world's and national evangelistic work.

In the course of her report, Miss Greenwood said: I want to offer as a recomendation (and when you adopt the report, you adopt this) that we return to the devotional hour from 11 to 12 a. m., that this hour be strictly observed, that when it is necessarily crowded out by the annual address, or the election of officers, it shall follow immediately as the order of the day. That the evangelistic superintendent shall annually present to the program committee for its approbation a varied program for these hours in the convention.

Time being called, an extension was moved and seconded.

A vote was taken, but the chair being in doubt, Miss Greenwood stated that she did not wish to take any further time if there was a division of opinion.

THE CHAIRMAN: I thought while Miss Greenwood was making her report that it might be well to take action upon the report at the close of it, and I do not believe there is anyone but thinks that the suggestions made by her are very important. What is the pleasure of the convention?

On motion of Miss Hillis, the report was adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN: Will you allow the chair to say that it seemed to her the suggestions were excellent, and by the suggestions which Miss Greenwood makes, that the memorial exercises be placed one day in place of the regular meeting, which, of course, they would fully replace in their helpfulness and spirit, that would help us very much to restore the hour, and probably as those exercises are generally quite extended the difficulty about time would be largely met.

The balance of the reports under the head of evangelistic were then given in the following order:

WORK AMONG MINERS.

MRS. W. R. ENGLISH, Quincy, Ill., Superintendent.

One of the characteristics of philanthropic work is, that it is never completed. Our annual reports are not the crowning of the structure, but are statements of how many stones we have placed in the great temple of truth and righteousness. In this department our first task has been to open a way of approach to the miner. This class of men is more easily accessible to one who knows something of their language, mode of life and customs. We are trying to get their ear and thought through the avenues of literature which finds its illustrations in their work and daily surroundings. We take for our leaflets such topics as relate to their occupation and weave in with them thoughts of Christ and rightliving. Thought and incident are made both plain and pleasing. The local superintendent cannot do her best work in her first year. There must grow up in the minds of the miner and his family a feeling that in the superintendent is found teacher and friend; just as they see in their physician one who is to heal their body, and in their school teacher one who is to instruct the mind. This open door to their hearts is not found by visiting them once or twice, but when the face has become familiar and the name a household word, they will accept this messenger of God and confide in her as in no other. We need in the work, field evangelists, who shall be to this people in some measure, what Col. Hogeland is to the news boys, or what the railroad men find in our Jennie Smith. Wherever we can bring these agencies to bear, they cannot fail to awaken nobler impulses and a turning away from the sin of intemperance and its attendant evils. In seeking to overthrow the liquor traffic and to establish Christ's Kingdom, we are trying to practice here as the church cannot do, house to house visitation, night schools, reading rooms, Loyal Temperance Legions and industrial schools, special Bible instruction, Gospel meetings, temperance mass meetings, words of counsel and general help. All of this is being forwarded under the direction of our superintendents. The work is so planned that any union, however far from a mine, may take up this department and assist in it. Three unions in Massachusetts by contributions and literature have been aiding the work in Colorado. Other unions in other states have sent literature into Utah, and so on. Our printed report gives the details of the work done. Best of all is, the work grows; its activity is more uniform. The unparalleled strikes have forced upon the minds of many the need of this work. A greater interest and more desire to take it up has been aroused and these are harbingers of a richer harvest in the coming year.

DEPARTMENT OF MERCY.

MRS. MARY F. LOVELL, Bryn Maur, Pa., Superintendent.

Sentiment in favor of this work seems to be growing. A great drawback is the indefiniteness with which it is reported from the local unions. The National superintendent feels very much at a loss when she is required to make a definite whole of reports which speak of "many" and "several" and "few" in describing the work done. The number of pages of literature distributed is very often reported while the number of pledged members in the Band of Mercy is omitted.

The value of the Band of Mercy cannot be overestimated. The matron of the Indian School at Chewawa, Oregon, told the state superintendent of this department recently that the Band of Mercy had been a benediction there. There is always like testimony where this work is faithfully carried on. Most superintendents complain of difficulty in securing the co-operation of ministers of the Gospel. The strange thing is that it should be necessary to ask for it. Three state superintendents report encouraging success in introducing the Band of Mercy in Sunday-schools, a place peculiarly fitted for this work. The National superintendent has this year made some effort to get humane teaching into the International Lessons, but there is nothing definite to report as yet. The superintendent for Pennsylvania mentions a Loyal Legion which has a flourishing Band of Mercy, and which is going to put up a fountain in the public square to cost about two hundred dollars. In Kansas, superintendents are vigorously enforcing the law against those committing cruelty, and are gathering their children into Bands of Mercy. Investigation of the practices in some schools and colleges proves more and more how greatly efforts against vivisection are needed. The superintendent for Oregon speaks of a professor in a college of that state who choked a cat to death before his students in order to let them see how it struggled in dying. He also varnished another cat to prove that the skin was the third lung. Having been threatened with arrest, this person now kills before he mutilates his unfortunate subject, but starves them first for several days. If these practices are not checked, children and young people will be let loose on the community who will be a curse to it. The superintendent for New York state speaks of some children who caught a cat and ran nails through its feet and body, and tortured it until it died. A large proportion of our youth greatly need counteracting influence on the side of mercy, not teaching them which will inure them to sights of cruelty.

The number of states reporting is thirteen, and items of interest from all could be mentioned did space permit. The total number of signatures to the pledge not to wear the bodies and plumage of birds is 2,623. More are hoped for. It is saddening to see so many members of the W. C. T. U. still wearing egret plumes which are an evidence of ruthless cruelty. Leaders in reform should be consistent. Information will be gladly given to organizers and others; also samples of literature.

MRS. FESSENDEN: Mrs. Lovell, can you buy eiderdown comforts with a clear conscience? I have not bought one because I have not found out.

MRS. LOVELL: At present, I am sleeping under one, and I did buy it with a clear conscience, and I have not investigated the subject. If I find that they are torn out, that the creature suffer, and that that is the usual custom, I suppose I shall burn it.

Mrs. Fessenden moved that at the close of the hearing of the reports of superintendents, Miss Greenwood be given five minutes more.

Motion seconded and carried.

PURITY.

MARY WOOD ALLEN, M. D., Toledo, O, Superintendent.

The past year has emphasized the fact that the great needs of this department are an understanding of its purpose and an appreciation of its importance by our white ribbon women. The national superintendent is continually in receipt of letters stating that the writer has been appointed to work in the purity department, but has no idea of what the work is, nor of the methods to be imployed in conducting it, adding, perhaps: "There is little we can do, as we have no saloons, no houses of ill-fame, and no fallen women." Or it may be a state superintendent who writes that a union reports to her: "We have not taken up this work, as we have no need of it." The word "social," which has come to be generally prefixed to the word "purity" as designating the department, has obscured the basic purpose, and has turned the public thought too exclusively to that form of immorality which necessitates companionship it its commission, while ignoring the foundation work of prevention of immorality by educating the individual. It is true that reform is one purpose of the department, but it is not the principal purpose. The department has three divisions: 1st, Reformatory; 2nd, Legislative; 3rd, Preventive or Educational.

The reformatory work is, of necessity, limited to cities and large towns, and the workers should be mature women, thoroughly consecrated and peculiarly endowed. Almost every state pleads for help in the founding of homes of refuge for the repentant erring woman, but the work is hindered by lack of means. Still, spite of this lack of means, our state superintendents report that in a majority of cases the Homes of Refuge and similar institutions are due to the efforts of the W. C. T. U.

Little aggressive work has been done in the legislative field during this year. In Ohio, an objectionable section has been removed from the statutes, and the W. C. T. U. were a force felt in obtaining this result. Several states report that efforts will be made in the coming year for the raising of the Age of Consent.

Nearly all unions report greatest interest in the preventive phase of this department work. Public opinion needs to be created in regard to a single moral standard; reverence for God's plan of life should be aroused; children need instruction, and parents must first be taught before they can rightly teach their little ones; the press needs purifying; ministers need to have their attention turned to their responsibility in promoting purity of thought and life. The special work for young women we find in the White Shield Societies, the aim of which is to teoch each girl to reverence her womanhood, and by her purity of life not only to be shielded, but to be a shield of protection to others.

As the Purity Department is second to none in importance so we believe that it will come to be, in the minds of our workers, second to none in interest, and will be recognized as a mighty power for uplifting all humanity.

PENAL AND REFORMATORY WORK.

MRS. JANE M. KINNEY.

To all of us I suppose this department of penal and reformatory work seems the most hopeless in our work of any. You have other departments that are so beautiful and into which so much can be introduced that is pleasant in action and in memory that to many of us I have no doubt the visiting of the reformatories and the penal institutions of our country is found revolting. But there are hundreds of women all over this country to-day and yesterday and every day visiting these places where men are shut away on account of the crimes that they have committed.

If the Woman's Christian Temperance Union would say that the tide of criminality is rising, they might be considered alarmists by some, but when it comes to us as the opening address of Gen. Brinkerhoff, of the National Prison Congress, it is not time for us to pause and consider upon what assumption and upon what grounds this assumption is based. And I want to tell you it is based upon the facts as gained from the statistics of this country, and I want to give you a few statistics on the increase in crime within the last ten years.

1850	6,737	1 out of 3,442
1860	19,086	1 out of 1,647
1870	32,901	1 out of 1,117
1880	58,609	1 out of 855
1890	82,329	1 out of 757

These statistics have not been compiled by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, but by the Census Bureau, at the head of which was Mr. Henry Wines, of Springfield, Ills, for many years secretary of the National Prison Congress, a man interested in all prison reform and prison work; but these men, while they are interested in reform, in the matter of regulating prisons and in the government of prisons, and in the manner of tabulating criminals and prisons, the Bertillon System and all that, they have not so far as I know given out any utterance in regard to the prohibition of the liquor traffic, which is the one thing that fills the prisons and penal institutions of our land.

I have only from one state the report that the interest is decreasing. In every other state it was reported that the interest is increasing, that ladies are visiting prisons and alms houses and police stations, and that laws are being presented to legislatures to secure police matrons in all cities of any size. Bills are being introduced into legislatures that women shall be admitted to all institutions where women and children are confined and in every way there is an advance along the line. To many of us the objects of interest are these who are debased, who are ruined, who are degraded but back of them is the family, the divided family, destroyed and ruined, that must be cared for; so that really this work would permeate and go through every line of work that we take up, there are so many of these lines that converge to the same centre. And if criminality is on the increase in this country, it is not the devoted women of the W. C. T. U. who are to blame, for the women who leave their own churches, who leave their beautiful homes and go down to speak to these degraded men in the prisons, these women who carry sometimes a message of flowers, sometimes the message of some little delicacy, to a sick prisoner, to go to visit the wives of those who are incarcerated, who gather up the little children and place them in homes and care for them, all these may wash their hands free from the blood of these men, but it is the men who hold the balance of power it is the men who hold the ballot in their hands, who are to blame for this state of affairs. The saloon is the cause of the population in all these institutions.

"Since we were here" was the refrain of our president's beautiful address, and I have thought since we were here, since we women have come into this work, the reformations have gone on in jails and prisons, men and women criminals have been separated from the same corridor, and little children have been taken out of the corridors with older and viler companions.

Miss Greenwood was called upon to occupy five minutes, in accordance with Mrs. Fessenden's motion, in presenting her plan of work, and did so briefly, particularly urging the necessity of detailed reports from each state. Her plan of work comprises the plan of districting the states in such a way that all the people in every town shall be reached; second, the holding of Gospel missions in accordance with the plan suggested by the British W. C. T. U., and third, the emphasizing of our work in the churches, asking every minister to preach a temperance sermon at some time during each year, or allow temperance women to do so, and at the same time take up a collection for the work of the W. C. T. U. Miss Greenwood also deprecated the practice of criticising the church and urged that our work be carried on in love. She referred to a little circular which has been useful in her work, showing something of what the W. C. T. U. has done, containing Mr. Stead's summary, then what the local union is doing, and a petition to the pastors of the churches to assist in our work.

WORK AMONG RAILROAD EMPLOYES.

MRS. C. M. WOODWARD, Neb., Superintendent.

Reports of the several state superintendents show that the year that opened so auspiciously, though overshadowed by one of the most terrific labor struggles ever known, has been one of advance, and that the work of this department, though interrupted in many places, has not been seriously shaken.

During the year have prepared and published "Plan of Work No. 2" for the guidance of workers, a department monthly reading for local unions (October); have furnished memoranda of work, for address of National president and to various national and state papers.

Never has the tact, patience and devotioy of workers been more tested than during the present near. During the dark days of the strike we shared to an unusual degree the great and general anxiety as to the outcome. Standing, as we must, impartially, between the corporation and the employe, yet the sympathy of workers was, perhaps, naturally with the employes and their families, for whom so costly effort has been made and whose physical and spiritual welfare has been the cause of much solicitude. It is proper also to say that labor investigation at Chicago was followed with interest, and the summing up of its results was gratifying as given by the UNION SIGNAL; that the destruction of property "was the work of the irresponsible mob element always present in time of disorder; that the American Railway Union advised against violence, sometimes helped to quell it; and did not sanction the few individual cases of unlawful acts by strikers."

The growing idea of the department is the W. C. T. U. social settlement at division stations. This will meet the needs of both the men and their families. Will center interest, and will give opportunity for developing nearly a score of intersphereing departments, and will give prestige to the work generally.

Miss Jennie Smith has labored with her usual faithfulness and success the past year, averaging, as will be seen by the brief statistical report furnished and appended, much over one public meeting each day. Her labors should be supplemented by an accredited railway evangelist in each state.

At the close of her remarks, Miss Greenwood led in prayer.

The devotional exercises and noontide prayer were led in a wonderfully effective way by Mrs. R. J. Trego, Ohio National Evangelist.

The hymn, "While the Days are Going By," was sung.

Consent was given that the chair invite Mrs. Myra Goodale Frost, one of the veterans in reform work, to the platform. The chair stated that Mrs. Frost was a dear friend of her mother, and about the only neighbor they had in Wisconsin long years ago.

The report of the committee on courtesies was then in order.

Rev. Dr. Hiram C. Haydn, pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Cleveland, was presented, who stated that he had not forgotten the pleasent companionship he had enjoyed with Miss Willard and her companion in the Holy Land, and also stated that a score of years ago he had opened his church again and again to the crusaders, and that he would always be glad to keep step in the onward march of the movement.

The President introduced to the Convention Mrs. Brooks, one of the daughters, and Mr. George Woodbridge, the only son of Mary A. Woodbridge, and announced that the different members of the family would be present during all the Convention and an opportunity given to those who would like to shake hands with them.

The Secretary read the list of those from whom fraternal greetings have been received, both from abroad and this country.

By consent, Mrs. Hastings, of Wisconsin, was placed upon the finance committee in place of Mrs. Purdum, who was absent.

Mrs. Barker announced that the collections which have already come in from the Sunday meetings held last night, amount to $241; also that the names of fifteen new members have been added by a lady friend and Mrs. Helen Bullock added twenty-two active members and eleven honorary.

The following telegrams were read and received:

To Miss Willard:

Our women of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Church offer Christian greetings and their hearty prayers for the continued success of the humane work in which the W. C. T. U. is engaged. God hasten the day when there shall be no more sorrow in the land because of strong drink. Accept my regrets that I am prevented from joining with you in person as I expected to do.

MRS. CLINTON B. FISKE.

In reply to the above, the following telegram was sent:

Love and greeting. Read 2. Col., 5, and 2. John 25.

The following telegram was also ordered sent to

Mrs. Youmans:

Love and greeting. Read 2 Cor. 1, 2-7, inclusive.

Also the following to

Dr. A. B Leonard:

Thanks for kind greeting. Read 1. Thess. 1, 2 and 3 verses; 2 Tim. 1, 7.

Also the following to

Mrs. Ella Williams:

Love and greeting. Read 1. Cor. 1, 2 and 4 verses.

Mrs. Frank Gibbs, fraternal delegate from Canada, carrying a letter from Mrs. Youmans, was introduced to the convention and expressed her great pleasure in at last being able to present at a convention presided over by the National president. She spoke of the mighty wave of unbelief and sin and misery that is beating upon the shores of this country as well as others, and believes that the only barrier that will hold it back must be built up of human hearts, the hearts of the women of these lands, which shall form such a breastwork that the battering rams of sin shall hurl their darts in vain.

The chairman introduced Mrs. Jeannette Hauser, ex-president of the W. C. T. U. in India, who made a brief address.

After the singing of the doxology, Mrs. Willing pronounced the benediction and the convention stood adjourned.

ANNUAL SERMON.

Only as we realize the worth of immortal souls, only as we become inspired with Christ's love of humanity; only as we learn to call God our Father and all men our brothers, shall we be able to practice the self-restraint and to render the strenuous service which will transform sinful mortals into angels. The men who would guide the ship of state across the tempestuous seas of the twentieth century must steer by the eternal stars, and not by the mere rushlights of political expediency.

1. Remedies for Municipal Misrule.

It is one of the most encouraging signs of the times that Europe has to some extent at least solved the problem of municipal government, first, by a large majority of the voters showing a personal interest in local government; and second, by the separation to a large extent of local government from national politics. Surely what the Old World has already done the New World can acomplish. New York has just shown us how many of our best people long for municipal purity, when a prophet arises to awaken latent desire and to direct blind efforts toward reform. Let us pray for a Parkhurst in every city in the land. But you must do more than simply pray. You must arouse your husbands and your brothers to attend the caucases and to take a personal interest in politics. (I wish I could say you must attend the caucases and vote yourselves.) The time is coming when a Christian man will as clearly recognize his duty to attend the caucases of his party as to attend the prayer meetings of his church. The performance of this first duty will soon lead the Christian to a second duty, viz., the duty of demanding that the caucases of his party be no longer held in saloons.

I am quite convinced that the first battle for the redemption of modern life will be fought for the control of our cities. They are the Gibralters of our civilization. If we can capture the cities for Christ we can capture the republic for Christ. If we can capture America for Christ we can take the world. John in his millennial vision saw a holy city descending from God out of heaven. When our cities are so purified that there shall be holiness upon the bells of the horses in the streets, John's vision will be realized and the dawn of the millennium will not be distant.

2. Remedies for the Unequal Distribution of Wealth.

The only remedy for the unequal distribution of wealth is the christianization of business. We have made a grievous mistake, not in characterizing the ministry a sacred calling, but in characterizing all other business as secular. All work done for the glory of God and the good of humanity, whether preaching to lost souls or shoeing horses, is divine work, and God wants partners in every honest business in the world. Upon the other hand all work done from selfish motives, whether preaching the gospel or engaging in politics or business is not secular, it is devilish.

In the application of Christianity to our industrial problems we must bear in mind the two principles of justice and of love. Modern science has rendered Christianity a vast service by teaching the church that by no possible intercession of saints, that not even by the blood of Christ, can we escape the penalties of violated law. We do the poor and sinful multitude an irreparable injury, if we simply bestow material bounties upon them, while leaving them in mental and spiritual degradation. You may or may not please Christ by giving bread to the tramp that comes to the door, or by sending provisions to the degraded family in the alley. But we are sure that you do not the whole will of Christ until you give vastly more than bread to beggars, until you give them your time, your thought, your love, until you teach them the laws of God's universe and put them upon the high road of obedience, so that eventually they may reap good harvests of their own sowing.

But modern civilization cannot rest with the embodiment of justice alone. Paradoxical as it sounds it is nevertheless true that for modern government to give each human being an equal industrial and political chance is simply to enthrone injustice. To say nothing of inherited millions with the vast opportunities for culture and for business and social alliance which this wealth brings, there are innate differences in children themselves. One man is born with the capacity for money making. Another man is born a Micawber with an inherent incapacity for business. In the same family often appear again and again a Jacob and an Esau. I cannot think that these differences touch our inmost natures, and that God has established an eternal aristocracy. Upon the contrary, the Bible teaches that God judges us not by our native talents, intellectual or even moral, but by the fidelity with which we use the talents committed to our trust. The judge of all the earth will deal righteously in the final reckoning. But how are we to secure perfect moral justice here? How can society overcome the inherent inequality with which human beings begin their lives? By adding the New Testament to the Old. By coupling mercy with justice. By the union of law and love. Indeed I think that God has permitted these temporary differences and inequalities in order that he might through them lead us to struggle for a kingdom of heaven upon earth. The family is a divine institution for the inauguration of this kingdom of love. Each one, even the strongest, comes into the world in a state of helplessness. We continue for years as the mere wards of our families, receiving the unbought bounties of our parents. The sentiment: "The world owes no man a living until he earns it" sounds well; and may indeed be just when addressed to a healthy tramp who shirks the wood pile and begs for food. But if that sentiment had been followed by every worldling's father and mother, no one of them would have reached the age when he could hurl it scornfully into the chattering teeth of the tramp. Again we all hope for something more than justice from God. We crave grace—pardon for past offences and unpurchased help for present struggles. But Jesus assures us that we may expect the Heavenly Father to deal with us as we deal with our weaker brethren. A Christian civilization must carry society infinitely beyond justice into the kingdom of love. The old political economy has broken down under the pressure of our advancing civilization because it stopped at the ideal of justice as if that were the sole law of industrial life. The new political economy will rest upon the whole nature of man and upon the New Testament as well as upon the Old.

Let us embody the two principles of justice and mercy, the teachings of the Old Testament and the New, the scientific principle of law and the more scientific principle of love in the civilization of the twentieth century; and we shall solve at one stroke the industrial problem at home and the evangelization of the world abroad.

3. The Solution of the Temperance Problem.

What light does the gospel throw upon the problem which the Woman's Christian Temperance Union specifically aims to solve?

(1) I think that the Gothenburg system which is now clamoring for recognition rests back ultimately upon a false interpretation of the Bible in regard to the use of wine. It must be confessed that the majority of Biblical scholars favor the view that non-alcoholic wine was unknown among the Jews and that Jesus, therefore, used and made alchohlic wine. Hence the majority of European scholars insist upon the use of fermented wines for the sacrament, and many church members use wine upon their tables. Under the conviction that Christ made and used intoxicating wines and that the evils of intemperance arise from the abuse of this good creature of God comes the cry for the government ownership of the traffic. If the promise is correct the conclusion is legitimate.

But an examination of every passage in the Bible in which the word wine is used leads us to the conviction that the Bible recognizes two kinds of wine. This view seems to us to become much clearer by a study of the words in the original. We have used the same word wine where the original Hebrew has made a distinction. Hence we have the apparently strange contradiction in the Bible of the highest approval and of the strongest condemnation of apparently the same object. A careful study of the original seems to us to show that the generic word for wine is used sometimes with approval and sometimes with disapproval in the Bible; while the specific words for strong drink are used with characteristic disapproval, and the specific words for unfermented drinks are used with characteristic approval. If this view is correct it relieves the apparent contradictions of the word of God upon this subject. One can readily think that at the feast of Cana Jesus might have donefor the host, in the exigency which he had created by the presence of himself and his disciples, what we know him to be constantly doing in nature, viz.; that he might have produced pure unfermented grape juice. But Christ certainly went far beyond his action in all living processes, if he not only produced the pure grape juice, but pushed it on to decay, and thus furnished his host and the guests a product of vegetable death and a source of animal and spiritual death. Again, any reasonable explanation of Christ's parable of the preservation of new wine in new skins can rest only upon the theory that Christ referred to wine that was not intoxicating, and that he meant by its preservation the continuance of it free from fermentation. It is indeed true that some missionaries have never found any unintoxicating wines in the Orient; and this fact with the unchanging customs of the East has led scholars to declare that Christ did not make or use a sweet wine. But the very existence among the Jews of a controversy over the use of fermented or unfermented wines at the Passover, the fact that all wines exist for a brief time at least in an unfermented state, the existence of recipes dating from the time of Christ for the preservation of unfermented wine, and above all the mention of sweet wine and new wine in the New Testament, shows beyond a doubt the existence of such a product. Hence I cannot think that the Christian scholars of future generations when intemperance shall have passed away will hold that our Master either weakly or ignorantly consented to make and use a product of death and a producer of death, an article which has become the ban of our civilization. Within the last fifty years even conservative scholarship has reversed the position which it held for nearly eighteen hundred years in regard to the sanction of slavery by Christ and his apostles. We look f r a similar reversal of view of Christ's sanction of wine.

With the clear recognition that alcohol is a poison and that it was never made or used by Christ, there is no possible justification for a Christian people consenting to furnish this poison to the citizens on any terms. It is indeed claimed that houses of evil would be regulated with greater regard to physical safety and with less pandering to crime, if the government decided to regulate the social evil. But we shudder at the thought of the government entering into the degrading business of public panderer ostensibly to secure a perfect control of the social evil let in reality for the sake of revenue. So Christian civilization will repudiate the advice of the honored liberal chief, Mr. Gladstone, and outlaw the saloon, or else through a deterioration of public morals brought about by such mistaken counsels we shall be led to the license of other sins.

I do not anticipate a short campaign or an easy victory for prohibition. Indeed, before we shall win the victory at all, the Christian voters of America must call out the reserves. The cares of our sisters are more continuous and upon the whole are quite as heavy as the burden which the brothers carry, but women do not suffer the intense pressure of business during the day to which men are subjected. Hence in the recent struggle for municipal reform in New York, the leaders found an unexpected source of support in the quiet women of the city. I predict that, not simply in the interests of justice, not simply in accordance with our Declaration of Independence, not simply out of loyalty to the Golden Rule, but because of the crisis that is upon us, the twentieth century will witness the summoning of women to the aid of men in the struggle for our higher civilization. With the granting of equal suffrage will come the outlawry of the saloon. All the liquor papers in the United States recognize this fact, and their opposition to woman suffrage is if possible more intense than their hostility to prohibition. Prohibition may be won, and then lost again, if left to us men alone. But with the ballot in the hands of our sisters, prohibition is forever sure.

Prohibition seems to me to be the next step in temperance reform.

As a race advances from barbarism to civilization every great evil passes through three great stages: first, the stage of universal toleration and general practice; second, the legal stage in which the evil is hampered and restricted, and finally prohibited by the state; and third, the moral stage in which the evil is abandoned and the opposite virtue is cultivated through inward impulse and not through outward restraint. Murder and theft and slavery have passed through these three stages. Intemperance has just entered the second stage in which every civilized government is restricting and discouraging the traffic through legislation. The logical and inevitable outcome of such legislation is prohibition.

But after all, prohibition can never be the final goal in our modern struggle for temperance. Surely we have not reached our goal as a people when we come to that stage in civilization in which men cease to do wrong from fear of outward punishment. We have reached our resting place only when we have come to that stage in which prohibition leads to universal self-restraint. All the great interests of society are tending toward this goal. Laws are but the outward crutches upon which humanity leans until its feet are strong and its wings are moulted. The day is not far distant when law shall be swallowed up in love, when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ.

DEPARTMENT OF NARCOTICS.

By Mrs. E. B. Ingalls, St. Louis, Mo. Supt.

We are now making war upon the cigarette, a more determined fight than ever before. First, because we believe the success of the temperance reform lies largely with the children, and children are the greatest sufferers from cigarette smoking. Secondly, because the cigarette contains more than one narcotic. To aid in this fight, friends everywhere are asked to form Anti-Cigarette Leagues in public and private schools, in Sunday schools and Christian Endeavor societies. Also to form independent leagues, not under the control of any organization. These leagues are becoming very popular in many of the schools; almost all the boys have joined. I have a constitution that I will be glad to furnish. This can be adopted as a whole, or in part, or not at all. It is simply a form to be accepted or rejected as the workers think best. I also have the badges.

The use of opium in the form of headache medicines and "pic-me-up" as they are called, is fearfully on the increase. In almost every medicine closet will be found one of these drugs, and we frequently hear our own women confess that they cannot go through a convention or any extra strain without a bromide or some drug. This is dangerous, very dangerous, and I warn women to beware of these things that weaken the system and lead to over-indulgence in drugs.

An article is going the rounds of the press regarding cigarette smoking by women. It has been copied by many papers and the facts are greatly exaggerated, and calculated to make women smoke by the statement that the nobility of England and the best women of our own country smoke. This is largely incorrect, and should be denied; but the truth must be acknowledged, that women are learning to smoke and that many of them take to the habit naturally. Can we wonder? Woman has lived with tobacco smoke, ate with it, slept with it, worshipped in churches and in closets with it, until her whole system is impregnated with it. Stamp out this vile habit at once, but first clean your own homes; clean your own medicine chests, and by gentle persuasion get husband and brother to give up tobacco. With our boys and girls smoking cigarettes, the father smoking tobacco and drinking whiskey, and the mother with her headache medicine, which contains more or less opium and brandy, surely the prospect of a sober nation is not vere bright. I advise the addition of the word "narcotics" to our W. C. T. U. pledge.

Mrs. Hannah J. Bailey, our World's and National Superintendent of Peace and Arbitration, was again made time-keeper, and the gentle tinkle of her bell warned speakers when their time limit had expired.

ORGAN OF THE WORLD'S AND NATIONAL WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

Editors: FRANCES E. WILLARD. LADY HENRY SOMERSET. MARGARET A. SUDDUTH. JENNIE A. STEWART. MRS. KATHERINE L. STEVENSON.

Business Manager—MRS. CAROLINE F. GROW.

Entered at the Post-Office in Cleveland as second-class matter.

CONVENTION ECHOES.

HAVE you visited the W. T. P. A. room?

MRS. N. R. C. MORROW, West Virginia's president is another "graduated Y," having been former state Y secretary.

MRS. CARSE was greeted with a tempest of applause the moment she appeared on the platform to report for the Temple.

OUR annual election was never conducted so expeditiously or with so much "consecutivity" as Miss Willard put it.

OUR President's re-election was practically unanimous, only four scattering votes being recorded. Great enthusiasm prevailed.

IT was a happy innovation, which will doubtless pass along the line, to have our leader remain upon the platform during her re-election.

"Two million voters in this country can neither read nor write. These two millions are mercenaries—their vote can be bought."—Joseph Cook.

GREAT applause followed Miss Willard's announcement on Monday afternoon that three women had been elected to the legislature in Colorado.

THE South will now be represented among the general officers by an earnest and devoted white ribboner, Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp, of Kentucky.

MRS. GROW grew eloquent in presenting the claims of the W. T. P. A. There is no branch of our work which has greater call upon the support of our women.

MRS. SOPHIA F. GRUBB represents Oklohoma in the convention, having been elected delegate-at-large by the state meeting of that territory in October.

WE hope L. T. L. superintendents will take especial pains to supply themselves with sample copies of The Advance Guard, the senior organ of the L. T. L.

IT should be noted of our "white ribbon prima donna" that she is as felicitous in speech as in song; her impromptu utterances being as bright and gracious as herself.

DO NOT delay purchasing W. T. P. A. literature until the last day of the convention. Call at the close of this afternoon's session. Rest yourself in our rockers and examine our goods.

FOR the Wednesday evening rally, the following list of speakers is announced: President Thwing, of Western Reserve University; Miss Willard; Mrs. Hoffman; Mrs. Barker; Mrs. Meriwether; Miss Anthony; Madame Chika Sakurai.

"THE time is coming when a Christian man will feel it as much his duty to attend the caucuses of his party as to attend the prayer-meetings of his church."—Dr. Bashford in annual sermon, November 18.

TUESDAY morning's prayer service was led by Mrs. Weaver, of Pennsylvania, who gave an interesting and thought-stirring exposition of scripture, reading the story of Caleb and Joshua. Courage for our work and the removal of the giants of evil from the world were the subjects. Prayers were voiced for unconverted children and special prayer was offered for the fallen women of Cleveland.

OKLAHOMA has quadrupled her membership.

TO THOSE who had no active participation in the Crusade the thought given by our National Evangelist, Miss Cassie Smith, comes with peculiar pertinence: "I was not in the Crusade, but the Crusade was in me."

HAVE you seen "A Great Mother?" There are many in the convention, but the inspiring life-story of one of the greatest of all—the mother of our leader—may be found in the W. T. P. A. room. Be sure you examine it.

NINE organizers are present: Mrs. Bullock, N. Y.; Mrs. Law, Mich.; Mrs. Dell Cox, of Ore.; Mrs. E. A. Blair, Neb.; Mrs. Maude Green, Col.; Miss Ensign, Ohio; Miss Carter, Mo.; Miss Kearney, Miss., and Miss Parrish, Illinois.

AMONG the fraternal delegates at the National Convention is Mrs. Lillian Hollister, of Detroit, Michigan, Lady Commander of the Maccabees, with a following of 20,000 women, 500 subordinate societies, an active worker for years in Y work.

INGENIOUS are the arguments with which our superintendents prove their department "the most important of all," but none excells Mrs. Blair's. "If the evangelistic department is the backbone of the W. C. T. U., what would this backbone do without the hands and feet of the L. T. L. to carry it around."

SOUTH Africa to the front! Their greetings in the form of seven $10 bills to complete their tablet in Willard hall, The Temple, were without precedent during convention. "It's dollars as does it," and the South African Y's have given our House Beautiful practical and magical aid by their timely gift. Next!

NEW JERSEY, among the earliest of the State W. C. T. U. organizations, still stands face to the front with indomitable pluck. The special State work during the past year has been in preparation for the intelligent enforcement of their bran new scientific temperance instruction law, which takes effect this school year.

SOME of our convention echoes are from voices of the past rather than the present. We miss Frances Griffin's piquant sallies; Mrs. Snell's motherly words of cheer; Mrs. McClees' care for her soldier and sailor boys; Ida Clothier's bright face; Esther Pugh's cheery smile, and many another with us in other days, and of us and with us in spirit to-day.

MADAME CHIKA SAKURAI, the dear little Japanese who took Madam Bamkat's place on last night's program, captured her audience bodily. Her collection speech was something absolutely unique, and we rejoice that that adjective can be applied to so well-worn a subject. We can well believe as we look into our sister's face that the Japanese women are the sweetest on earth.

RABBI GRIES, one of the most progressive, serious-minded and wide-awake pastors in Cleveland, is inviting his Gentile friends to celebrate Thanksgiving in his magnificent new temple on Willson avenue. This is as it should be—neither Jew nor Gentile in the Kingdom Few men are better demonstrating the power of the principles of the Christ as they relate to true citizenship than Jewish pastors like Rabbi Hirsch and Rabbi Gries.

MRS. HARRIS' "Victory" last night was a pæan of glorious prophecy, and raised the whole audience to a pitch of enthusiasm, which was not lessened by her encore, "The Dear Old Buckeye State." At the close of each chorus the entire Ohio delegation rose to its feet, waving handkerchiefs, while the audience cheered vociferously. It was an especially happy truth in the last chorus, when she substituted the word "Crusade" for "Buckeye."

WANTED: Bright women from each delegation to canvass for the Columbian Publishing Company. This is an opportunity for a number of women to make some money for themselves and help the Temple fund. For particulars, inquire of Miss Sara G. Johnson, at the Temple, in the main entrance.

THE SIGHTS OF CLEVELAND.

The attractions of Cleveland in evidence, as might be expected, are of the solid type. Here are no mushroom "sky-scrapers," but solid, well-rooted rows of business blocks, handsome public buildings and institutions. It is manifest that not beauty alone but utility and durability were sought by its builders.

The Case School of Applied Science, Euclid avenue; Society for Savings building, Public Square and Ontario; the Y. M. C. A., Prospect and Erie; the buildings of the Western Reserve University, Adelbert, Women's College, etc., in and near Wade Park; the Central High School on Willson avenue; the magnificent Arcade, extending from Euclid avenue to Superior street, are among the fine public structures to which Cleveland residents point with justifiable pride.

The eye of the visitor is caught by the massive stone causeway of the viaduct, an iron trestle spanning the Cuyahoga at the height of 68 feet above the water and connecting the east and west divisions of the city, bisected by the river and valley. This magnificent roadway is sixty-four feet wide and three-fifths of a mile long. It cost over two million dollars, an expenditure much larger than that of the Brooklyn bridge, in proportion to population.

Among the most notable of the church edifices are the new Pilgrim Congregational, Jennings avenue, First United Presbyterian Church, E. Prospect street; Epiphany Reformed Episcopal Church, Euclid avenue; Plymouth Congregational, corner Prospect and Perry; Calvary Presbyterian, corner Euclid and E. Madison; First Baptist Church, corner Prospect and Kennard, and Euclid Avenue Congregational Church, corner Euclid avenue and Logan street, all fitting places of worship.

Euclid avenue is world renowned for its beauty as a residence street. Level as a floor, it stretches away for three miles, bordered on either side by substantial and elegant residences, with clean cut lawns and spacious grounds, shaded by trees that stood when the bear and panther crouched in their branches.

Seven parks, each distinctive in its character, beautify the city. The oldest of them is Public Square, or Monumental Park, as it is now called from the monument of Commodore Perry, erected there.

Lake View Park, near the Union Depot, has a wide view over Erie's broad expanse and is a favorite public resort in summer. One can scarcely believe this, the neglected bluff of a few years ago, scarred with gullies and covered with miserable shanties. The city has planted trees, built rock work, turned the springs into fountains and the ravines into ponds.

A private park of sixty acres, cultivated by Mr. J. H. Wade is perhaps the most beautiful of Cleveland's public out-of-door resorts. Here landscape gardening has been carried to the highest point of perfection and the result is a remarkable scene of beauty. It is reached by Euclid avenue and Wade Park avenue cars. The largest, Gordon Park, is situated on the lake, east of the city, and comprises 120 acres; St. Clair street cars carry the visitors to this sylvan spot. One hundred thousand dollars are expended annually by the city in the care of these and smaller parks.

Garfield's monument, on a commanding knoll in Lake View cemetery, is the Mecca of Cleveland visitors, who gaze upon its solid masonry with deepest interest. The bronze bas relief upon the outer walls well typifies the life of the dead president. Entering upon the payment of a 10-cent admission fee, visitors are repaid by the view of exquisite mosaic work, the bronze casket and the marble statue of the martyred president.

The handsome monument erected to the memory of the soldiers and sailors in the Public Square is worthy of close inspection with its fine groups of statuary and graceful outlines.

White ribboners will find many other places of interest, besides those herein indicated, in this leading city of the Crusade State.

WHAT would become of us without Mrs. Benjamin? She is always ready to steer our bark through parliamentary breakers, and her good humor is as unfailing as are her wit and wisdom; concerning which latter quality we might well use the old words:

"And still we gazed, and still the wonder grew How one small head could carry all she knew."

NATIONAL WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

TWENTY-FIRST ANNUAL CONVENTION.

MONDAY AFTERNOON.

Convention met at 2 o'clock. Miss Willard in the chair.

The devotional exercises were led by Mrs. Hauser of India, who read the first chapter of Nahum, seventh verse, and America was sung.

The secretary read the minutes of the morning session and of the executive committee meeting, all of which were adopted.

The Convention resumed the hearing of the reports from the Evangelistic department.

PURITY IN LITERATURE AND ART.

MRS. EMILIE D. MARTIN, New York City, Supt.

The germ thought of the work of this department is to prepare all hearts to receive the Holy Ghost, thus giving them the power to say to every evil thought, "Get thee behind me, Satan." This is a positive way to destroy appetite, our deadliest foe. We are weak or strong, foolish or wise, corrupt or righteous, just in proportion as we are controlled by Bible principles. Whoever preaches this Gospel is the one who strikes the most sins and we may succeed in placing good laws upon our Statute books. God grant us success in their enforcement. As church members we become custodians of public morals; the strength of the light that is within us will be determined by the number of darkened minds we are able to illuminate with the knowledge that "the pure in heart shall see God." This work of the "Inner Mission" can be done in home, church, school, W. C. T. Unions, Y's, young people's societies, children's bands, and Loyal Legions. In Home and Foreign missionary fields, make good use of libraries, helping to establish them, and also reading rooms for boys and girls, too often on the streets in the evenings. Remember, the children and the youth are those whom the Devil's printing press assails the most frequently. We recommend the reading of the UNION SIGNAL, Young Women and Young Crusader. Be a committee of one to have all objectionable matter cut ou of anything that may fall into the hands of the young. Appeal to parents to watch the bureau drawers and guard the hours of seclusion of those under their care. All impure matter found, send to Anthony Comstock, room 85, Times building, New York City. The same address will furnish information regarding the work of and annual report of the New York Society for the suppression of vice.

Arouse public sentiment to the fact, that when we allow any schools of indecency, we take away the power of good citizenship, by sowing the first seeds of social evil. The record is that women have been received courteously by officials. Enthuse the men to act; if they will not take decisive steps, have no fear to take action yourself; make the appeal and at least create a sentiment that will sooner or later take form. Appeal to all religious bodies to take action on this subject. Teacher's Institutes, Y. M. C. A.'s, all Young People's Societies and various other organizations, that the centre of our life may be pure. Report any impure literature or pictures found on railroads and their news stands to the superintendent of the road; petition post office and post roads committee for more stringent laws concerning the United States mail service. Have the resolution unanimously adopted at the annual convention of the National Editorial Association, printed in petition form and presented to the editors of journals in your locality, that they may no longer cater to the morbid conditions of society. As oxygen is necessary for life, so pure thoughts are necessary for the soul. We work for eternity.

MRS. MARTIN (continuing): Now, a word about the living pictures. Where were the living pictures born? Why in Paris in the students' quarters. And what was the outcome of the living pictures? Why the can-can and the riot. Letters have been pouring in upon me with reference to these pictures. I have consulted the postoffice authorities and the police anthorities. I have the Third District Attorney Hartman for my lawyer. I have had three interviews with the inspector of police in New York. I have gone to the mayor of Brooklyn, and I can't tell you how many other places. The result has been the same in every case. Every one has told me that the best people, the best young men especially, and some of our finest young women, those who are called the best in society, are seen in these places. If they do not go down into the low variety show, they do go into the shows of a little higher grade where often the scenes are more debasing than in the lower variety show. Now, this is a hard fact to face.

This morning I had the pleasure of meeting with Mayor Blee. I also had a conference with the Inspector of Police and Superintendent Hoehn, and I never was more kindly treated in my life. Superintendent Hoehn suggests, and the same thought is in the mind of Post General Anderson, which is, that the W. C. T. U. make a clean sweep of this business and see that a commission is selected and every town and city, have a law passed to that effect by our legislators and by Congress, but said Superintendent Hoehn, "Be sure that you require a woman on every one of the commissions." Sisters, we are going to work along these lines and want you all to help.

I move that a vote of thanks be sent to the Post Master of Cleveland, Mr. A. P. Anderson, for courtesy and suggestions given to this department; also that a note of thanks be sent to Mayor Blee and the Inspector of Police, Henry Hoehn, and Mr. McMahon, for their marked kindness and wise suggestions. Seconded and carried.

The group of reports offered under the head of Evangelistic Department, being now complete, was adopted by the house.

The Chair introduced to the Convention Mrs. Alice Robinson, president of the W. C. T. U. of Maryland and fraternal delegate from the Society of Friends, Baltimore, who greeted the Convention, and spoke enthusiastically of the work done by the committee in Baltimore, which is working for the purity in the press, and urged upon the delegates everywhere co-operation with that committee, and particularly personal contact with editors, and effort in every way to educate the public taste to the appreciation of a higher grade of literature, especially in the daily press.

Mrs. Marion Hancock, of Mandelay, Burmah, was introduced and spoke as follows:

MRS. HANCOCK: I want to say a word of encouragement to the ladies here who may have small circles. Perhaps you do not know that the circles in Burmah, I presume in India and other foreign countries, are almost all of them, dependent on their missionaries, and Mrs. Winston and myself have been many times the only two to sustain the Union at Mandelay, and it was a question whether we should sustain it, or let it go down, but we voted to sustain it, and kept the Union together. And I am happy to say that when I came to America, we had quite a large circle.

There is just one other point I wish to make, and that is, that it is very difficult for us to get the helps that you have in this country. We cannot always have the printers; we take the UNION SIGNAL, but you are always issuing something new and missionaries cannot afford to send to these papers. Now, ladies, when you get the papers and read them, wont you mail them to the foreign missionaries?

Mrs. Barker made a plea on behalf of the philanthropy fund, which she said was to be raised for the very purpose of sending our literature and our new helps to foreign countries and poor unions, and said that the W. T. P. A. were ready to send the literature at half price from this philanthropy fund.

The chairman then introduced the Rev. J. E. Bird, pastor of the African M. E. church, and fraternal delegate, who said that what he most regretted this afternoon was that he did not stand behind the white ribbon, but that he was ready for it now, and would be pleased to wear it.

The Chairman presented the gentleman with her ribbon and said, "I do not often come across a minister who says he would like to wear the ribbon and I proceed to decorate him on the moment."

Mr. John Danner of Ohio was then presented, who said he believed the day was not far distant when our cry shall be "One God, one nation and no saloon."

Miss Emma F. Bates, recently elected superintendent of public instruction of North Dakota, was introduced and spoke as follows:

Dear Sisters of the National Convention: I desire to talk a little to you on politics and I just wish to say that a politician is one who is interested in the peace, safety and prosperity of the nation, and who studies to develop and preserve the morals of the people. Now, I would like to know if there is a woman sitting here today who is not a politician. You should be and are interested as to the peace, safety and prosperity of this nation and as to the development and preservation of the morals of the people of this nation, therefore, you are every one a politician, and if you are politicians, and you are, it is your right and privilege and duty to exercise the power of the politician and that is the ballot. We have wasted too much shoe leather and spent too many useless prayers in getting at something that we could settle in one instant. Let us conserve our energies and strengthen ourselves by fighting to one end, and that is suffrage, and with it will come purity, temperance, faith and truth.

The chairman stated that she had just read in her morning paper, while at lunch, that three women were elected to the legislature of Colorado, which announcement was received with applause.

Mrs. E. J. M. Newcome, fraternal delegate from the Keeley League of the Northwest, was presented, and spoke of the benefactors to the human race in Europe and America, and stated that among the most prominent in America were Frances E. Willard and Susan B. Anthony.

Mrs. Hannah J. Bailey then reported as follows:

PEACE AND INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

HANNAH J. BAILEY, Superintendent.

By reports of twenty-five state and territorial superintendents, we find that thousands of pages of literature have been distributed, the press utilized, sermons preached, lectures given, two hundred public meetings held on General Peace day and at other times, Bible readings and concert exercises used, pledges obtained, petitions circulated and juvenile bands organized. Our department papers, The Pacific Banner and The Acorn, have a circulation in all the states that have adopted this work.

The past year has been one of opportunities and the work has grown rapidly on our hands. National boundary lines recede as the outreach for peace has included the world. At the International Peace conference recently held in Antwerp, the work of this department of the W. C. T. U. was spoken well of, and the Polyglot Petition was unanimously endorsed. The memorial adopted by the World's Columbian Commissioners, asking that steps be taken to secure arbitration in international disputes, and which was delivered to the President of the United States, and also to Mr. Gresham, Secretary of State, at Washington, for presentation to the Governments of the World, is a notable document.

It is signed by the commissioners of forty nations, all the commissioners of the States and Territories of the United States, and many prominent leaders of America and other countries. It asks that all the governments will agree by mutual treaties to submit for settlement by arbitration such international questions and disputes as shall fail of satisfactory solution by peaceful negotiations. President Cleveland in his recent message alluded to this subject and made the announcement that Great Britain had received the proposition for arbitration with favor. Mr. Gresham, in reply to the memorialists, has consented to have their appeal sent to all foreign governments, and to urge the holding of an international conference to consider the plan. In connection with sister peace societies the W. C. T. U. is workiug for the day when courts of arbitration shall supplant warfare. It also exerts an influence against prize fighting, sparring matches, capital punishment, and every form of inhumanity. Much of the reading in school books and histories tends to foster a war spirit in the young. Mothers should not allow their children to have military toys, to practice warlike games or anything that makes them familiar with taking life as a pastime. We greatly deplore the growing tendency in some of our states to adopt military drill in schools and the boys' brigade in Sabbath schools. Young America greets this movement with zeal. What will practical America do when thousands of Sabbath school boys, inspired with a love for warfare, trained in military tactics in the church founded by the Prince of Peace, shall come in possession of our armories and the great warships of our navy? We wish every school house in our land had the flag floating over it and a peace and a liberty bell, fac simile of the one made of metal instruments used in warfare and exhibited at the Columbian Exposition at Chicago, ringing from it.

Mrs. Bailey resigned her place for the last four minutes to Mrs. Burgess, who added to what she had reported, as follows:

I want to say first that whatever touches the home, touches the W. C. T. U. and never a war came anywhere that did not touch the home. What is the department of peace and arbitration doing to build up the great question of temperance? This cannot be answered in five minutes, but I will say briefly what the gospel is doing to make the world better, for this department touches largely the great fact of the love that worketh no ill. Directly it does not touch the liquor question no more than many of other departments. Indirectly it is educating a new class of legislators. If, in the home today there is taught a great broad thought of universal brotherhood and the love that worketh no ill and the kindness that is always Christian-like, there cannot be in future statesmen the policy of war. Many of this audience to-day know what war means to the home. Touching the liquor question you know that after the war when this young republic was plunged in debt we have as a legacy of the war, the present legalizing of the saloons. Before that we had only the hotel bar. War and intemperance are twin evils. Near my home on the Hudson river three weeks ago yesterday, in a Sabbath school, I saw boys marching in with guns, stack them like soldiers, take a minute or two to get quieted down from the clank of the tin toys and then listen to the lesson, one of those beautiful ones in the New Testament. The superintendent asked me to speak, I asked him if I could say what I wanted to, and he said, "No, if you speak against the brigade you cannot speak here. We believe in having our boys march in a becoming way, it attracts other boys, we believe in it as a matter of health and we think it is a good thing." I said: "Don't the public schools have physical culture and all these things? How do you reconcile the gun with the gospel?" "Well," he says, "the boys recognize it." "How can you tell the boys that the gospel has any part in bringing this gun in?" Besides the Sunday schools you know they have regular military drills in many of the schools. We are asked, "What would you do with a government without an army to protect it?" We answer in the words of our own president, General Grant, when he said to our government: "You don't need any standing army. You only want in America a national police force." And he reduced our standing army to its present number. The men were sent to their homes, and the principle was correct. The difference between a police force and an army is that the army is always for menace, an army is to destroy, to desolate, waken personal liberty and bring about enormous debts. The police force is to secure peace, happiness and to protect personal property. We ask that you will in the great course of temperance help to put down this gospel enormity, and put into the minds of these boys not thoughts of war, and tumult, but of love and kindness.

Reports under this group adopted.

By consent of the convention, the four minutes given to Mrs. Grubb was occupied in taking up a collection.

Mrs. Cranmer sang an original song entitled, "Hold up the Light," explaining that the writing of it was prompted by the habit of an old lady living near Armour, South Dakota, who always kept a light in her window at night, for fear, as she said, that somebody's boy might be overtaken by darkness on the trackless prairies and need the light.

Miss Tomlinson's report under head of social was offered and adopted.

PARLOR MEETINGS.

MRS. MARY D. TOMLINSON, Plainfield, N. J., Supt.

What is the department of parlor meetings doing for the prevention of intemperance? In making my debut before this convention, I wish I might be gifted with the eloquence of Demosthenes, while I plead for this department, so that every woman would be impressed with the startling fact that parlor meetings are a vital necessity to our grand organization. In answer to the topic, I will say without qualification, and for three reasons,—everything. First: They are intended for educational and social conference upon our various departments of work, all of which directly or indirectly touch this great evil. To have an address at such a time without including temperance would be like a minister in one of our Eastern States, who found his hearers diminishing, and asked an old seafaring man—who did not boast of much religion, but stood loyal to his pastor, why the people did not come to church? "I canna tell, mon; ye preached on Spring and Autumn most beautiful discourses, and ye improved the great accident and loss of life on the Sound; but I think if ye would give them something out of the Bible, it being new like, may be you could interest them." Second, We reach women who use liquors in their homes. The decanter and wine glass upon the sideboard are not a thing of the past, as we frequently hear; for wine flows freely at the dinner table in many homes to-day. The drink habit is increasing in home and saloon, and the children lying in the cradle now must fill the places of the drunkards to-morrow, if the people continue to vote the manufacture of intoxicants. A creature of God it has been called; Sir Wilfrid Lawson says, "so is a tiger a good creature of God, yet one would not desire to take a tiger in his bedroom." If we send a dainty invitation to our friends who "do not belong," to a four-o'clock tea, they will come from courtesy, if for no other reason, and some word spoken may quicken conscience and arouse enthusiasm to espouse our cause. We are creatures of habit, and conform to the old ways, ignorantly perchance, for "Ignorance is the curse of God, Knowledge the wings wherewith we fly to Heaven." Third: We gain members. From superintendents come proofs: "Find parlor meetings helpful in securing members, and creating interest in the general work." "More members gained in this way than in any other." "Young people are aroused." The Y's are leading in many states.

We have held 1,113 meetings and gained 719 active, and 87 honorary members this year through parlor meetings in seven states, and hundreds undoubtedly who have not been reported.

Mrs. Lovell, superintendent of the department of mercy, presented a gold medal representing a dove encircled by a serpent with the motto, "In wisdom harmless," the design furnished by Miss Frances Power Cobbe, to Mrs. Lou E. Rall of Indiana, on behalf of Wilber Helm, who wrote the best essay on this general subject founded on the attitude of the Bible toward our treatment of dumb animals.

By consent of the convention at this time, Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, presented a banner offered two years ago to the state superintendent who should be the most successful in securing the introduction of scientific text books into the schools of her state. She reported that Pennsylvania has secured the introduction of these books into 198 new towns and cities, including Philadelphia and Pittsburg.

Mrs. Lovell accepted the banner on behalf of Pennsylvania, disclaiming her own right to it.

Mrs. Hunt then presented another banner, (or rather the same banner, representing another) to the State of New Jersey as the state in which there has been the largest gain in the appointment of superintendents of scientific instruction. This banner last year went to Missouri, and is to be passed along to Pennsylvania.

Mrs. Bourne, on behalf of the New Jersey delegation, told of the rejoicing on the 24th day of April last when in the Governor's room at the Capitol building at Trenton, the black patch was removed from New Jersey on the map by the chairman of the committee on education in the House, assisted by the chairman of the committee on education in the Senate, one of these gentlemen reserving as a souvenir of the occasion the scissors with which he made the clipping and the other the patch.

Mrs. Bourne also acknowledged gratefully the valuable assistance in their work of the synod and all of the denominations in New Jersey, and particularly of the Christian Endeavorers, without whose assistance the work could scarcely have been done.

Mrs. Matilda E. Kline, President of the Board, then made the following report:

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL.

"Overcome evil with good." Quietly but effectively, the National Temperance Hospital is obeying this mandate, and the close of another year enables us to measure advances made. Not only has the work within the hospital been gratifying in results, but the principles for which it is set are spreading. Other hospitals have banished alcohol, and more testimony accumulates from physicians that it is not necessary in the profession. With greater confidence than heretofore we can declare against its use anywhere in the sick room, and find an army of physicians and surgeons ready to support that assertion.

The work of the past year has been very gratifying. Among the helpful agencies we note an excellent medical staff, including eminent physicians of both sexes and both schools; a superior superintendent of training school for nurses; competent internes, and a fine class of nurses, who have by their faithfulness won encomiums from physicians and patients alike. On March 15th, 1894, five of these nurses graduated with honor, having completed their course of study. It was a memorable occasion. The address was made by Dr. J. R. Boynton, chief of the homeopathic staff, who uttered words of high appreciation regarding the studious and faithful work done by them. As a token of appreciation the entire staff presented to each graduate a gold monogram pin, composed of the initials N. T. H. (National Temperance Hospital), and from the board each received a beautiful floral offering. At the meeting of the board in September, Dr. Sarah Hackett Stevenson, chief of the allopathic staff, expressed as her opinion that the nurses in the National Temperance Hospital were superior to those in other hospitals, and the care bestowed upon the patients excelled that given in other institutions of like character. The domestic department has also been administered by our matron with order and economy. The homelike character of the hospital is an added attraction, and its reputation is spreading rapidly. When temperance people throughout the nation know as they should, this is a national institution, and that it is ready to receive and care for patients from all states, then it will fairly begin its work.

During the year the moral foundations of the hospital were carefully examined and their strength tested. The result was embodied in the following resolutions passed at the July meeting:

WHEREAS, The National Temperance Hospital having been founded to demonstrate a principle, and as an educator of public and professional sentiment in favor of the exclusion of alcohol as a medicine; and

WHEREAS, We have good reason to congratulate ourselves on our success, and rejoice that our example has already been followed by other hospitals, while a constantly increasing number of physicians testify to the fact that alcohol is not necessary in their practice; therefore,

Resolved, That we continue the good work begun so auspiciously, and emphasize now the fact that it cannot only be rejected as a remedial agent, but it is not necessary anywhere.

Resolved, That we urge the members of the staff to be increasingly careful not to use alcohol at all, either in surgical or medical practice; to exclude it as an antiseptic or a cleansing agent in preparing "the field of operations," in capital surgical cases; and that triturates, tablets, etc., be substituted for tinctures whenever possible.

The diet kitchen has been established and equipped during the year, and is of great assistance.

Superintendents of hospital work have been secured in some of the states through the co-operation of the officers of the state W. C. T. U., and it is earnestly hoped that all may be immediately supplied with an active superintendent.

The children's room has been furnished and made delightful by the army of L. T. L. workers in the different states, and already suffering childhood has been ministered unto in their name and the name of their great Leader. It is now the purpose of those in charge of this work to endow the beds in this room through the same line of effort, and added plans have been laid by which it is hoped this will be effected.

One hundred and sixty-five patients have been received during the year, including 107 females and 58 males. Eighty-eight different diseases were represented by these. Nine deaths were reported. One hundred and seventy-nine surgical operations were performed; some of them severe. California, Colorado, Georgia, Illinois, Iowa, Idaho, Indiana, Kansas, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Mexico, New York, Ohio, South Dakota, Virginia and Wisconsin furnished some of these patients. The following nationalities have been represented; African, 1; American, 101; Canadian, 6; Danish, 1; English, 9; French, 2; German, 18; Irish, 6; Norwegian, 5; Scotch, 2; Swedish, 11.

Donations have been received from Connecticut, Illinois, Minnesota, Nebraska, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Kansas, Michigan, Indiana, Missouri, Wisconsin, Vermont, North Dakota, South Dakota, Florida, Iowa, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Maine, Montana, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Utah, Virginia, West Virginia, Washington, and Robert J. Levy, commissioner from Constantinople, Turkey, presented a sedan chair from the World's Fair. (A full list of these donations has been reported for publication in the UNION SIGNAL.)

There is a great demand for hospital literature, and at the annual meeting, preliminary steps were taken to secure a supply with which to satisfy it.

The treasurer's report is as follows:

Respectfully submitted,
C. E. BIGELOW, Treasurer.

MRS. RALPH S. GREENLEE, Auditor.

It will be seen that the National Temperance Hospital is one of the few Chicago institutions which is not in debt, and perhaps the only hospital to claim the proud distinction. This is due to careful management and the measure of support you have tendered. The time has come, however, when it needs to build, and the effort will be made to secure a building fund, purchase ground, and erect a structure suited to its needs. It is very desirable that a large membership be secured, and the officers would be glad to welcome to membership in the Hospital Association all individual temperance workers or any local or other union. The fee for membership is $5.00, with $1.00 per annum after the first year. Donations to a building fund, in large or small amounts, are also earnestly solicited. The rental now paid would be no insignificant sum to save for this purpose.

At the annual meeting held September 3rd, 1894, the following officers were elected: President, Mrs. M. E. Kline; vice-president, Mrs. J. B. Hobbs; recording secretary, Mrs. Watson Thatcher; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Ralph Greenlee; treasurer, Mrs. C. E. Bigelow; auditor, Mrs. F. H. Rastall.

Further information will be gladly furnished by the Hospital Board of Trustees on request, addressed to the National Temperance Hospital, 1619 Diversey Avenue, Chicago. MRS. M. E. KLINE, President.

On motion, the report was adopted.

Consent was given that Mrs. Carse let the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association report come in with the report of Miss Sudduth, Mrs. Grow, and Mrs. Stevenson, and she give only the report on the Temple.

Mrs. Carse, who was greeted with great applause, then gave the following report:

THE TEMPERANCE TEMPLE.

A year and a half of unprecedented financial distress is drawing to a close. Thousands of business enterprises have been hopelessly wrecked, and those that were founded on the soundest financial basis have had all they could do to weather the storm. Lack of confidence has almost made shipwreck of the entire business of the country. Such widespread business disasters never before have been known. Under such circumstances, it is not surprising that the Temple interests should have suffered severely. All we have been able to do during this period is to pay the interest on the Temple Trust Bonds and hold on to what we have. The receipts from October 1, 1893, to October 1, 1894, were $17,135.99. In addition we have received a bequest of $1,800 from Mr. Samuel Simpson of West Washington, which is payable in 1895. This is quite a large falling off from the two previous years. Of the $17,135.99, Mr. W. O. Grover, of Boston, Massachusetts, gave $2,000 in Temple Trust Bonds, and Mr. Henry H. Faxon, Quincy, Massachusetts, $1,000 in Trust Bonds. The cash value of these bonds is over $3,000. At the beginning of the year, realizing that a terrible crisis was upon the country, and in order to secure sufficient funds to meet our interest on bonds, we felt we must offer some added inducement in order to have people give. We promised all persons who would place $3.65 in the Temple Mite Box, during 1894, the gift of a beautiful silver souvenir Temple tea spoon. This has resulted in 4,000 persons sending for a Mite Box. About 400 have already sent back the contents of their boxes and claimed the spoons. This leaves 3,600 to be heard from before the first of January. If the contents of these Mite Boxes are all returned, it will aggregate $13,140, and will swell the receipts of the year greatly. Besides, it will enable us to meet the interest on the January Temple Trust Bonds and pay other necessary expenses. There has been a floating debt of $65,000 on the Temple. The dividends from rentals have been applied to this. By the first of January we will have paid off $40,000 of this indebtedness, leaving a balance of $25,000 to be paid the coming year. The following year the Temple Trustees will be drawing dividends on $306,000 worth of stock. This will soon make up for the interest we are now paying out on Temple Bonds. Business failures have caused the cancelling of about $40,000 worth of leases in the Temple during the past year and a half. Our rent roll is now $156,000. It can be seen from this that it would have been $196,000, and probably much more, if the times had not been so disastrous.

However, a brighter day is dawning. Business has improved wonderfully. We have been watching and waiting for this a long time in order to go out in an aggressive campaign to secure funds for the Temple. In fact we made an attempt early last spring in this direction. At the request of the Temple Trustees, I undertook to see what could be done, and made a trip to the Pacific Coast. I had many promises of aid as soon as times should change for the better. I secured one pledge of $50,000, another of $10,000, and others of smaller amounts. I saw, however, that the times were entirely unpropitious to insure the full success of such an undertaking. For instance, one generous man to whom I applied in Boston for $10,000 said, "I would gladly give you that amount, and will do so as soon as times are better, but my income at present is so cut off I fear I have pledged more now than I can meet." He gave me, however, $2,000, which I have already reported. With brightening skies overhead, I intend again this winter to resume the campaign started last March.

In last year's report, I asked for two years' time to secure the necessary funds to set the Temple free and make it ours. I hope much can be done towards this the coming year, but if it can not be completed, the past year of disaster ought not to count, and I should be allowed still another year to complete the undertaking. In the mean time, I shall ask my white ribbon sisters to sustain the enterprise in the same manner they have in the past, and I trust by the expiration of two years the burden will be entirely lifted from their shoulders.

Massachusetts is the banner state this year, as the $3,000 given by Mr. Grover and Mr. Faxon, added to smaller individual gifts with returns from Unions, foots up $3,773.48.

Total receipts from States and individuals	$17,135.99
Balance on hand Oct. 1, 1893	627.90
	$17,757.89

Besides this, we hold a note for $1,800 from Mr. Samuel Simpson, of West Washington. This note is secured by a mortgage, paying 10 per cent. interest; it will mature in 1895.

We expended during the thirteen months ending November first, 1894	$14,995.99
Cash balance on hand November 1, 1894	574.77
Notes receivable	2,187.13
	$17,757.89

The Columbian Publishing Company has made us a very generous offer, which has appeared in the Temple Item column in the UNION SIGNAL several times. If the unions take it up, as they are promising to do, it will pay both them and us well, without any outlay to either. We hope a nice sum by Christmas may be realized from this source.

We are bringing out a little book of the Temple, with full description, embellished with about 30 engravings in half tone, sketches of rooms and different points of beauty and interest in the building. It promises to be a little gem. It will be sold for 25 cents. We hope to have it ready for delivery by the Christmas holidays.

With unwavering trust and a faith undaunted, we shall continue our efforts to free our "House Beautiful" from debt, believing firmly that He who issued the call to "arise and build" will complete that which was begun at His command.

Respectfully submitted,
MATILDA B. CARSE,
President Temple Trustees.

It was moved by Mrs. Benjamin that the report be referred to the Executive Committee for consideration. Carried.

The hymn, "Press On, Press On," was then sung by the convention.

Mrs. Grubb expressed her thanks to the convention for having contributed the amount of $31.02 for the salary of her secretary at Ellis Island.

The chairman then introduced Dr. Mears, pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Cleveland, also Mr. Edwin A. Goodnow.

MR. MEARS: I count it a very great privilege to be here this afternoon, not for my sake only, but as a companion to the honored friend who stands before you, whose right hand has given more than $400,000 in charities—Edwin A. Goodnow, whose charities have reached all across our land, who gave the lumber and set up the building of the woman's department in the Hugenot Seminary in South Africa, by whose benefaction 50 young ladies are being constantly educated for places of usefulness, who has given of his fortune to Moody's school at Northfield, to Mount Holyoke on the Connecticut, to Washburn College in Kansas, and where shall I stop? Words fail me. I have called him on previous occasions a second Moses, slow of speech and he has recognized the fact when I put myself in the position of that priest who stood by the side of Moses, the Aaron to talk while the Moses was working. And so with these words you may regard it that he and I have been making a speech to this convention, although in his modesty he has no conception of the words which I should speak concerning those private gifts that have given public joy and satisfaction wherever those gifts have reached.

Mothers and sisters and daughters, as I have sat here this afternoon and listened, I have said to myself, you have a right to demand of authorities that there should be temperance instruction in public schools. It is the mother's privilege, it is the sister's hope, it is the daughter's protection, and yet the home and the church and the school suffer because of this terrible evil, that like an infectious plague sweeps almost every city and town of our commonwealth and of the nation. I heard the first words uttered on entrance in this line: "Equal rights for the sexes."

Every great question that touches politics is a moral question to-day. The education of our children demands the ballot that shall be the ballot of the mother and the sister as truly as the ballot of the father and the brother. The question of pure city government demands the ballot of those. I cannot for my life see in politics a single question to-day even financial in its nature that is not a moral question, and the moral question demands the moral support of the grand moral force of the community, the mother and the daughter of each home marching together with the mothers and daughters of other homes.

The Rev. Dr. Miller of the Pilgrim Institutional Church of Cleveland, was introduced, and briefly explained the methods which are taught to be introduced in the establishment of Institutional churches: "The attribute of an Institutional church," he said, "are first, a free church where no lines of color, sex or financial condition interfere with the full freedom of worship; second, the church is always open, the sign over the door bearing the legend, "Plymouth Church, open daily 9:30 A. M. to 9:30 P. M. Welcome." The church offers in its interior, recreation rooms, gymnasium, reading rooms, anything that will minister to the daily needs of the daily life of the people. Third, the work of the Institutional church in its auditorium and in its educational classes, is done supremely in the name of Christ, it is an evangelistic church." Having all these attributes, the reverend gentleman claimed kinship with the W. C. T. U. and expressed a strong desire to help further the objects for which it works.

Miss Cummings, of South Africa, was introduced to the convention and expressed her thankfulness for the privilege of meeting with the convention and carrying back to her work a vast fund of information and increased enthusiasm.

The International Supreme Grand Lodge of Good Templars was represented by Mr. E. J. Pinney, who was next presented to the convention. He spoke of the scope of the work of his Order and of the reforms with which they are closely connected, and claimed that in their effort to protect the home and raise up and educate good citizens as well as to bring about such legislation as will stamp out the liquor traffic, the Order of Good Templars, with its membership of over 600,000, all pledged to total abstinence, is a strong ally to the W. C. T. U.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Chair will make a statement. Mrs. Hunt said that she had in the past year spent $6,000, the largest part of which she furnished herself. She is too reticent about it to explain herself, and her friends are anxious that the matter should be put in a clearer light, and so I remind you that it is known that she mortgaged her home at one time for this purpose.

Mrs. Shores, of Ashville, Wis., was brought forward and received as the lady who established the precedent of breaking a bottle of water instead of wine in christening a steamboat. It was discovered that Mrs. Shores was not only a pioneer in this kind of christening but that she was a crusader.

MRS. SHORES said: I feel very grateful for the words of commendation that are coming to me from both my sisters of the white ribbon army and from the brothers, but I did not feel that as a white ribboner I could consistently do anything else.

Chaplain Lozier was called upon and sang, "Mother's Apron String," the words written by himself and the music by his son. Before singing, the Chaplain referred very facetiously to the time, ten or fifteen years ago, when he was the first Prohibition candidate for governor of Iowa and only lacked about 75,000 or 80,000 votes of being elected.

REPORTS OF NATIONAL ORGANIZERS.

Mr. Moody recently said in one of his meetings, "The greatest need of the church to-day is a class of consecrated men between the ministry and the laity." A witty Irishman quickly replied, "Ah, Mr. Moody, we have them already; they are the women, God bless them." The Irishman was right, but every year we realize more and more that these women need to be well organized in order to do effective work.

Most of my time this year has been spent in New York and Pennsylvania. May, June and a part of July were given to that grand old prohibition state of Maine, whose brave women have proven the power of organized effort in helping to enforce their law and protect their homes. These earnest white ribboners of Maine led by their brave and faithful state president, Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, are well organized, and although crippled because they have not the ballot, are a power keenly felt in that state by the law-breakers and advocates of rum.

It has been my privilege to speak in one state prison, at fourteen conventions, conduct four schools of methods, hold thirty-eight parlor meetings, give eighty public addresses, besides addressing L. T. L.'s, Sunday Schools, Teachers' Institutes, and organizing sixteen new unions, securing eight hundred and sixteen active and four hundred and thirty-six honorary members.

I have traveled in the work this year four hundred and twenty-two miles by carriage, three hundred and twenty miles by boat, and five thousand six hundred and nine miles on the railroad. You will readily see that the work of an organizer is not only to form new unions, advise and instruct the members in regard to the work, but to be ready to build up any of our many departments in the old unions we are called to strengthen.

The work of the year has been encouraging, especially in the Evangelistic and Franchise departments, but the combat deepens, and our enemies realize that the ballot in the hands of woman is a death-blow to the liquor traffic, therefore, the forces of evil are combined against us as never before, but we still hear the divine command echoing down the centuries: "Go forward, I will be with thee."

Mrs. Benjamin called for the order of the day.

The Chairman stated that there were several of the organizers absent and that if Mrs. Benjamin would hold over her motion for a little while, the organizers' reports could all be finished up.

Mrs. Benjamin asked that a vote be taken on the matter.

A vote being taken, and the Chair being in doubt, she asked whether consent would be given that the remaining reports be heard. Consent was given and the following reports were given:

MRS. ELLEN DAYTON BLAIR, LOS ANGELES, CAL.

Not since the Crusade of twenty years ago, where I received my first inspiration to work for the young, have I been more encouraged by the outlook for future success than during the last two years of my work, and never have I realized more the leading of the Divine hand than in my trip across the continent and return.

While I have found serious hindrances in the lack of leaders for Loyal Temperance Legions and in the multiplicity of other organizations, yet far better work is being done and a new inspiration is given by our advanced methods as well as a new ambition to send delegates to W. C. T. U. Conventions.

This year Pennsylvania's children are justly proud to be the first state represented at a National convention, having paid $50 into the national treasury. As Miss Willard predicted this has aroused a new desire to "belong." I find great enthusiasm in Senior Grade work as the result of the state L. T. L. convention in New York, which it was my pleasure to attend.

Not in all my ten years of chalk-talking have I found so many open doors for this work. Public schools, junior Endeavor societies, Sunday Schools and their state and county conventions have invited my coming, and best of all with the increased opportunities God has given me new health and strength.

Wyoming made a specialty of L. T. L. work in 1893 and I organized in every principal town as the result. In Oregon the State superintendent traveled with me and nowhere have I found more efficient work.

But in California as I addressed the dear Indian children trained by Mrs. Bidwell; the Spanish boys and girls in the public schools; and the Chinese Kindergartners in Los Angeles, I saw in their very faces the transforming power of Christian teaching and found them well taught in gospel and scientific temperance.

Not being present last year I will report for the past two years. I have traveled about 12,000 miles in nineteen states. I have attended many state, district and county conventions conducting or assisting at L. T. L. conferences. I have organized 34 Loyal Temperance Legions and have sent out a large number of my Outline Charts to aid others in giving chalk-talks, one being sent to Burmah for their first National convention. I am planning to hold county L. T. L. conferences this coming winter, as I traveled in New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey. I would urge the importance of these conferences everywhere among L. T. L. workers to overcome the ignorance of some and to aid those seeking instruction.

I think a plan for teaching our department work to the children should be published, for I find it has been done by some with marked success, thus literally training them to fill our places so soon to be vacated. As another means for promoting more intelligent work I would suggest a circulatory correspondence among our state and local superintendents. A plan for this and other new plans will be discussed in our daily L. T. L. conferences during the convention.

MRS. MAUDE GREEN, MANITOU, COL.

What new word can I bring? It is the old, old story, only that the field is broadening, new vistas are opening daily before the one who would do conscientious work for the dear Lord Jesus and the children whom he loves.

During the past year I have travelled 8,000 miles; worked in 8 states, given 91 chalk-talks; addressed 40,000 people, held 65 conferences; attended 5 conventions; organized 6 legions; distributed 20,000 pages of literature; written 1,000 letters; written chalk-talks; stories and other articles for papers and magazines and prepared papers on the work to be read at public meetings. Last winter I spent much time in New York city, working often among the poor little ones in the slums, speaking often on the streets, in missions and in prisons and jails. Yes, boy and girl faces have looked from behind prison bars and eagerly taken my message for them. And yet, sisters, my greatest and only discouragement in the work is the difficulty in securing leaders in our children's work. Daily mother and sister's lips have said to me: "I'm not fitted, I could never work with the children." So also almost daily wistful-faced boys and girls must be turned away from my meetings, disappointed because no one can be found who believes they have heard the divine command, "forbid them not to come unto me," these little ones, "for of such is the kingdom of heaven." I have longed to be in a hundred places at once, but so far have not been able to accomplish the feat. I have held the office of state superintendent of L. T. L. and S. S. work for Colorado and have tried to keep others busy there and be a helpful general at least. But oh, much more could be accomplished if there were only a larger number of willing leaders to take the work we would organize. You have heard the sad words of the mother, whose mother heart Christ-like, leaps past the ninety and nine safe danger post, to the "only one boy lost." "One boy, the widow moaned, some heart for that one boy will pine and break and die with grief and why, why might it not be mine?" And so it will be here when the mother hearts to-day fully realize with the sailor widow that "it might be mine," this boy, more surely lost than the sailor lad in the seething sea. Then we shall no longer plead for leaders for our boys and girls.

The work is broadening. To-day as I look out over the field there is a glimpse of ocean and of "regions beyond" and the musical chime of a foreign tongue, mingles with the familiar rise and fall of home voices and I trust, if God so wills that dark-browed little ones shall lift their faces to mine and their questioning eyes shall read some message from the pictured truth, even before words are given that they may understand during the coming year.

I stand to-day awed and still before God as He opens His blessed way before me.

MRS. E. NORINNE LAW, BARAGA, MICH.

Beloved Comrades: My report will represent the work of only a part of a year, as I have been ill during a great portion of this period. Number of lectures given 59; number of gospel sermons, 10; number of afternoon meetings held for the purpose of instructing unions in the work, 25; number of letters written about 1,500.

I have attended one district and two county conventions, have addressed Loyal Legions, Sabbath schools, public schools, Young People's meetings, of which I have kept no exact account; have secured several members and organized five unions, have tried to arouse our unions everywhere to realize the necessity of taking our papers. These, with the varied experiences that accompany them, have made up the year's work.

The part of the field in which I have labored during the year gives great reasons for encouragement. I have found the people more willing than ever before to come out to the meetings and listen with an idea of believing. Have also noticed a great disposition on the part of the unions to become intelligent W. C. T. U. workers, which means much toward success. The old crusade fire seems to have taken hold of their hearts, and we see them pushing on to victory.

I find there is deep thinking going on in the homes.

Fathers are not quite so sanguine as they were that it is all right to vote. Mothers are awakening to a sense of their duties, and the children are receiving better training in their homes. Sons and daughters are striving to become intelligent as to the best means of overcoming the drink habit and destroying the liquor traffic. I find that our organization has become well sifted. Let us take courage and move on to victory.

BELLE KEARNEY, FLORA, MISS.

Have worked in four states, namely: Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, and Mississippi, and, recently have spoken for the Y.'s in Washington City. Have delivered eighty-five addresses, organized nine W. C. T. U.'s, twelve Y.'s, and one L. T. L. Held twenty-four business meetings and several parlor meetings, conducted three state Y. conferences, attended four state W. C. T. U. conventions and two district conventions, lectured in boys' and girls' colleges and for the colored people, and represented the W. C. T. U. at the Delaware state convention of the Christian Endeavor Society.

The following telegram was read from Charles M. Chittenden:

Afraid I cannot possibly reach the convention during present session. Phil. 1, 2-4.

MRS. KINNEY: Madam Chairman, I don't think you said half enough about the beauties of this issue of the UNION SIGNAL. This picture of Neal Dow is very fine, and well worth framing. Every woman should take home more than one of them.

The communication from Drs. Buckley and Vincent being called for, the secretary read from George E. Vincent: I regret exceedingly that other engagements will prevent my being present. I trust that the occasion will be all that you anticipate.

GEO. E. VINCENT.

From J. M. Buckley: "I regret to have to say that business in this part of the country makes it impossible for me to comply with your request inviting me to be present at the twenty-first anniversary of the National W. C. T. U. I wish you a delightful anniversary and new inspiration for earnest work and continued prosperity in all things which contribute to the interests of the Kingdom of Christ, for this country and universal humanity. J. M. BUCKLEY."

MRS. STEVENS: We have a letter just received from Dr. Hale. I wish I might read it all, but I am going to ask permission to read just one sentence in which the doctor says, "I read Miss Williard's address annually with the feeling that it is really of more importance to the country than is the message of the President of the United States."

After the prolonged applause which followed the reading of this extract, the Chairman said: "I don't think Edward ought to been so hard on the President even if he does disagree with his politics."

(At the request of a delegate the letter is produced in full.)

ROXBURY, MASS., Nov. 17, 1894.

My Dear Madam:—

When your note came I had a faint hope that I might be able to be present for one day at your convention. But this is impossible, so I can only express my good wishes and congratulations on paper. I remember very well the birth of the Union. At that time I knew the State of Ohio well and was much there and had an opportunity to see the result of the magnificent courage of the ladies to whom I suppose the birth of the Union must be given. From that time to this, like all other friends of temperance I have enjoyed the success of your movement, as the number of your members has enlarged and your plans have proved themselves effective. I read Miss Willard's address annually with the feeling that it is really more important to the country than is the message of the President of the United States. I could wish, indeed, that there were any officer of our government whose duty it was to review from every point of view the history of the country, its progress and its needs, with the same care with which she reviews that history from the point of view of the president of the Union. Will you give to her the expression of my hope for her health and strength and to any of the ladies around you in the management many thanks for their loyal and disinterested duty. With great respect, my dear Mrs. Woodbridge, I have the honor to be,

Your obedient servant,
EDWARD E. HALE.

MRS. STEVENS: Then we have the most cordial greetings from the Methodist ministers' meeting, which was in session this morning.

Convention adjourned to me at 7:30 P. M.

MONDAY EVENING.

ANNIVERSARY EXERCISES.

In charge of Mrs. Monroe, President of Ohio.

All Crusaders in the house were called to the stage, and devotional exercises conducted by Mrs. Reeves, followed by the singing of the hymn "Coronation" and the reading of the Crusade Psalm.

Song, "By and By".

THE CHAIRMAN: Dear Friends, you who have the program in your hands notice that this is an anniversary occasion—the twenty-first anniversary of the crusade that began in Ohio. I think the large majority of people in this audience have known but little of the crusade. They can never estimate what it meant to the women of Ohio to go out of their sheltered homes, out into the street to speak and to pray, the majority of those women having never heard their own voices in prayer even in their own homes. I think you can never understand how bitterly these women cried, "If it be possible let this cup pass from me", and yet, how sweetly they said finally, "Not as I will, but as Thou wilt". And so these women went out from their homes; they went out into the streets to kneel in the mud and the slush and the rain; they went from the streets into saloons, and how mightily the gospel of love and mercy was presented none can know but those who heard them. These women spoke not of themselves, but as they were moved by the Holy Spirit. They sometimes wondered if it were possible that they were really themselves, and they knew that the power that was upon them was the power of God. Many of these crusaders have passed away; their numbers are becoming less and less every year. The majority of them have passed over to the great majority, but we have a number of these ladies with us to-night, and it is my pleasure to present to you Mrs. Mary B. Ingham, who was one of the original movers for the calling of this great convention, and who invited the first convention of the National W. C. T. U. to Cleveland. She was also a crusader.

MRS. MARY B. INGHAM.

The Temperance Crusade, Croisade, or, bearing the Cross of Christ into saloons and other strongholds of the liquor traffic, has in it the invincible, the immortal, for did not our Leader say during His incarnation, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me!"

During March and April of 1874, in the city of Cleveland, 3,000 women were leagued together to suppress intemperance in our wards.

For six weeks the city was shaken by the might of prayer and the traffic trembled, groaned and writhed under the power of God so manifest in our streets.

Can the results of this upheaval within our commonwealth be enumerated?

There have evolved ten distinct amazing consequences.

The Crusade did more for the advancement of Woman's Cause than all the combined influences of the centuries. Here, she found an eloquent tongue, a devising brain, a ready hand.

Personal visitation in homes of the intemperate and evil resorts; also in police stations, jails and workhouses.

Reforms, generally, have been instituted among criminal classes. Bible readings in various centers and distribution of temperance literature; indeed, all practical agencies for evangelization have been adopted by volunteer missionaries; in short, the masses are reached.

Cooking schools for women, sewing and kitchen garden classes for girls, bands of hope and evening instruction for boys, temperance and Sabbath schools for both sexes; teaching to public school children the pernicious effects of alcohol upon the human system.

Friendly inns, people's tabernacles and chapels have been established with their gospel services, enthusiastic anniversaries, reformed men's and mothers meetings, open doors, training schools, drinking fountains, reading rooms and lodging houses.

The various lines of department work; especially the organization of the L. T. L's., and the Y's.

Isabella Thoburn and her brother James, our own Bishop Thoburn, were the first beyond the seas to catch the inspiration of the Crusade, and the streets of Calcutta in 1874 were resounding with the songs of Zion. A great church was founded as the result, unions in India were formed by Mrs. Hauser, speedily all lands are girded with the white ribbon of abstinence and purity.

Constitutional amendment campaigns for prohibitory measures have followed and righteous legislation has been made popular in several states and territories. Agitation of a most healthy character has given impetus to the establishment of Christ's kingdom on earth.

Kindred organizations are forming as a network over the whole of our beloved country, determined upon its redemption. The Cleveland Alliance, omnipartisan and nonsectarian, includes in its membership representatives of eighty-five different temperance societies, and presenting not long since an audience of 4,000 people to listen to Woolley and Watterson. Anti-saloon leagues and civic federations have their faces set toward abolition of the trade in human souls.

Last of all, the old Catholic church is awakening from the sleep of ages and is in the rear of the procession. When this communion shall be fully roused and when all men and women join hands for better government, then shall the open saloon be forever driven from our streets and the emancipation of our whole country quickly follow.

May God speed the day!

THE CHAIRMAN: We have the dear woman who wrote the call for the first convention to be held in Cleveland and presided at that time, Mrs. Jennie F. Willing.

MRS. JENNIE FOWLER WILLING.

Our Lord said of Mary of Bethany; "She hath done what she could." We may say of many a temperance woman: "She hath done what she thought she could not." Mary of Nazareth said: "Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it unto me even as thou wilt." Her submission meant possible disgrace and death, but it brought salvation to the world. This was clearly set forth in those old Chautauqua days when our great society was born. I, for one, was sure of being and doing less than the least of all small people. The effort seemed most commonplace and weak. Yet a gracefully magnificent tree has grown from the tiny seed dropped that day by trembling hands.

A personal reminiscence may be in order. I was teaching in the University of Bloomington, Ill., when the crusade struck the town. I was carrying all the English in the college, and so busy that I had almost to have my dressmaking done by photograph, and my shoes fitted by telegram. I had no time to be babyish, but I actually cried to think that I could not give one ounce of strength to the grand crusade work. My husband, my Nestor, said: "Wait, dear, if the Lord would have you do anything for him on this line, he is bound to furnish the time and strength." He is "A just and faithful knight of God. His strength is as the strength of ten, because his heart is pure." When he says wait, I usually wait. I went to the meeting; we formed a union, I became its president, leading a temperance prayer-meeting every day for weeks, and my college work was as well done as before. We carried Bloomington for "no license," the largest town in the United States captured by the crusade, and organized the Illinois State Union, one of the very best.

The next summer Dr. Vincent asked me to go to Chautauqua, and give one of the dedicatory addresses, and to speak on Woman and Temperance. I went and made the speeches, and came out alive, though I had to hold on tightly to the pulpit, to keep from going headlong into the congregation. The one part of the service that I remember was my husband's opening prayer for the poor, little woman at his side who was scared half out of her wits. "Lord, she is Thine," he said. "Take Thine own, and do as Thou wilt. Use voice, and thought, and life, all for Thine own glory." My brother, Dr. Fowler, followed my address with a description of the imprisonment of the Ohio Crusaders. He was in the meeting from which the women went to their arrest. The glory of the Lord rested almost tangibly upon them. He followed them out into that howling, jeering, blaspheming mob. God led them, and he would have followed them into the jaws of death, into the mouth of hell. The baptism of the Holy Spirit made the Crusade possible. Other meeting were held at Chautauqua resulting in the call of the Cleveland convention, and the organization of our great National Society. Gough, who knew temperance work as other people do the way to the dinner table, said this was the greatest temperance society in the world. God only can measure its success.

Diamond hunters pick up many cheap pebbles in finding the one that holds a fortune. Among the small stones of our endeavor, we have found our Koh-i-noor, our "Mountain of light," glowing with heaven's own eternal splendor.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Woman's Christian Temperance Union was organized on the 17th of June, 1874, at Springfield, O. There was an Ohio woman at Chautauqua at that time, and when she heard of what they were doing down there, she said, "Well, if Ohio has organized, the nation will organize," and so she procured permission of Dr. Vincent to make an announcement, calling women together. And this woman is present with us tonight, and it is my pleasure to introduce to you Mrs. M. McClellan Brown.

MRS. BROWN: Madam chairman, ladies and gentlemen: The crusade of which you have heard tonight found me on the temperance platform and in the prohibition party work. I had been speaking on temperance six years prior to the coming of the women — all about me on the platform, and I think my feelings on that auspicious occasion must have been something like that experienced by Col. Anderson in Fort Sumter when the reinforcements came to aid in the terrible crisis. For our state was in a crisis then, a crisis which had been pending for several years, and the people were moving in the direction of the removal of the saloon under what was known as the Adair law.

There were not less than nine thousand pledged women in the State of Ohio when the crusade found us and these women were saying "something must be done," and I have three thousand letters in my office to prove this fact. But the willingness of women to go out and do the kind of work which was done by the crusaders was the gift of God, was a supreme power exactly the converse of what had prevailed in this state where the transcendence of God had doubtless been recognized by all the churches and good people of the state. Now, the maintenance of His spirit-power in the hearts of the women and the willingness to step out as Sister Willing has told you, to step out beyond the quiet threshold of home, beyond the pass word, into the open street and kneel before God, and in the presence of vile men, the lowliest thing that a woman could possibly do, the lowliest and humblest work for God that she could do she was willing to do to rescue this mighty commonwealth for God and His humanity. Oh, the down-shedding power was wonderful, wonderful indeed, were the results, wonderful indeed were those schoolings, teachings, developings, growings in the power of womanhood, powers that had never been used before, powers that developed a keen intellect, strong body, willing feet, noble purposes, grand life. And one of the great results which my good Sister Ingham forgot to mention, a power of love shed abroad through all the states to break down the barriers between the Christian churches. And all the women, without respect to creed, began in one grand bundle of love to do whatever the hand findeth to carry out this great work.

Some one asked me to-day, "Mrs. Brown, is it possible that you carried the little plan of the National convention in your pocket to Chautauqua Lake for organization?" "It is even so." "Why, then, was it never told?" Why should it be? History of the great work which was inaugurated by the infinite spirit of God is here in the National convention. Living characters are better than written pages.

Why did I not mention the fact nor bring out the little paper which was crumpled and stained with baby fingers fumbling while I wrote and worked in my home? Because I was a prohibitionist and I was under suspicion that I might not exactly be under the influence of the sweet spirit of the Master. I was a suffragist and it was said of me in the convention in Cleveland that I had no part in this matter, although I have traveled and worked and toiled and organized until I was brought down to the very gates of death. But what matters so the work is done and I could be no other than a prohibitionist and a suffragist twenty-one years ago. God, who leadeth you, lead me to the logical conviction that the straight path to the suppression of the liquor crime in my country is the path of prohibition and the universal ballot. I could do no less than maintain these principles, no more than keep them to myself and step back and push out these women who were not known to be so far as I had any humble power to do so, push to the front those women who were not suffragists that they might be acceptable, that they might win, that they might work with you, gain you by love which was not less in my heart but which as I said was under your feet. I do not doubt but the operation of the spirit of God upon the brain and heart leading you into these paths of usefulness in which you to-day walk, is just as fiery, is just as powerful, is just as acceptable to your Infinite Father as were those novel modes of work twenty years ago, and may God keep you in these paths and guide you out, leading you to the full fruition of the hopes and the works which you are carrying forward.

Song, "Victory," Mrs. Harris.

In response to an enthusiastic encore, Mrs. Harris sang a song for Ohio.

THE CHAIRMAN: Dear friends, don't you wish you all hailed from Ohio. We are very sorry that Mother Stewart had to leave the city on account of her extreme feeble condition. We had also expected the pleasure of presenting to you Mrs. H. C. McCabe of Delaware, who was the first president of the State of Ohio, but we have with us Mrs. Eliza J. Thompson, who was the first present President of the Union. It is not necessary for me to tell you that she was a Crusader and led out the first Crusade band. She was also a delegate to the convention held here in Cleveland in 1874.

MRS. THOMPSON: I am so much of an old-fashioned Methodist that I like to have, as the old Methodist preachers in the log cabins had, a chair for my pulpit. I have not been trained to oratory, as some of our dear ladies have, and it certainly was not born in me, and so I will give you a few words leaning upon the chair.

was thinking tonight of the first invitation I ever received to speak before an audience. The second week of our Crusade, in the early morning prayer meeting, Dr. McShorely took a letter out of his pocket from one of the trustees of Hardin's Creek school house, and this letter said: "Dear Dr. McShorely, I hear strange things are coming to pass in Hillsboro," (mind you, he lived eight miles in the country, and there were very bad roads, and the old gentleman hadn't been to town and hadn't seen the Crusaders on the street, and he said), "Among other things, I hear that the women have got to talking, and we want one of them to come out to Hardin's Creek school house and talk to our people, for they have been hearing the men all these years and it looks like it don't do them any good." Dr. McShorely said, "I give you the letter just as it is written, now, who will go?" Well, as leader of the band he looked at me, naturally, and I shook my head. Mrs. McDowell was not only a cousin but an aunt of mine by marriage and several years my senior. She looked at me and said, "If cousin Eliza will go, I will go with her," and I thought to myself now, I have faced the saloons, I had knelt in the sawdust upon the floors, but if my husband and family hear that I am going out in the country to make a speech what will they do, and my heart absolutely grew so heavy I don't think I could have arisen in my seat. At last Dr. McShorely said to me, "You will promise me to go home and pray for me." "Oh, I said, "yes, I will do that." Well, when the meeting was over Mrs. McDowell and myself started across to our home, a back street. It seemed to me I couldn't have gone up the streets of Hillsboro, everybody could see how large my heart was and how heavy it was. Finally Mrs. McDowell said, "What shall we do about this matter?" "Well," I said, "I am going home to pray about it." We prayed ourselves out into the crusade, the Bible gave us directions, and I am going to take the same course. Every difficulty that arises up in my pathway I will go to the Bible on my knees. And the dear old lady said, "Well, I will wait and see what the Lord says to you, and then I will go if He tell you to go." Well, I went home and I made my wants known to the dear Father. Now, I don't want you all fo think that I am a wild enthusiast, but I do believe that when the Lord says that His spirit would take of the things of God, and show them to His children, I believe it, and I acted upon that belief. He showed me, I think, the tenth verse of the 81st Psalm. "Now, remember the Lord thy God has brought me up out of Egypt. Open thy mouth wide and I will fill it." And the only trouble with me that I have never opened my mouth wide, and the circumstances of my home have kept me very quiet. I have been a mother and a diligent home keeper. I have been off to conventions, of course, and I have done a great deal of temperance work, but I have never become a public speaker, so this evening I can only talk to you a little about the crusade. I will tell you about our first Crusade prayer meeting in the saloon. The first day we entered a saloon for persuasion was the second day after starting out. We first visited the drug stores and hotels. We had a sort of idea in our minds of grading them in that way. I don't know why, because we didn't know that our druggist sold a drop of liquor, except one dear lady whose boy became very sick from taking some soda water in a drug store and so we were pretty sure that something was used besides soda water, and we visited that druggist and he was the only one by the way, in our town who did not yield to our importunities. He sued us for ten thousand dollars and we had two weeks' experience in the court house and made a great deal doubtless of temperance sentiment, for the country people came in as though it was a sort of menagerie or something of that kind. The court house was filled for two weeks every day, and I must tell you how it wound up. The ladies were compelled by the ruling of the judge to pay five dollars, which threw the cost upon the temperance people. Pretty soon after this occurred our lawyers appealed the case to a higher court. In the meantime this druggist took the benefit of the bankrupt law, and as my husband happened at that time to be the judge in a bankrupt court he had to decide in this case. Well, the result was this that this druggist had to have, I believe they call it an assignee appointed, and he wouldn't take the trouble to collect the temperance fees or to prosecute the case, so it hangs up now still in that higher court or I don't know where. We went scot free.

I want to say right now that I see victory everywhere, everywhere. I see it on that map. Long ago we got up something like that, before Mrs. Hunt thought about it, only we had black spots for the states that had become temperance, and all the rest was left colorless. I picked it up the other day when I received Mrs. Hont's work with that map, and I compared our Hillsboro map in white cotton, you know, printed out beautifully for our entertainment, and we had just the same number of black spots showing the states that had become temperance that she has on that map. Just to think of the whole United States, all the states and territories given up to temperance, except five.

Now, I want to say to all these temperance ladies that I know all over the country we are not casting the light as a lighthouse—I believe I saw that in THE UNION SIGNAL, where I get all my ideas. It is said that the lighthouse casts its rays over into the seas while all around its base is dark and damp and gloomy. Now, we women are not that way, we are bringing the light of this glorious temperance gospel into our homes as well as casting it out upon the dark seas of humanity, and many homes are made bright and joyous and happy by the redeeming power of this temperance gospel, and my heart rejoices and I feel that victory is in the air.

THE CHAIRMAN: No doubt, dear friends, you will think this is Ohio night and not a National night. Well, we cannot help that. You know how many great statesmen and generals and presidents of the United States come from Ohio, and now tonight we want to introduce a Massachusetts woman, but lo and behold she is from Ohio too. Mrs. S. S. Fessenden, of Boston.

MRS. FESSENDEN; Madam Chairman, I am an evolutionist in the highest sense of the word. I believe in evolution. The law of progress, the law of growth I believe to be God's law. Because a thing has never been I do not think is any reason that it never should be. I do not know whether I was ever a protoplasm or not. I know that I was a Buckeye and that I evolved into a Bostonian. The mayor said the other night a great many important things had originated in Ohio. I agree with him. I think this grand organization is a fine illustration of evolution. We have heard a great many delightful things from those who participated in the crusade. This organization did not have its origin in an ape, but it had it in the heart of the mothers, the heart of Mother Thompson, and others, and the first offshoot from that was the Crusade. We have listened with great delight to those who participated in it. I am ashamed to confess before you to-night that I was one of those belated individuals who did not believe in that Crusade. I said, "the thing ought to be done, but that is not the right way to do it." I called myself a conservative and I felt very superior. But I have learned later to define a conservative as one who is too stupid to keep up to the light of the age. How many times I have thought since with what scorn must God look upon those pusillanimous creatures here who sit back in their self-righteousness and criticise any progress in any cause for lifting up mankind, for instilling courage into the weak and opening opportunities for progress. This great host of women are publishing the tidings of the outgrowth of that little seed of brotherhood. In old Roman days they knew no such idea as brotherhood of man, much less of woman. All those who were outside of the city, the Romans looked upon as enemies and the law of nations was the triumph of superior strength. In Greece they had no word to express humanity. The world was divided into Greeks and barbarians, and Socrates but voiced his contemporaries' thoughts when he caused Damon to give thanks that he was born a man, not a beast, a male not a female, a Greek not a barbarian. When Christ came He taught common brotherhood with a common Father. It is because Christ came that this great organization of women is possible. It is in spite of his wishing that our great nation violates the law of brotherhood by its continued injustice to woman. This law of brotherhood involves the proper estimation and consideration of our industrial classes. It is very easy to look out over Boston common and see an idle forlorn set of men listen to the harangue of a Morris and Swift, or to follow the Coxey army with its folly and imbecibility, or to shudder over the atrocity of a miners' strike in Colorado or to condemn a Pullman boycott in Chicago, and then explain "The work people of this country are fools and never know when they are well off, they ought to be crowded to the wall and compelled to submit to the fashion of life as they have found it. It is not so easy, but it is wiser to discriminate between a company of tramps who are posing as the unemployed and demand food and shelter and clothing which they have not the will to earn, and asking for work which they have not the energy to do, and the great army of industrial work people that is to-day reaching out for better conditions. In the broil for means to live, all that makes life worth the living is trampled under foot with many of our unfortunate poor, the submerged classes that never knew love's consecrated dew, and they never knew a mother's kiss of purity, they never had the tendrils of a happy home bound about their lives, but side by side with heartsease grew the fatal night shade and bitter rue. It is true, those people are not very wise, but they know that they are hungry and that a great many people who do not work half as hard have enough and to spare. In this state of mind they have not a very great deal of respect for the law, having felt only its sting, very easily imposed upon by agitators who use them for individual gain and for personal ambition. And we, deeming ourselves God's elect, sip our coffee and call them fools. A pastor in one of our worthy churches not very long ago preached to a wealthy congregation, not a single member of which had ever known a want which money could not supply, and he told them that poverty was a blessing, that it was intended to elevate the poor to more spiritual life, and that luxurious congregation returned to their luxurious homes perfectly content that the poor should enjoy their means of grace unmolested. Why didn't that man tell his people the truth? Why didn't he tell them that poverty is a curse that is pressed in on the lives of the poor by the luxury and selfishness of the rich? Why not tell them that riches is a gift of God, and the possession of it involves a tremendous responsibility for the uplift of the masses. The law of brotherhood, it seems to me, involves purity in municipal politics to the end that the ignorant may be lifted out of the darkness of ignorance and the stumbling blocks taken out of the way of the wicked. To this end it is very important that we stop the immense influx of immigration that is pouring so constantly to our shores and then begin a national housecleaning, close brothels and saloons and make an end of base monopolies. Most of all this arrogant, heartless, selfish monopoly, the liquor traffic, of which it is not too much to say that it holds the balance of power in our political machinery. It lays its strong hand on all town councils, on all state legislatures, on all national affairs at the capital. It dictates to our legislators and buys what it cannot bear. It is an insatiable power that year by year dominates ever more the departments of our government. In its inexorable hand it holds the wealth of multitudes, a willing sacrifice to selfish greed. It fastens on broken hearts, desolated homes and debauched manhood and crippled and diseased childhood and strange to say, it asks the protection of law in the care of such as these. How any man in this great country of ours, in this beautiful city of Cleveland can pass up and down throught your streets and pass these two thousand saloons and then remember the debauched manhood, the miserable homes, the children robbed of all the beauty of their child-life and then not have every drop of blood in his veins boil with indignation and his nerves tingle with a righteous desire and a holy resolve—in the name of humanity and of humanity's God, we will end all this.

The chairman then introduced Madam Layah Barakat, who said she desired to tell a little Japanese story. She had been afraid the story would be too childish, for this grand ladies' meeting, but had been told that the ladies of the convention were all God's children and would like to hear the story, so she would tell it to keep them in good humor so they would give generously toward the collection. She then told the story of a very selfish woman who had two sons, one being her own son, the other a stepson. She desired that her own son should live a long time, but that her stepson should live only a short time, so she gave her own son a very long name, and to her stepson a very short one. Now, it so happened that one day her stepson fell into the well, and a little child saw him falling in, and ran and screamed as loud as it could that the boy had fallen into the well, and as he had a very short name, it did not take very long to alarm the neighbors and let them know what had happened, and they very soon succeeded in getting the boy out of the well. Very soon after this the true son of this woman fell into the well and an old man saw it and tried to alarm the neighborhood, but as the name of the boy was so long, it took so long a time to tell what had happened that in the meantime the boy was drowned, and in this way the mother's selfishness caused the death of her son. She closed by saying that she was sure the ladies of this convention were not selfish because they were children of God, and urged them to give a good collection.

HON. SAMUEL DICKEY, Chairman of the Prohibition party, was then introduced and spoke in part as follows: It is a pleasure to me to attend a session of this great national body, to look into the faces of these earnest women and to realize that they constitute what is undoubtedly to-day the most thoroughly organized and best disciplined army on all these great battlefields against the organized saloons. I want to congratulate every white ribbon woman that is present here to-night upon the marvellous work that has been accomplished by this organization. Even if the Woman's Christian Temperance Union had done nothing except within the limits of its own membership, the development of character, the bringing out of ability, the growth of womanhood that has been fostered by this great body of women justifies a thousand times its existence. It has added to the richness of human life and to the development of womanly character and has strengthened and broadened every element that goes to make American womanhood the splendid one it is to-day.

THE CHAIRMAN: We will now have the pleasure of listening to our dear Miss Willard. We always reserve the best wine for the last.

MISS WILLARD: You should not talk of wine in this presence, even if it is unfermented. At the time of the Buffalo convention the story was started that we had taken to drinking wine, because we had tested some unfermented wine where they would not allow a drop of what was intoxicating.

Now, will you bring forward a beautiful illuminated object lesson of a beautiful life? (Referring to testimonial to Neal Dow, which was here brought on the stage). This is an expression of the love, the honor, the gratitude of the white ribbon women organized in Great Britain in their great national society, the white ribbon women organized in America in this great national society and the white ribbon women of the world's W. C. T. U. for General Neal Dow, the champion of prohibition. Some men go their way in life to see how much they can get and how little they can give, not so Neal Dow. Some men are in politics for revenue only, not so Neal Dow. At sixty years of age, when he had already become the leading and central figure for the prohibition movement, and had attained the title of father of prohibition, he marshaled a company, got together a regiment and headed it towards those boys in gray, who are now fraternizing with the boys in blue, headed it towards those that were then our enemies, but are now our friends, so that in this very audience to-day, we have been singing, "Maryland, my Maryland," to the tune of "Press on, Press on." If you go to Great Britain in a great audience such as they have there, of five and ten thousand in the temperance ranks, you will hear no American name of a temperance worker applauded with that cheery, "Hear, hear" of the British, and that tumultous rising up of the audience, as I have said, no other name except Neal Dow's. I heard Sir Wilfred Lawson with his gay wisdom, I listened to Canon Wilberforce with his brilliant rhetoric, I listened to Lady Henry Somerset with her melodious voice and to Mrs. Ormiston Chant, with her electric gift of oratory, and many others whose names are not so well known to us, as in Exeter Hall they assembled on the birthday of Neal Dow.

We had hoped that he would stand here this evening and would himself receive the testimonial wrought by one of our best Chicago artists, a testimonial bearing medalion pictures of some of our leaders and among them the picture of our beloved and lamented Mary A. Woodbridge. But as that grand old hero was not able to come we do the next best thing, we bring forth his daughter, his home-maker, his housekeeper, his companion, his friend, whom I really want to include in the testimonial, for I would like to hand it down to posterity. They will be more proud of that than we know how to be. I, therefore, call upon Cornelia Dow, who has served us many a year on our committee on resolutions, for we early found out that Neal Dow's daughter ought to know how to draw up a platform and who has served us all through the convention as our sergeant-at-arms and who is the right hand of Mrs. Stevens of Maine, who is herself the right hand of Neal Dow in prohibition work, and I ask Miss Dow to accept on behalf of the grand chivalric white cross knight, her father, this testimonial of the love and honor that we feel toward him, and so, Cornelia, dear comrade and friend, accept and take home to the General with the love of all the white ribboners the testimonial that we have had prepared for him.

MISS DOW acknowledged the testimonial in a few well-chosen words, saying that it would be treasured by his children and his grandchildren for years to come. She also stated that her father was not ill, as had been stated by some papers, but did not consider it safe to take so long a journey at this time.

At the request of Miss Willard, the audience gave Miss Dow the Chautauqua salute.

MISS ACKERMAN, the round-the-world-missionary, was then presented and greeted with great applause. She said that at this late hour she would not detain the audience but simply wished to express her pleasure at finding herself again in her native land.

The meeting adjourned after the singing of a hymn.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

Convention met at 9:30 a. m., and after singing, "How Firm a Foundation," was led in prayer by Mrs. Mount.

The minutes of yesterday's afternoon session were read and accepted.

The chair referred to the quotations at the head of every page of the program as being the thought and work of Mary A. Woodbridge, and read those of the program of today.

MRS. CAMPBELL (Wisconsin): I hereby give notice that at the next annual meeting I, or someone in my place, will move to amend Article 1 of the Constitution by inserting after the word "president" the words "vice president at large."

MRS. TEATS: When I have a good thing I always like to pass it along, and we have in our California delegation one whom we like to call our California girl, and we would like to have her on the program, Miss Ackerman.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think as much. I don't think she is a California girl, she is the big bouncing world's girl. I think it will be well to appoint a committtee of three to escort her to the platform. When I go around the world I shall expect that attention.

MISS ACKERMAN: I went all around the world alone and I think I can get to the platform alone.

Mrs. Burt moved that Miss Ackerman be made a member of this convention. The motion was unanimously carried, and a committee consisting of Mrs. Teats, of California, Mrs. Hammer, of Pennsylvania, and Mrs. Eagle, of Lousiana, and Mrs. Monroe, of Ohio, also Mrs. Burt, of New York, and Mrs. Rice, of Massachusetts was appointed and escorted Miss Ackerman to the platform.

The Chairman exhibited Miss Ackerman's well-worn bag, well covered with custom house stamps, labels, etc., and suggested that only a woman could have carried a bag a hundred and fifty thousand miles and brought it back with its component parts.

Mrs. Forbes, of Connecticut, thought it injustice to take away the bag and not give her another, with which sentiment the chair agreed, and thought that a good idea to be allowed to evolute.

MISS ACKERMAN: The most interesting thing about that bag is that it has contained twenty thousand pledges, signed by men, and nine thousand membership cards, signed by women who have joined.

MRS. CHENEY: I am very anxious indeed that our National organ shall obtain at least one hundred thousand subscribers, and so I want to throw out a suggestion to this convention that may help in this good work. I want to ask all the ladies who are being entertained, and royally entertained, as I know they are, to subscribe for the UNION SIGNAL for their hostesses for the coming year. I beg that this suggestion may be carried out and that the chairman of each delegation will appoint some one to take subscriptions in her delegation, and leave here as a memento of this grand convention these grand numbers of the DAILY UNION SIGNAL, in recognition of the grand work it has done here.

The chairman then intrduced Miss Sudduth, managing editor, who made the report for

THE UNION SIGNAL:

[Limited space crowds out all but the closing paragraph.]

We do not claim to have attained to our ideal of a temperauce organ and a woman's paper, but we do claim, at least, to give our subscribers their money's worth. When the white-ribbon women are willing to pay as much for their UNION SIGNAL as they do for their church papers or as the suffrage women pay for their suffrage papers, then and not till then will we have an organ that will be large enough and handsome enough and comprehensive enough to meet the needs of our great organization, and the ideals of its editors.

THE CHAIRMAN: The next on the list is "Books and Leaflets, Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, editor, we used to say of Boston, but now we say, Chicago.

I wish I could talk upon the W. T. P. A. itself, I wish and I have wished for the past year that I could let the entire constituency of the W. C. T. U. know the devotion, the consecration and the earnest purpose that are in that organization; know how constantly, prayerfully, earnestly, it is seeking the best good of our great work.

The greatest work that has been done in our book line since I have had the honor to serve as editor has been the publication of that which I am sure is a book to live through the ages, the biography of the mother of our chieftain, Mary T. Hill Willard. I think I am more grateful for the fact that it was my privilege to serve in bringing out that work than for almost any other thing. It was a liberal education to me, it was a delight and a joy to take my own humble part in giving to the world this book which is truly called "A Great Mother." I am sure those of you who know the book will understand how fully it justifies its right to that title. Those of you who do not know of it cannot do better than to learn for yourselves how much of wisdom and of love; of strength and brightness, uplift and outlook upon life is within its pages.

The president stated that she also wished to call attention to a leaflet published by the W. T. P. A. containing a speech by Mary T. Lathrap on the method and spirit of the W. C. T. U.

Mrs. Stevenson also urged the adoption of The Advance Guard as the organ of the Senior L. T. L. and the better pushing of that organ as well as the bright little Young Crusader. One small book in size, but large in mattur and possibilities of power; "David Douglas and His Wife," by Mrs. O. W. Scott, of Conn. It was originally published in the UNION SIGNAL; also two booklets, "Songs of a Home"; aud Olive Schreiner's "Three Dreams in a Desert."

THE CHAIRMAN: We will now have the report of the business manager of the W. T. P. A., Mrs. Grow, whom I regard as one of the women of destiny, one who, in the night of the crisis, was raised up for us, and by the help of God and the faithful work of good women have brought us out into the work.

MRS. GROW: I desire to thank you for your cordial and effective response to our chieftain's plea on behalf of the UNION SIGNAL. This brought us 2,308 new names, the largest number coming from New York, the second from Illinois, the third from Ohio, and we were glad of these names, but they represented to us far more than a money value, for the letters which contained the names spoke to us of an earnest purpose to stand back of this publishing house, and make it the grand success it deserves to be. You will hear in our president's report ot the magnificent output of our presses during the past year. Over 100,000,000 pages have been printed of literature; more than 55,000,000 of these have gone their way to the insurance man, to the lawyer, to the grocer, to the dealer in clay, to the man of letters, to the university student, and the cash for the printing of these has been put into our treasury. More than 45,000,000 pages of temperance literature have been printed, and as you have heard from Mrs. Stevenson more than 6,000,000 pages of these have been tracts and pamphlets. A large part of these are on the shelves of our stock-room awaiting your orders. Many of them have gone to your unions and to the various branches of your work, and to your homes, and we are still waiting for a large part of the cash to be paid into our treasury. Ladies, could we have put this branch of our business upon the same basis as the other, we should not have been compelled to show even a slight deficit in the year we have just ended, which will be noted forever as one of unprecedented commercial disaster. How shall we accomplish this result? I appeal to you. Give us your help in your unions, work for us with individual zeal in your community and in your union; talk for this publishing house as if it were yours and success will be assured to us.

THE CHAIRMAN: As Mrs. Grow has lately come among us, it occurs to me to mention that she is a Massachusetts woman, a graduate of the Wheatland Seminary, and as we have so few from the Episcopal Church, I mention that Mrs. Grow is one. She is a strong, sturdy, white ribbon business woman, whose word is as good as her bond, and I being just the opposite, not knowing anything about figures, am just silent in my admiration.

Mrs. Fessenden withdrew her motion.

[Report of Mrs. Carse, President W. T. P. A., was presented. Owing to lack of space, this will be given in the regular convention number of the UNION SIGNAL, December 6.]

On motion, the reports of the different leaders of the publishing interest were adopted.

It was moved by Mrs. Fessenden that a telegram be sent to Mary A. Livermore, Honorary President of the W. C. T. U., of Massachusetts, and also to Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt. Carried.

It was moved by Mrs. Beck, President of Indiana, that a telegram of sympathy be sent to Mrs. Nicolls, who is detained at home on account of the illness of her daughter. Carried.

THE CHAIRMAN: I wanted to introduce to you Mr. Christophel, who, like the stoker of the engine, is down in the hold of the ship of the publishing department and makes the wheels go round. He is the head of the printing department, a man that we trust and honor, and has the affection of all that are connected with the W. T. P. A. As we have no other man around I wanted to introduce him, and he is a fine specimen.

In the meantime we have another fine specimen and that is Mr. Samuel Dickey, who will please come forward.

Mr. Dickey responded by saying that he was reminded of a story that he heard when down in the city of Scranton, Penn. A bright Irishman had said that the way to avoid a rear end collision on a railroad was to "lave off the last car," and stated that he had often thought that the way to avoid the difficulties in the progress of the affairs of state was to attach a lady's coach and hoped that it would soon be attached politically.

Mrs. Bullock then read the report of the committee on credentials, as follows:

General officers	4
General secretary of Y. W. branch	1
President's private secretary	1
Vice-presidents	31
Superintendents	21
Organizers	9
Evangelists	4
Editors and publishers of official organ	4
President National Temperance hospital	1
State officers other than presidents	34
Standing committees	3
Delegates	292
Fraternal delegates having been made full members	2
Total	407

Mrs. Bullock asked permission to make a statement and said that inasmuch as many of her friends had suggested that she take the place of Mrs. Woodbridge, she desired at this time to say that she could not possibly take that position and asked her friends not to vote for her.

It was moved by Mrs. Fessenden that the vice-president-at-large shall have a seat among the general officers without a vote. Carried.

Mrs. Benjamin offered as an amendment to the by-law on the election, the following:

"The general officers, with the exception of the vice-president-at-large, and the assistant recording secretary shall be nominated and elected by ballot on the morning of the last day but one of the annual meeting. The president may nominate the vice-president-at-large and the recording secretary may nominate her assistant, these officers to be elected by acclamation unless otherwise ordered."

The motion was seconded by Mrs. Hammer and carried.
